ADVERTISEMENT TO THIS EDITION.

In my first edition of this work, in 5 vols. 8vo., 1831, besides endeavouring to elucidate the many obscurities which Mr. Boswell had designedly left or which the lapse of time had created, I hazarded the experiment of inlaying upon the text such passages from the other biographers of Johnson as seemed necessary to fill up the long and frequent chasms which exist in Boswell's narrative. This plan afforded a more complete view of Johnson's life, though it gave, I must own, a less perfect one of Boswell's work. It had, also, as I originally feared, "a confused and heterogeneous appearance"—with the further disadvantage of not completely fulfilling its object,—for the materials turned out to be too copious to admit of a thorough incorporation. On the whole, then, the publisher thought it better in a second edition, 8 vols. 12mo., 1835, to omit from the text all extracts from other works; which were either distributed into the notes, or collected into two supplemental volumes (the 9th and 10th) under the title of Johnsoniana—Boswell's Tour to the Hebrides, Johnson's own Letters, his Notes of a Tour in Wales, and extracts from his correspondence with Mrs. Thrale, being only excepted. That edition included some corrections and many additions of my own; but it was carried through the press by the late Mr. Wright, (editor of the Parliamentary History, the Cavendish Debates, &c.) who selected the Johnsoniana, broke the narrative into chapters, and added some notes, which I have now marked with his name.

The present edition is formed on the same principle, for, in addition to every other motive, its shape and size required as much compression as possible. Boswell's text is, therefore, uninterrupted; but I have retained the most important biographical extracts from the Thrale correspondence, and have even found room for a few more original letters. I have also added several new notes, and have abridged, altered, and I hope improved, many of the old ones. I do not flatter myself that I have corrected all former errors, but I have at least diligently endeavoured to do so. As I think I may venture to say that my original edition revived, and in some respects extended, the public interest in Boswell's delightful work, I can desire no more than that my present revision may tend to maintain it.

It were superfluous to expatiate on the merits, at least as a source of amusement, of Boswell’s Life or Johnson. Whatever doubts may have existed as to the prudence or the propriety of the original publication—however naturally private confidence was alarmed, or individual vanity offended, the voices of criticism and complaint were soon drowned in the general applause. And no wonder—the work combines within itself the four most entertaining classes of writing—biography, memoirs, familiar letters, and that assemblage of literary anecdotes which the French have taught us to distinguish by the termination Anecdota.

It was originally received with an eagerness and relished with a zest which undoubtedly were sharpened by the curiosity which the unexpected publication of the words and deeds of so many persons still living could not but excite. But this motive has gradually become weaker, and may now be said to be extinct; yet we do not find that the popularity of the work, though somewhat changed in quality, is really diminished; and as the interval which separates us from the actual time and scene increases, so appear to increase the interest and delight which we feel at being introduced, as it were, into that distinguished society of which Dr. Johnson formed the centre, and of which his biographer is the historian.

But though every year thus adds to the interest and instruction which this work affords, something is, on the other hand, deducted from the amusement which it gives, by the gradual obscurity that time throws over the persons and incidents of private life: many circumstances known to all the world when Mr. Boswell wrote are already obscure to the best informed, and wholly forgotten by the rest of mankind.

For instance, when he relates (p. 69.) that a “great personage” called the English Divines of the sixteenth and seventeenth cen-

1 A few slight alterations have been made in the original preface, to suit it to the present edition. — 1817.
2 “Dr. Johnson talked with approbation of an intended edition of the Spectator, with notes. He observed that all works which describe manners require notes in sixty or seventy years or less,” part, p. 389. And Dean Swift wrote to Pope on the subject of the Dunciad, “I could wish the notes to be very large in what relates to the persons concerned; for I have long observed, that twenty miles from London nobody understands hints, initial letters, or town facts or passages, and in a few years not even those who live in London.”—Lett. 16, July, 1729.
3 Mr. Boswell confesses that he has sometimes been incensed by the subsequent conduct of persons in exhibiting or suppressing Dr. Johnson’s unwearable opinion of them. See the cases of Lord Monboddo, p. 96, and of Mr. Sheridan, p. 204; and it is to be feared he has some-1times done so without confessing, perhaps without being conscious, of the prejudice. On the other hand, he is sometimes more amably guilty of exotation, as in the instances of Doctors Robertson and Beattie, pp. 282, 283, and 556. It is not easy to explain why Mr. Boswell was unfavourably disposed towards old Sheridan and Goldsmith, though the bias is obvious; but wholly unaccountable are the frequent ridicule and censure which he delighted to provoke and to record against the amiable Bennet Langton. This is, I think, more apparent latterly; though he still generally designates him by some kindly epithet.

Those who knew Mr. Boswell intimately have informed me (as indeed he himself involuntarily does) that his vanity was very sensitive, and there can be no doubt that personal joke tinged many passages of his book, which, whenever I could trace it, I have not failed to notice.

1 The programme of Mr. Boswell’s edition was great personage,” we conclude that George III. was the great personage; but all my inquiries (and some of His Majesty’s illustrious family have condescended to permit these inquiries to extend even to them) have failed to ascertain to what person or on what occasion that happy expression was used.

Again: When Mr. Boswell’s capricious delicacy induced him to suppress names and to substitute such descriptions as “an eminent friend,” “a young gentleman,” “a distinguished orator,” these were well understood by the society of the day; but it is become necessary to apprise the reader of our times, that Mr. Burke, Mr. Sheridan, and Mr. Fox were respectively meant. Nor is it always easy to appropriate Mr. Boswell’s circumlocutory designations. It will be seen in the course of this work, that several of them have become so obscure that even the surviving members of the Johnsonian Society were unable to recollect who were meant, and it was on one of these occasions that Sir James Mackintosh told me that “my work had, at least, not come too soon.”

Mr. Boswell’s delicacy is termed capricious, because he is on some occasions candid even to indiscretion, and on others unaccountably mysterious. In the report of a conversation he will clearly designate half the interlocutors, while the other half, without any apparent reason, he casts into studied obscurity.

Considering himself to be (as he certainly has been to a greater degree than he could have contemplated) one of the distributors of fame, he has sometimes indulged his partialities or prejudices by throwing more or less light, and lights more or less favourable, on the different persons of his scene; some of whom he obtrudes into broad day, while others he only “adumbrates” by imperfect allusions. But many, even of those the most clearly designated and spoken of as familiar to every eye and ear, have already lived their day, and are hardly to be heard of except in this work. Yet this work must be read with imperfect pleasure, without some knowledge of the history of those more than half-forgotten persons.

Facts, too, fade from memory as well as names; and fashions and follies are still more transient. But, in a book mainly composed of familiar conversation, how large a portion must bear on the facts, the follies, and the fashions of the time!

To clear up these obscurities — to supply these deficiencies — to retrieve obsolete and to collect scattered circumstances — and so to restore to the work as much as possible of its original clearness and freshness, were the main objects of the present Editor. I am but too well aware how unequal I am to the task, and how imperfectly I have accomplished it. But as the time was rapidly passing away in which any aid could be expected from the contemporaries of Johnson, or even of Boswell, I determined to undertake the work — believing that, however ill I might perform it, I should still do it better than, twenty years later, it could be done by any diligence of research or any felicity of conjecture.

But there were also deficiencies to be supplied. Notwithstanding the diligence and minuteness with which Mr. Boswell detailed what he saw of Dr. Johnson’s life, his book left large chasms. It must be recollected that they never resided in the same neighbourhood, and that the detailed account of Johnson’s domestic life and conversation is limited to the opportunities afforded by Mr. Boswell’s occasional visits to London — by the Scottish Tour — and by one meeting at Dr. Taylor’s in Derbyshire. Of above twenty years, therefore, that their acquaintance lasted, periods equivalent in the whole to about three-quarters of a year only fell under the personal notice of Boswell — and thus has been left many a long hiatus — valeb deficiens, and now, alas, quite irreparable!

Mr. Boswell endeavoured, indeed, to fill up these chasms as well as he could with letters, memoranda, notes, and anecdotes collected from every quarter; but the appearance of his work was so long delayed, that Sir John Hawkins, Mrs. Fizzi, Dr. Strahan, Mr. Tyers, Mr. Nichols, and many others, had anticipated much of what he would have been glad to tell. Some squabbles about copyright had warned him that he must not avail himself of their publications; and he was on such bad terms with his rival biographers that he could not expect any assistance or countenance from them. He nevertheless went as far as he thought the law would allow in making frequent quotations from the preceding publications; but as to all the rest, which he did not venture to appropriate to his own use, — the grapes were sour — and he took every opportunity of representing the anecdotes of his rivals as extremely inaccurate and generally undeserving of credit.

It is certain that none of them have attained — indeed they do not pretend to — that extreme verbal accuracy with which Mr. Boswell had, by great zeal and diligence, learned to record conversations; nor in the details of facts are they so precise as Mr. Boswell, with good reason, claims to be. After all, however, Mr. Boswell himself is not exempt from those errors — and an attentive examination and collation of the authorities (and particularly of Mr. Boswell’s own) produced the final conviction that the minor biographers are entitled not merely to more credit than Mr. Boswell allows them, but to as much as any person writing from recollection, and not from notes made at the moment, can be.

But much the largest, and, for the purpose of filling up the intervals of his private history, the most valuable part of Mr. Johnson’s correspondence was out of Boswell’s reach, namely, that which he for twenty years maintained with Mrs. Thrale, and which she published in 1788, in two volumes octavo. For the copyright of these, Mr. Boswell says, in a tone of admiring envy, “she received five hundred pounds.” The publication, however, was not very successful — it never reached a second edition, and is now almost forgotten.

But through these letters are scattered almost the only information we have relative to Johnson during the long intervals between Mr. Boswell’s visits; and from them he has occasionally but cautiously (having the fear of the copyright law before his eyes) made interesting extracts.

These letters being now public property, I have been at liberty to follow up Mr. Boswell's imperfect example, and have therefore made numerous and copious selections from them, less as specimens of Johnson's talents for letter-writing, than as notices of his domestic and social life during the intervals of Mr. Boswell's narrative. Indeed, as letters, few of Johnson's can have any great charm for the common reader; they are full of good sense and good-nature, but in forms too didactic and ponderous to be very amusing. In the extracts which I have made from Mrs. Thrale's correspondence, I have been guided entirely by the object of completing the history of Johnson's life.

The most important addition, however, which I have made is one that needs no apology — the incorporation with the Life of the whole of the Tour to the Hebrides, which Boswell published in one volume in 1785, and which, no doubt, if he could legally have done so, he would himself have incorporated in the Life — of which indeed he expressly tells us, he looks on the Tour but as a portion. It is only wonderful, that since the copyright has expired, any edition of his Life of Johnson should have been published without the addition of this, the most original, curious, and amusing portion of the whole biography.

The Prayers and Meditations, published by Dr. Strahan too hastily after Johnson's death, and I think in other respects also, indiscriminately, have likewise been made use of to an extent which was forbidden to Mr. Boswell. What Dr. Strahan calls meditations are, in fact, nothing but diaries of the author's moral and religious state of mind, intermixed with some notices of his bodily health and of the interior circumstances of his domestic life. Mr. Boswell had ventured to quote some of these: the present edition contains all that appear to offer any thing of interest.

I have also incorporated a diary which Johnson had kept during a Tour through North Wales, made, in 1775, in company with Mr. Thrale and his family. Mr. Boswell had, it appears, inquired in vain for this diary: if he could have obtained it, he would, no doubt, have inserted it, as he did the similar notes of the Tour in France in the succeeding year. By the liberality of Mr. Duppa, who published it in 1806, with copious explanatory notes, I was enabled to add it to my edition. I have likewise given in the Appendix an Account of Dr. Johnson's early life, written by himself, published in 1802, but now become scarce; and I have thrown into the notes or the Appendix a few extracts from other published lives and anecdotes of Dr. Johnson which seemed necessary to complete Boswell's picture.

But besides these printed materials, I have been favoured with many papers connected with Dr. Johnson, his life, and society, hitherto unpublished. Of course, my first inquiries were directed towards the original manuscript of Mr. Boswell's Journal, which would no doubt have enabled me to fill up all the blanks and clear away much of the obscurity that exist in the printed Life. It was to be hoped that the archives of Auchinleck, which Mr. Boswell frequently and pompously mentions, would contain the original materials of these works, which he himself, as well as the world at large, considered as his best claims to distinction. And I thought that I was only fulfilling the duties of courtesy in rejecting from Mr. Boswell's representative any information which he might be disposed to afford on the subject. To that request I never received any answer: though the same inquiry was afterwards, on my behalf, repeated by Sir Walter Scott, whose influence might have been expected to have produced a more satisfactory result. But was more fortunate in other quarters.

The Reverend Doctor Hall, Master of Pembroke College, was so good as to collate the printed copy of the Prayers and Meditations with the original papers, now (most appropriately) deposited in the library of that college, and some, not unimportant, light has been thrown on that publication by the personal inspection of the papers which he permitted me to make. Doctor Hall has also elucidated some facts and corrected some misstatements in Mr. Boswell's account of Johnson's earlier life, by an examination of the college records; and he has found some of Johnson's Oxford exercises, one or two specimens of which have been selected as likely to interest the classical reader. He has further been so obliging as to select and copy several letters written by Dr. Johnson to his early and constant friends, the daughters of Sir Thomas Aston, which, having fallen into the hands of Mrs. Parker, were by her son, the Reverend S. H. Parker, presented to Pembroke College. The papers derived from this source are marked Pemb. MSS. Dr. Hall, feeling a fraternal interest in the most illustrious of the sons of Pembroke, continued, as will appear in the course of the work, to favour me with his valuable assistance.

The Reverend Dr. Harwood, the historian journals do not exist at Auchinleck: perhaps to this fact the silence of Sir James Boswell may be attributed. The manuscript of the Tour was, it is known, fairly transcribed, and so, probably, were portions of the Life; but it appears from a memorandum book and other papers in Mr. Anderson's possession, that Boswell's materials were in a variety of forms; and it is feared that they have been irretrievably dispersed.
of Liechfield, procured for me, through the favour of Mrs. Pearson, the widow of the legatee of Miss Lucy Porter, many letters addressed to this lady by Johnson; for which, it seems, Mr. Boswell had inquired in vain. These papers are marked Pearson MSS. Dr. Harwood supplied also some other papers, and much information he procured from himself. 1

Lord Rokeby, the nephew and heir of Mrs. Maguire, was so kind as to communicate Dr. Johnson’s letters to that lady.

Mr. Langton, the grandson of Mr. Bennet Langton, has furnished some of his grandfather’s papers, and several original MSS. of Dr. Johnson’s Latin poetry, which have enabled me to explain some errors and obscurities in the published copies of those compositions.

Mr. J. F. Palmer, the grand-nephew of Sir Joshua Reynolds and of Miss Reynolds, most liberally communicated all the papers of that lady, containing a number of letters or rather notes of Dr. Johnson to her, which, however trivial in themselves, tend to corroborate all that the biographers have stated of the charity and kindness of his private life. Mr. Palmer also contributed a paper of more importance—a MS. of about seventy pages, written by Miss Reynolds, and entitled Recollections of Dr. Johnson. 2 The authenticity and general accuracy of these Recollections cannot be doubted, and I had therefore admitted extracts from them into the text of my first edition; I have now given the whole in the Appendix.

Mr. Markland has, as the reader will see by the notes to which his name is affixed, favoured me with a great deal of zealous assistance and valuable information.

He also communicated a copy of Mrs. Piozzi’s anecdotés, copiously annotated, propriis manu, by Mr. Malone. These notes have been of use in explaining some obscurities; they guide us also to the source of many of Mr. Boswell’s charges against Mrs. Piozzi; and have had an effect that Mr. Malone could neither have expected or wished—that of tending rather to confirm than to impeach that lady’s veracity.

Mr. J. L. Anderdon favoured me with the inspection of a portfolio bought at the sale of the library of Boswell’s second son James, which contained some of the original letters, memoranda, and note books, which had been used as materials for the Life. Their chief value, now, is to show that as far as we may judge from this specimen, the printed book is a faithful transcript from the original notes, except only as to the suppression of names. Mr. Anderdon’s portfolio also contains Johnson’s original draft of the Pronounce of the Dictionary, and a fair copy of it (written by an amanuensis, but signed, in form, by Johnson), addressed to Lord Chesterfield, on which his lordship appears to have made a few critical notes. 3

Through the obliging interposition of Mr. Appleyard, private secretary of the second Earl Spencer, Mrs. Rose, the daughter of Dr. Strahan, favoured me with copies of several letters of Dr. Johnson to her father, one or two only of which Mr. Boswell had been able to obtain. In addition to these contributions of manuscript materials, I have to acknowledge much and valuable assistance from numerous literary and distinguished friends.

The venerable Lord Stowell, the friend and executor of Dr. Johnson, was one of the first persons who suggested this work to me: he was pleased to take a great interest in it, and kindly endeavoured to explain the obscurities which were stated to him; but he confessed, at the same time, that the application had in some instances come rather too late, and regretted that an edition on this principle had not been undertaken when full light might have been obtained. His lordship was also so kind as to dictate, in his own happy and peculiar style, some notes of his recollections of Dr. Johnson. These, by a very unusual accident, were lost, and his lordship’s great age and increasing infirmity deterred me from again troubling him on the subject. A few points, however, in which I could trust to my own recollection, will be found in the notes.

To my revered friend, Dr. Thomas Elrington, Lord Bishop of Ferns, I had to offer my thanks for much valuable advice and assistance, and for a continuance of that friendly interest with which his lordship for many years, and in more important concerns, honoured me.

Sir Walter Scott, whose personal kindness to me and indefatigable good-nature to every body were surpassed only by his genius, found time from his higher occupations to annotate a considerable portion of this work—the Tour to the Hebrides—and continued his aid to the very conclusion of my task.

The Right Honourable Sir James Mackintosh, whose acquaintance with literary men and literary history was so extensive, and who, although not of the Johnsonian circle, became early in life acquainted with most of the sur-

1 Dr. Harwood likewise favoured me with permission to engrave for the edition of 1831, the earliest known portrait of Dr. Johnson—a miniature worn in a bracelet by his wife, which Dr. Harwood purchased from Francis Barber, Dr. Johnson’s servant and legatee. The engraving in the original was by mutale stated to be in the possession of Mrs. Pearson. 1 It belonged to Dr. Harwood.

2 A less perfect copy of these recollections was also communicated by Mr. Gwatkin, who married one of Sir Joshua’s sisters.

4 They were transmitted by post, addressed to Sir Walter Scott in Edinburgh for his perusal: after a considerable lapse of time, Sir Walter was written to return them—he had never had them. It then appeared that the post office bag which contained this packet and several others, had been lost, and it has never been heard of. Some of my friends reproached me with want of due caution in having trusted this packet to the post, but I think unjustly. There is, perhaps, no individual now alive who has dispatched and received a greater number of letters than I have done, and I can scarcely recollect an instance of a similar loss.
of my own, I will only say, that I have endeavoured to make them at once concise and explanatory. I hope I have cleared up some obscurities, supplied some deficiencies, and, in many cases, saved the reader the trouble of referring to dictionaries and magazines for notices of the various persons and facts which are incidentally mentioned.

In some cases I candidly confess, and in many more I fear that I have shown, my own ignorance; but I can say, that when I have so failed, it has not been for want of diligent inquiry after the desired information. I have not considered it any part of my duty to defend or to controvert the statements or opinions recorded in the text; but in a few instances, in which either a matter of fact has been evidently misstated, or an important principle has been heedlessly invaded or too lightly treated, I have ventured a few words towards correcting the error.

The desultory nature of the work itself, the repetitions in some instances and the contradictions in others, are perplexing to those who may seek for Dr. Johnson's final opinion on any given subject. This difficulty I could not hope, and have, therefore, not attempted to remove; it is inevitable in the transcript of table-talk so various, so loose, and so extensive; but I have endeavoured to alleviate it by occasional references to the different places where the same subject is discussed, and by a copious, and I trust, satisfactory index.

I have added translations of most if not all the classical quotations in the work—generally from the most approved translators—sometimes, when they did not appear to hit the point in question, I have ventured a version of my own.

With respect to the spirit towards Dr. Johnson himself by which I was actuated, I beg leave to say that I feel and have always felt for him a great, but, I hope, not a blind admiration. For his writings, and especially for his Vanity of Human Wishes, the Prefaces to the Dictionary and Shakespeare, and the Lives of the Poets, that admiration has little or no alloy. In his personal conduct and conversation there may be occasionally something to regret and (though rarely) something to disapprove, but less, perhaps, than there would be in those of any other man, whose words, actions, and even thoughts should be exposed to public observation so nackedly as, by a strange concurrence of circumstances, Dr. Johnson's have been.

portion of his life was, as Mrs. Piozzi observes, nothing but conversation, and that conversation was watched and recorded from night to night and from hour to hour with zealous attention and unceasing diligence. No man, the most staid or the most guarded, is always the same in health, in spirits, in opinions. Human life is a series of inconsistencies; and when Johnson's early misfortunes, his protracted poverty, his strong passions, his violent prejudices, and, above all, his bodily and I may say mental infirmities, are considered, it is only wonderful that a portrait so laboriously minute and so painfully faithful does not exhibit more of blemish, incongruity, and error.

The life of Dr. Johnson is indeed a most curious chapter in the history of men; for certainly there is no instance of the life of any other human being having been exhibited in so much detail, or with so much fidelity. There are, perhaps, not many men who have practised so much self-examination as to know themselves as well as every reader knows Dr. Johnson. We must recollect that it is not his table-talk or his literary conversations only that have been published; all his most private and most trifling correspondence—all his most common as well as his most confidential intercourses—all his most secret communion with his own conscience—and even the solemn and contrite exercises of his piety, have been divulged and exhibited to the "garish eye" of the world without reserve—I had almost said, without delicacy. Young, with gloomy candour, has said

"Heaven's Sovereign saves all beings but himself, That hideous sight, a naked human heart."

What a man must Johnson have been, whose heart, having been laid more bare than that of any other mortal ever was, has passed so little blemished through so terrible an ordeal!

But while we contemplate with such interest this admirable and perfect portrait, let us not forget the painter. Mr. Burke told Sir James Mackintosh that he thought Johnson showed more powers of mind in company than in his writings, and on another occasion said, that he thought Johnson appeared greater in Boswell's volumes than even in his own.

It was a strange and fortunate concurrence, that one so prone to talk and who talked so well, should be brought into such close contact and confidence with one so zealous and so able to record. Dr. Johnson was a man of extraordinary powers, but Mr. Boswell had qualities, in their own way, almost as rare. He united lively manners with indefatigable diligence, and the volatile curiosity of a man about town with the drudging patience of a chronicler. With a very good opinion of himself, he was quick in discerning, and frank in applauding, the excellencies of others. Though proud of his own name and lineage, and ambitious of the countenance of the great, he was yet so cordial an admirer of merit, wherever found, that much public ridicule, and something like contempt, were excited by the modest assurance with which he pressed his acquaintance on all the notorieties of his time, and by the ostentations (but in the main, laudable) assiduity with which he attended the exile Paoli and the low-born Johnson! These were amiable, and, for us, fortunate inconsistencies. His contemporaries indeed, not without some colour of reason, occasionally complained of him as vain, inquisitive, troublesome, and giddy; but his vanity was offensive—his curiosity was commonly directed towards laudable objects—when he meddled, he did so, generally, from good-natured motives—his giddiness was only an exuberant gaiety, which never failed in the respect and reverence due to literature, morals, and religion: and posterity gratefully acknowledges the taste, temper, and talents with which he selected, enjoyed, and described that polished and intellectual society which still lives in his work, and without his work had perished!

"Vixere fortes ante Agamemnon
Multi: sed omnes illiarmyamiles
Urgentur, ignotique longa
Nocte, carent quia vate sacro."

Such imperfect though interesting sketches as Ben Jonson's visit to Drummond, Selden's Table Talk, Swift's Journal, and Spence's Anecdotes, only tantalise our curiosity and excite our regret that there was no Boswell to preserve the conversation and illustrate the life and times of Addison, of Swift himself, of Milton, and, above all, of Shakespeare! We can hardly refrain from indulging ourselves with the imagination of works so instructive and delightful; but that were idle; except as it may tend to increase our obligation to the faithful and fortunate biographer of Dr. Johnson.

Mr. Boswell's birth and education familiarised him with the highest of his acquaintance, and his good-nature and conviviality with the lowest. He describes society of all classes with the happiest discrimination. Even his foibles assisted his curiosity; he was sometimes laughed at, but always well received; he excited no envy, he imposed no restraint. It was well known that he made notes of every conversation, yet no timidity was seriously alarmed, no delicacy demurred; and we are perhaps indebted to the lighter parts of his character for the patient indulgence with which every body submitted to sit for their pictures.

Mr. Boswell took, indeed, extraordinary and most laudable pains to attain accuracy. Not only did he commit to paper at night the conversation of the day, but even in general society he would occasionally take a note of any thing remarkable that occurred; and he afterwards spared no trouble in arranging and supplying the inevitable deficiencies of these hasty memoranda.¹

Nor were his talents inconsiderable. He had looked a good deal into books, and more into the world. The narrative portion of his works is written with good sense, in an easy and perspicuous style, and without (which seems odd enough) any palpable imitation of Johnson. But in recording conversations he is unrivalled: that he was eminently accurate in substance, we have the evidence of all his contemporaries; but he is also in a high degree characteristic—dramatic. The incidental observations with which he explains or enlivens the dialogue, are terse, appropriate, and picturesque—we not merely hear his company, we see them!

Yet his father was, as we are told, by no means satisfied with the life he led, nor his eldest son with the kind of reputation he attained; neither liked to hear of his connexion even with Paoli or Johnson; and both would have been better pleased if he had contented himself with a domestic life of sober respectability.

"Rydal Mount, 12th Sept. 1825.

"Sir Joshua Reynolds told me at his table, immediately after the publication of this book, that every word of it might be depended upon as if given on oath. Boswell was in the habit of bringing the proof sheets to his house previously to their being struck off, and if any of the company happened to have been present at the conversation recorded, he requested him or them to correct any error, and, not satisfied with this, he would run over all London for the sake of verifying any single word which might be disputed."

"G. H. BEAUMONT."

Although it cannot escape notice, that Sir Joshua is here reported to have drawn a somewhat wider inference than the premises warranted, the general testimony is satisfactory, and it is to a considerable extent corroborated by every kind of evidence external and internal.

"Mr. Beaumont, 2. 67. 3. n. This feeling is less surprising in old Lord Auchinleck than in Sir Alexander, who was himself a man of the world, clever, literary, and social.

"The following letter (in the Reynolds Papers) from Mr. Boswell to Sir Joshua, on the subject of this portrait, ought not to be lost.

"London, 7th June, 1785.

"My dear Sir, —The debts which I contracted in my father's lifetime will not be cleared off by me for some years. I therefore think it unconsidered to indulge myself in any expensive article of elegant luxury. But in the mean time, you may die, or I may die; and I should regret very much that there should not be at Auchinleck my portrait painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds, with whom I have the felicity of living in social intercourse."

"I have a proposal to make to you. I am for certain to be called to the English bar next February. Will you now do my picture, and the price shall be paid out of the first fees which I receive as a barrister in Westminster Hall. Or if that fund should fail, it shall be paid at any rate in five years hence, by myself or my representatives.

"If you are pleased to approve of this proposal, your signifying your concurrence underneath, upon two duplicates, one of which shall be kept by each of us, will be a sufficient voucher of the obligation. I ever am, with very sincere regard, my dear sir, your faithful and affectionate humble servant,"

"JAMES BOSWELL."

"I agree to the above conditions."

"J. Reynolds."

"London, 10th Sept. 1785."

An engraving from Sir Joshua's portrait is prefixed to the present volume. I was favoured by Mrs. Denham with a pencil sketch of Mr. Boswell in later life, by Sir Thomas Lawrence: which, although bordering on caricature, is so evidently characteristic, and (as I am assured) so identically like, that I think it worth reproducing. I have also added, on the next page, a whole length (first published in the duo-decimo edition) of Boswell during the period when he "flourished" (as Mr. Chalmers slyly phrases it) with Johnson. Both these sketches will, I think, be acceptable, as giving a lively idea, not merely of his person, but also, (and particularly the first,) of his mind and manner: — busy self-importance and dogmatical good-nature were seldom better expressed.

DEDICATION.

TO SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

MY DEAR SIR,—Every liberal motive that can actuate an author in the dedication of his labours concurs in directing me to you, as the person to whom the following work should be inscribed.

If there be a pleasure in celebrating the distinguished merit of a contemporary, mixed with a certain degree of vanity, not altogether inexcusable, in appearing fully sensible of it, where can I find one, in complimenting whom I can with more general approbation gratify those feelings? Your excellence, not only in the art over which you have long presided with unrivalled fame, but also in philosophy and elegant literature, is well known to the present, and will continue to be the admiration of future ages. Your equal and placid temper, your variety of conversation, your true politeness, by which you are so amiable in private society, and that enlarged hospitality which has long made your house a common centre of union for the great, the accomplished, the learned, and the ingenious; all these qualities I can, in perfect confidence of not being accused of flattery, ascribe to you.

If a man may indulge an honest pride, in having it known to the world that he has been thought worthy of particular attention by a person of the first eminence in the age in which he lived, whose company has been universally courted, I am justified in availing myself of the usual privilege of a dedication, when I mention that there has been a long and uninterrupted friendship between us.

If gratitude should be acknowledged for favours received, I have this opportunity, my dear Sir, most sincerely to thank you for the many happy hours which I owe to your kindness,—for the cordiality with which you have at all times been pleased to welcome me,—for the number of valuable acquaintances to whom you have introduced me,—for the notes canaque Deum, which I have enjoyed under your roof.

If a work should be inscribed to one who is master of the subject of it, and whose approbation, therefore, must ensure it credit and success, the Life of Dr. Johnson is, with the greatest propriety, dedicated to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who was the intimate and beloved friend of that great man; the friend whom he declared to be "the most invulnerable man he knew; whom, if he should quarrel with him, he should find the most difficulty how to abuse." You, my dear Sir, studied him, and knew him well; you venerated and admired him. Yet, luminous as he was upon the whole, you perceived all the shades which mingled in the grand composition, all the little peculiarities and slight blemishes which marked the literary Colossus. Your very warm commendation of the specimen which I gave in my "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," of my being able to preserve his conversation in an authentic and lively manner, which opinion the public has confirmed, was the best encouragement for me to persevere in my purpose of producing the whole of my stores.

In one respect, this work will in some passages be different from the former. In my "Tour," I was almost unboundedly open in my communications; and from my eagerness to display the wonderful fertility and readiness of Johnson's wit, freely showed to the world its dexterity, even when I was myself the object of it. I trusted that I should be liberally understood, as knowing very well what I was about, and by no means as simply unconscious of the pointed effects of the satire. I own, indeed, that I was arrogant enough to suppose that the tenour of the rest of the book would sufficiently guard me against such a strange imputation. But it seems I judged too well of the world; for, though I could scarcely believe it, I have been undoubtedly informed, that many persons, especially in distant quarters, not penetrating enough into Johnson's character, so as to understand his mode of treating his friends, have arraigned my judgment, instead of seeing that I was sensible of all that they could observe.

It is related of the great Dr. Clarke, that when in one of his leisure hours he was unbending himself with a few friends in the most playful and frolicksome manner, he observed Beau Nash approaching; upon which he suddenly stopped. "My boys," said he, "let us be grave—here comes a fool." The world, my friend, I have found to be a great fool as to that particular on which it has become necessary to speak very plainly. I have therefore in this work been more reserved; and though I tell nothing but the truth, I have still kept in my mind that the whole truth is not always to be exposed. This, however, I have managed so as to occasion no diminution of the pleasure which my book should afford, though malignity may sometimes be disappointed of its gratifications. I am, my dear Sir, your much obliged friend and faithful humble servant,

MR. BOSWELL'S ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

I AT last deliver to the world a work which I have long promised, and of which, I am afraid, too high expectations have been raised. The delay of its publication must be imputed, in a considerable degree, to the extraordinary zeal which has been shown by distinguished persons in all quarters to supply me with additional information concerning its illustrious subject; resembling in this the grateful tribes of ancient nations, of which every individual was eager to throw a stone upon the grave of a departed hero, and thus to share in the pious office of erecting an honourable monument to his memory.

The labour and anxious attention with which I have collected and arranged the materials of which these volumes are composed, will hardly be conceived by those who read them with careless facility. The stretch of mind and prompt assiduity by which so many conversations were preserved, I myself, at some distance of time, contemplate with wonder; and I must be allowed to suggest, that the nature of the work, in other respects, as it consists of innumerable detached particulars, all which, even the most minute, I have spared no pains to ascertain with a scrupulous authenticity, has occasioned a degree of trouble far beyond that of any other species of composition. Were I to detail the books which I have consulted, and the inquiries which I have found it necessary to make by various channels, I should probably be thought ridiculously ostentatious.

Let me only observe, as a specimen of my trouble, that I have sometimes been obliged to run half over London, in order to fix a date correctly: which, when I had accomplished, I well knew would obtain me no praise, though a failure would have been to my discredit. And after all, perhaps, hard as it may be, I shall not be surprised if omissions or mistakes be pointed out with invidious severity. I have also been extremely careful as to the exactness of my quotations; holding that there is a respect due to the public, which should oblige every author to attend to this, and never to presume to introduce them with, "I think I have read," or "If I remember right," when the originals may be examined.

I beg leave to express my warmest thanks to those who have been pleased to favour me with communications and advice in the conduct of my work. But I cannot sufficiently acknowledge my obligations to my friend Mr. Malone, who was so good as to allow me to read to him almost the whole of my manuscript, and made such remarks as were greatly for the advantage of the work; though it is but fair to him to mention, that upon many occasions I differed from him, and followed my own judgment. I regret exceedingly that I was deprived of the benefit of his revision, when not more than one half of the book had passed through the press; but after having completed his very laborious and admirable edition of Shakspere, for which he generously would accept of no other reward but that fame which he has so deservedly obtained, he fulfilled his promise of a long-wished-for visit to his relations in Ireland; from whence his safe return, feliciter Atticis is desired by his friends here, with all the classical ardour of Στις τα δίκαια πατημα Κυπρίων; for there is no man in whom more elegant and worthy qualities are united; and whose society, therefore, is more valued by those who know him.

It is painful to me to think, that while I was carrying on this work, several of those to whom it would have been most interesting have died. Such melancholy disappointments we know to be incident to humanity; but we do not feel them the less. Let me particularly lament the Reverend Thomas Warton and the Reverend Dr. Adams. Mr. Warton, amidst his variety of genius and learning, and the excellence of his contributions to my collection are highly estimable; and as he had a true relish of my "Tour to the Hebrides," I trust I should now have been gratified with a larger share of his kind approbation. Dr. Adams, eminent as the head of a college, as a writer, and as a most amiable man, had known Johnson from his early years, and was his friend through life. What reason I had to hope for the countenance of that venerable gentleman to this work will appear from what he wrote to me upon a former occasion from Oxford, November 17, 1785: "Dear Sir, I hazard this letter, not knowing where it will find you, to thank you for your very agreeable 'Tour,' which I found here on my return from the country, and in which you have depicted our friend so perfectly to my fancy, in every attitude, every scene and situation, that I have thought myself in the company and of the party almost throughout. It has given very general satisfaction: and those who have found most fault with a passage here and there, have agreed that they could not help going through, and being entertained with the whole. I wish, indeed, some few gross expressions had been softened, and a few of our hero's foibles had been a little more shaded; but it is useful to see the weaknesses incident to great minds; and you have given us Dr. Johnson's authority that in history all ought to be told."

Such a sanction to my faculty of giving a just representation of Dr. Johnson I could not conceal. Nor will I suppress my satisfaction in the consciousness, that by recording so considerable a portion of the wisdom and wit of the brightest ornament of the eighteenth century, 1 I have largely provided for the instruction and entertainment of mankind.

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

That I was anxious for the success of a work which had employed much of my time and labour, I do not wish to conceal; but whatever doubts I at any time entertained, have been entirely removed by the very favourable reception with which it has been honoured. That reception has excited my best exertions to render my book more perfect; and in this endeavour I have had the assistance not only of some of my particular friends, but of many other learned and ingenious men, by which I have been enabled to rectify some mistakes, and to enrich the work with many valuable additions. These I have ordered to be printed separately in quarto, for the accommodation of the purchasers of the first edition. May I be permitted to say that the typography of both editions does honour to the press of Mr. Henry Baldwin, now Master of the Worshipful Company of Stationers, whom I have long known as a worthy man and an obliging friend.

In the strangely mixed scenes of human existence, our feelings are often at once pleasing and painful. Of this truth, the progress of the present work furnishes a striking instance. It was highly gratifying to me that my friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, to whom it is inscribed, lived to peruse it, and to give the strongest testimony to its fidelity; but before a second edition, which he contributed to improve, could be finished, the world has been deprived of that most valuable man; a loss of which the regret will be deep, and lasting, and extensive, proportionate to the felicity which he diffused through a wide circle of admirers and friends.

In reflecting that the illustrious subject of this work, by being more extensively and intimately known, however elevated before, has risen in the veneration and love of mankind, I feel a satisfaction beyond what fame can afford. We cannot, indeed, too much or too often admire his wonderful powers of mind, when we consider that the principal store of wit and wisdom which this work contains was not a particular selection from his general conversation, but was merely his occasional talk at such times as I had the good fortune to be in his company; and, without doubt, if his discourse at other periods had been collected with the same attention, the whole tenour of what he uttered would have been found equally excellent.

His strong, clear, and animated enforcement of religion, morality, loyalty, and subordination, while it delights and improves the wise and the good, will, I trust, prove an effectual antidote to that detestable sophistry which has been lately imported from France, under the false name of philosophy, and with a malignant industry has been employed against the peace, good order, and happiness of society, in our free and prosperous country: but, thanks be to God, without producing the pernicious effects which were hoped for by its propagators.

It seems to me, in my moments of self-complacency, that this extensive biographical work, however inferior in its nature, may in one respect be assimilated to the Odyssey. Amidst a thousand entertaining and instructive episodes, the hero is never long out of sight; for they are all in some degree connected with him; and he, in the whole course of the history, is exhibited by the author for the best advantage of his readers:

— Quid virtus et quid sapiens possit,
Utile proposuit nobis exemplar Ulyssen.

Should there be any cold-blooded and morose mortals who really dislike this book, I will give them a story to apply. When the great Duke of Marlborough, accompanied by Lord Cadogan, was one day reconnoitring the army in Flanders, a heavy rain came on, and they both called for their cloaks. Lord Cadogan's servant, a good-humoured alert lad, brought his lordship's in a minute. The duke's servant, a lazy sulky dog, was so sluggish, that his grace, being wet to the skin, reproved him, and had for answer, with a grunt, "I came as fast as I could;" upon which the duke calmly said, "Cadogan, I would not for a thousand pounds have that fellow's temper."

There are some men, I believe, who have, or think they have, a very small share of vanity. Such may speak of their literary fame in a decorous style of diffidence. But I confess, that I am so formed by nature and by habit, that to restrain the effusion of delight, on having obtained such fame, to me would be truly painful. Why then should I suppress it? Why "out of the abundance of the heart" should I not speak? Let me then mention with a warm, but no insolent exultation, that I have been regaled with spontaneous praise of my work by many and various persons, eminent for their rank, learning, talents, and accomplishments; much of which praise I have under their hands to be reposited in my archives at Auchinleck. An honourable and reverend friend speaking of the favourable reception of my volumes, even in the circles of fashion and elegance, said to me, "You have made them all talk Johnson." Yes, I may add, I have Johnsonised the land; and I trust they will not only talk but think Johnson.

To enumerate those to whom I have been thus indebted would be tediously ostentation. I cannot however but name one, whose praise is truly valuable, not only on account of his knowledge and abilities, but on account of the magnificent, yet dangerous embassy, in which he is now employed, which makes every thing that relates to him peculiarly interesting. Lord Macartney favoured me with his own copy of my book, with a number of notes, of which I have availed myself. On the first leaf I found, in his lordship's handwriting, an inscription of such high commendation, that even I, vain as I am, cannot prevail on myself to publish it.

MR. MALONE'S ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO THE THIRD EDITION.

Several valuable letters, and other curious matter, having been communicated to the author too late to be arranged in that chronological order, which he had endeavoured uniformly to observe in his work, he was obliged to introduce them in his second edition, by way of Addenda, as commodiously as he could. In the present edition they have been distributed in their proper places. In revising his volumes for a new edition, he had pointed out where some of these materials should be inserted; but unfortunately, in the midst of his labours, he was seized with a fever, of which, to the great regret of all his friends, he died on the 19th of May, 1795. All the notes that he had written in the margin of the copy, which he had in part revised, are here faithfully preserved; and a few new notes have been added, principally by some of those friends to whom the author, in the former editions, acknowledged his obligations. Those subscribed with the letter B. were communicated by Dr. Burney; those to which the letters J. B. are annexed, by the Rev. J. B. Blakeway, of Shrewsbury, to whom Mr. Boswell acknowledged himself indebted for some judicious remarks on the first edition of his work; and the letters J. B. — O. are annexed to some remarks furnished by the author's second son, a student of Brazen-Nose College in Oxford. Some valuable observations were communicated by James Bindley, Esq., first commissioner in the Stamp-office, which have been acknowledged in their proper places. For all those without any signature, Mr. Malone is answerable. Every new remark, not written by the author, for the sake of distinction has been enclosed within crockets; in one instance, however, the printer, by mistake, has affixed this mark to a note relative to the Rev. Thomas Fysche Palmer (see vol. iv. p. 129), which was written by Mr. Boswell, and therefore ought not to have been thus distinguished.

I have only to add, that the proof-sheets of the present edition not having passed through my hands, I am not answerable for any typographical errors that may be found in it. Having, however, been printed at the very accurate press of Mr. Baldwin, I make no doubt it will be found not less perfect than the former edition; the greatest care having been taken, by correctness and elegance, to do justice to one of the most instructive and entertaining works in the English language.

Edm. Malone.

8th April, 1799.

TO THE FOURTH EDITION.

In this edition are inserted some new letters, of which the greater part has been obligingly communicated by the Rev. Dr. Vyse, Rector of Lambeth. Those written by Dr. Johnson, concerning his mother in her last illness, furnish a new proof of his great piety and tenderness of heart; and therefore cannot but be acceptable to the readers of this very popular work. Some new notes also have been added, which, as well as the observations inserted in the third edition, and the letters now introduced, are carefully included within crockets, that the author may not be answerable for anything which had not the sanction of his approbation. The remarks of his friends are distinguished as formerly, except those of Mr. Malone, to which the letter M. is now subjoined. Those to which the letter K. is affixed were communicated by my learned friend, the Rev. Dr. Kearney, formerly senior Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and now beneficed in the diocese of Raphoe, in Ireland, of which he is archdeacon.

Of a work which has been before the public for thirteen years with increasing approbation, and of which near four thousand copies have been dispersed, it is not necessary to say more; yet I cannot refrain from adding, that, highly as it is now estimated, it will, I am confident, be still more valued by posterity a century hence, when all the actors in the scene shall be numbered with the dead; when the excellent and extraordinary man, whose wit and wisdom are here recorded, shall be viewed at a still greater distance; and the instruction and entertainment they afford will at once produce reverential gratitude, admiration, and delight.

2 In my editions Mr. Malone's, and, indeed, every one's share in the notes, is distinguished by the writer's name at length. — Croker.
3 Mr. Malone published a fifth edition in 1807, and a sixth in 1811; Mr. Chalmers a seventh in 1822; and an anonymous editor another, in Oxford, in 1825. Of publications so recent, the editor would not have felt justified in making an unpermitted use; but in fact there was little to be borrowed from any of them, except that of Mr. Chalmers; and his liberality, by pointing out such of the original sources of information as the editor had not himself previously discovered, has enabled him to enrich his copy with all the information which Mr. Chalmers could afford. — Croker.
To any one who reads the article on Croker's Boswell, in the last number of the Edinburgh Review, it will be evident that the book has been taken up by one determined to punish the member of parliament in the editor, and who, moreover, in the common spirit of the Edinburgh, is determined to sacrifice truth to brilliancy.

—Spectator, 1831.

Mr. Croker says, that at the commencement of the intimacy between Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale, in 1765, the lady was 25 years old.

In another place he says that Mrs. Thrale's 35th year coincided with Johnson's 70th. Johnson was born in 1709; if, therefore, Mrs. Thrale's 35th coincided with Johnson's 70th, she could have been but 21 years old in 1765.

But this is not all: Mr. Croker, in another place, assigns the year 1777 as the date of the complimentary lines which

Why, Mr. Croker says no such thing. He says, 'Mrs. Thrale was 25 years of age when the acquaintance commenced,' but he does not say when it commenced, nor when it became intimacy. It is Mr. Boswell who states that in 1765 Mr. Johnson was introduced into the family of Mrs. Thrale; but in the very next page we find Mrs. Thrale herself stating that the acquaintance began in 1764, and that the more strict intimacy might be dated from 1766. So that the discrepancy of two or three years which, by a double falsification of Mr. Croker's words, the Reviewer attributes to him, belongs really to Mr. Boswell and Mrs. Thrale themselves.

Mr. Croker states, that from a passage in one of Johnson's letters, 'he suspects,' and 'it may be surmised,' that Mrs. Thrale's 35th and Johnson's 70th years coincided. Is it not an absolute misrepresentation to call an opinion, advanced in the cautious terms of surmise and suspicion, as a statement of a fact?

Mr. Croker does no such thing. He inserts the complimentary lines under the year 1777, because he must needs place
'We will not decide between them; we will only say that the reasons he gives for thinking that Mrs. Thrale was exactly 35 years old when Johnson was 70, appear to us utterly frivolous.'

'Mr. Croker informs his readers, that Lord Mansfield survived Johnson full ten years. Lord Mansfield survived Dr. Johnson just eight years and a quarter.'

The Reviewer is right. Dr. Johnson died in 1784, and Lord Mansfield in 1788. But the occasion on which Mr. Croker used the inaccurate colloquial phrase of full ten years, makes the inaccuracy of no consequence at all. He is noticing an anecdote of a gentleman's having stated that he called on Dr. Johnson soon after Lord Mansfield's death, and that Johnson said, 'Ah, sir, there was little learning, and less virtue.' This cruel anecdote Mr. Croker's natural indignation refutes from his general recollection, and, without waiting to consult the printed obituaries, he exclaims, 'It cannot be true, for Lord Mansfield survived Johnson full ten years!' whereas he ought to have said, 'It cannot be true, because Lord Mansfield survived Johnson eight years and three months;' or, what would have been still more accurate, 'eight years, three months, and seven days!'
MR. CROKER'S EDITION OF BOSWELL.

Review.
' Mr. Croker tells us that the great Marquess of Montrose was beheaded at Edinburgh in 1650. There is not a forward boy at any school in England who does not know that the Marquess was hanged.
The account of the execution is one of the finest passages in Lord Clarendon's history. We can scarcely suppose that Mr. Croker has never read the passage; and yet we can scarcely suppose that any one who has ever perused so noble and pathetic a story can have utterly forgotten all its most striking circumstances.'

Answer.
We really almost suspect that the Reviewer himself has not read the passage to which he refers, or he could hardly have accused Mr. Croker of showing—by having said that Montrose was 'beheaded,' when the Reviewer thinks he should have said ' hanged'—that he had forgotten the most striking passage of Clarendon's noble account of the execution. For it is not on the execution itself that Lord Clarendon dwells with the most pathos and effect, but on the previous indignities at and after his trial, which Montrose so magnani-omously endured. Clarendon, with scrupulous delicacy, avoids all mention of the peculiar mode of death, and is wholly silent as to any of the circumstances of the execution, leaving the reader's imagination to supply, from the terms of the sentence, the odious details; but the Reviewer, if he had really known or felt the true pathos of the story, would have remembered that the sentence was, that the Marquess should be hanged and beheaded, and that his head should be stuck on the Tolbooth of Edinburgh; and it was this very circumstance of the beheading, which excited in Montrose that burst of eloquence which is the most striking beauty of the whole of the 'noble and pathetic story.' 'I am prouder,' said he to his persecutors, 'to have my head set upon the place it is appointed to be, than I should be to have my picture hung in the King's bedchamber!' And this—the beheading—is the incident which the Reviewer imagines that Mr. Croker may have 'forgotten,' because he does tell us that Montrose was beheaded, when he should have drily told us he was hanged.

"Nothing," says Mr. Croker, "can be more unfounded than the assertion that Byng fell a martyr to political party.
By a strange coincidence of circumstances it happened that there was a total change of administration between his condemnation and death, so that one party presided at his trial, and another at his execution. There can be no stronger proof that he was not a political martyr." Now what will our readers think of this writer, when we assure them that this statement, so confidently made respecting events so notorious, is absolutely untrue? One and the same administration was in office when the court-martial on Byng commenced This contradiction to Mr. Croker, "so confidently made with respect to events so notorious," is absolutely untrue! But so it is. The Reviewer catches at what may be a verbal inaccuracy (I doubt whether it be one, but at worst it is no more), and is himself guilty of the most direct and substantial falsehood. Of all the audacities of which this Reviewer has been guilty, this is the greatest, not merely because it is the most important as an historical question, but because it is an instance of—to use his own expression—"the most scandalous inaccuracy." The question between Mr. Croker and the Reviewer is this,— whether one Ministry did not prosecute Byng, and a succeeding Ministry execute its sittings, through the whole trial, at the condemnation and at the execution.

In the month of November, 1756, the Duke of Newcastle and Lord Hardwicke resigned; the Duke of Devonshire became First Lord of the Treasury, and Mr. Pitt, Secretary of State. This administration lasted till the month of April, 1757. Byng's court-martial began to sit on the 28th of December, 1756. He was shot on the 14th March, 1757. There is something at once diverting and provoking in the cool and authoritative manner in which Mr. Croker makes these random assertions.

him? Mr. Croker says ay—the Reviewer says no. Byng's action was in May, 1756, at which time the Duke of Newcastle was Minister, and Mr. Pitt and Lord Temple in violent opposition; and when the account of the action arrived in England, the Ministers—(see Campbell's Lives of the Admirals)—the Ministers determined to turn, if possible, the popular clamour and indignation from themselves, upon the Admiral. And, again, the hired writers in the pay of the Ministry were set to work to censure his conduct in the most violent and inflammatory manner. And, again, the popular clamour and indignation were so extremely violent that Ministers were under the necessity of making known their intention to try Byng, in a singular, unprecedented, and not very decorous or fair manner. Orders were sent to all the outports to put him on his arrival, into close arrest. The facts seem to have been, that Ministers had roused the public to such a state of irritation, that it would be directed against themselves, unless they proceeded against Byng in the most rigorous manner. On the 26th July, Byng arrived at Portsmouth, and was committed to close custody, and removed thence to Greenwich, where he was to remain till his trial, and where he was guarded, as if he had been guilty of the most heinous crimes. The part of the hospital in which he was confined was most scrupulously and carefully fortified; and what marked most decidedly the feeling of the Ministers, they took care that all these precautions should be made known.

In short, if we are to believe the writers of the day, and above all, Byng's own friends and advocates, the Ministers had already condemned him, and had predestined him to execution to save themselves. 'The Ministers,' says Charnock (Naval Biog., vol. iv. p. 159), 'treated him like a criminal already condemned.'

The resolution to try Byng was, as I have thus shown, taken at least as early as July; but the absence of witnesses, and other formalities, delayed the actual assembling the court-martial for some months, during which the controversy between the partisans of Byng, and those of the Ministry, was maintained with the greatest rancour and animosity. In these circumstances, and while Byng was on the brink of his trial, about the 20th November, 1756, his inveterate enemies, the Ministers, resigned, and a total change of administration took place. The new administration, however, resolved to execute the intentions of the former—the proceedings instituted against Byng by the Duke of Newcastle's administration were followed up by Mr. Pitt's; and the imprisonment of Byng, which was ordered by Lord Anson, was terminated by his execution, the warrant for which was signed by Lord Temple, six months after! Now, if Mr. Croker had been writing history, or even a review, he probably might not have said that 'the change of Ministers took place between the condemnation and death,' if by condemnation the actual sentence of the court were to be understood. Certainly the actual trial happened to be held a few days after the accession of the new Ministry, but the prosecution—the alleged persecution—the official condemnation—the indictment, if I may borrow the common-law expression—the collection of the evidence in support of it—and every step preparatory to the actual swearing of the court, were all perpetrated under the auspices of the old Ministry. The new Ministry had no real share nor responsibility in the transaction till after the sentence was pronounced, and then (without, as it would seem, any hesitation on their part, though delays from other causes arose) they executed the sentence.

After this, nobody can have any doubt in deciding which speaks the historic truth—he, certainly, who represents one set of Ministers as conducting the prosecution, and the other as ordering the execution.

Is the editor of the Life of Johnson, or the Edinburgh Reviewer, 'scandalously inaccurate'? The truth seems to be, that the Reviewer knew nothing more of the history of the transaction than its dates—the skeleton of history; and because he saw in some chronological work that Mr. Pitt became Minister some days before the court-martial upon Byng was opened, he imagined that Mr. Pitt's Ministry were the responsible prosecutors in that court-martial. Mr. Croker, on this occasion, as on many others, has looked to the spirit of the proceeding, as well as the letter—to the design as well as the date—and has contributed to trace historic truth by the motives and causes of events, rather than by the day of the month on which the event happens to explode.—His justification and the refutation of his Reviewer are complete!
But we must proceed. These volumes contain mistakes more gross, if possible, than any that we have yet mentioned. Boswell has recorded some observations made by Johnson on the changes which took place in Gibbon’s religious opinions. “It is said,” cried the Doctor, laughing, “that he has been a Mahometan.” This sarcasm,” says the editor, “probably alludes to the tenderness with which Gibbon’s malevolence to Christi-anity induced him to treat Mahometanism in his history.” Now, the sarcasm was uttered in 1776; and that part of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire which relates to Mahometanism was not published till 1788, twelve years after the date of this conversation, and nearly four years after the death of Johnson.

It was in the year 1761,” says Mr. Croker, “that Goldsmith published his Vicar of Wakefield. This leads the editor to observe a more serious inaccuracy of Mrs. Piozzi than Mr. Boswell notices, when he says Johnson left her table to go and sell the Vicar of Wakefield for Goldsmith. Now, Dr. Johnson was not acquainted with the Thrales till 1765, four years after the book had been published.” Mr. Croker, here again the Reviewer, in attempting to correct a verbal inaccuracy, displays the error or the ignorance’ of which he unjustly accuses Mr. Croker. It would, indeed, have been more accurate if Mr. Croker had said that Goldsmith had, in 1761, sold the work to the publisher, for it was not actually published to the world till after the Traveller; but the fact as to the publication has nothing to do with the point in question, which is the time when

What! does the Reviewer doubt that Mr. Croker is right, and that Gibbon was the person intended?

Certainly not. He adopts, without acknowledgment, Mr. Croker’s interpretation, but then turns round and says, ‘You have given a bad reason for a just conclusion.’ Then why does the Reviewer not give a better, and explain why he adopts Mr. Croker’s opinion, if he is not satisfied with Mr. Croker’s reason? The fact is, the poor creature is at his skeleton work again. He found that the origin of Mahometanism, which sprung up about the year 600, could not be chronologically included in the first volume of Gibbon, which ends about the year 300. And he kindly informs Mr. Croker that Gibbon’s account of Mahometanism was not published till after Johnson’s death; but the Reviewer chooses to forget that, in every page of his first volume as of his last, Gibbon takes or makes opportunities of sneering at and deprecating Christianity; while, on the other hand, he shows everywhere remarkable ‘tenderness’ for Paganism and Mahometanism.

These insinuations and innuendos are to be found all through the work, and are indeed the great peculiarity of his style.

It is evident, too, from the concluding part of Mr. Croker’s note, which the Reviewer has suppressed, that this was his meaning; for Mr. Croker adds, ‘something of this sort must have been in Johnson’s mind on this occasion.’ If Mr. Croker had meant to allude to the professed history of Mahometanism, published in Gibbon’s latter volumes, he could not have spoken dubiously about it, as ‘something of this sort,’ for there the bias is clear and certain. It is therefore evident that Mr. Croker meant to allude to Gibbon’s numerous insinuations against Christianity in the first volumes; and if Johnson did not mean ‘something of this sort,’ I wish the Reviewer would tell us what he meant.
Review.

in repreacking the fancied inaccuracy of Mrs. Thrale, has himself shown a degree of inaccuracy, or, to speak more properly, a degree of ignorance, hardly credible. The Traveller was not published till 1765; and it is a fact as notorious as any in literary history, that the Vicar of Wakefield, though written before the Traveller, was published after it. It is a fact which Mr. Croker may find in any common Life of Goldsmith; in that written by Mr. Chalmers, for example. It is a fact which, as Boswell tells us, was distinctly stated by Johnson, in a conversation with Sir Joshua Reynolds. It is, therefore, quite possible and probable, that the celebrated scene of the landlady, the sheriff’s-officer, and the bottle of Madeira, may have taken place in 1765. Now, Mrs. Thrale expressly says that it was near the beginning of her acquaintance with Johnson, in 1765, or, at all events, not later than 1766, that he left her table to succour his friend. Her accuracy is therefore completely vindicated.'

Goldsmith sold the work, and whether Johnson could have left Thrale’s table to sell it for him,—in other words, whether the sale took place prior to 1765. Mr. Croker again says ay—the Reviewer says no—and the Reviewer is again decidedly in the wrong, and Mr. Croker is clearly right, according to the very authority to which the Reviewer refers us. Chalmers tells us, indeed, that the novel was published after the poem; but he also tells us, to the utter discomfort of the Reviewer, that ‘the novel was sold, and the money paid for it, some time before!’ So that the sale took place, even according to the Reviewer’s own admission, before 1765. The Reviewer states that the Traveller was not published till 1765; but even in this fact he is wrong. The Traveller was published in 1764; and if he will open the Gentleman’s Magazine for 1764, he will find extracts in it from that poem. This fact corroborates Mr. Croker’s inference; Mrs. Piozzi had said that ‘Johnson was called away from her table either in 1765 or 1766, to sell the novel.’ Mr. Croker says this must be inaccurate, because the book was sold long before that date. Now it is proved that it was sold before the publication of the Traveller, and it is also proved that the Traveller was published in 1764; and, finally, the Reviewer’s assertion, that ‘it is quite possible and probable that the sale took place in 1765,’ is thus shown to be a monstrous blunder.

The very page which contains this monstrous blunder contains another blunder, if possible, more monstrous still. Sir Joseph Mawbey, a foolish member of Parliament, at whose speeches and whose piggies the wits of Brookes’s were, fifty years ago, in the habit of laughing most unmerrily, stated, on the authority of Garrick, that Johnson, while sitting in a coffee-house at Oxford, about the time of his doctor’s degree, used some contemptuous expressions respecting Home’s play and Macpherson’s Ossian. ‘Many men,’ he said, ‘many women, and many children, might have written Douglas,’ Mr. Croker conceives that he has detected an inaccuracy, and glories over poor Sir Joseph in a most characteristic manner. ‘I have quoted this anecdote solely with the view of showing how little credit hearsay anecdotes are in general entitled. Here is Now, this is a tissue of misrepresentation. The words ‘about the time of his doctor’s degree,’ which the Reviewer attributes to Mr. Croker, are Sir Joseph Mawbey’s own, and distinguished by Mr. Croker with marks of quotation (omitted by the Reviewer) to call the reader’s attention to the mistake which Mr. Croker supposes Sir Joseph to have made as to the date of the anecdote.

But, says the Reviewer, ‘Mr. Croker has missed the only real objection to the story, namely, that Johnson had used, as early as 1763, respecting Ossian, the same expressions which Sir Joseph represents him as having used respecting Douglas.’ This is really too bad—the Reviewer says that Mr. Croker has missed, because he himself has chosen to suppress. Mr. Croker’s note distinctly states the very fact which he is accused of missing! ‘Every one knows,’ says Mr. Croker, ‘that Dr. John-

MR. CROKER’S EDITION OF BOSWELL. xxv

"A story published by Sir Joseph Maw-
"ley, a member of the House of Com"mons, and a person every way worthy "of credit, who says he had it from "Garrick. Now mark:—Johnson's visit "to Oxford, about the time of his doctor's "degree, was in 1754, the first time he "had been there since he left the univer"sity. But Douglas was not acted till "1756, and Ossian not published till "1760. All, therefore, that is new in
""Sir Joseph Mawbey's story is false."

Assuredly we need not go far to find ample proof that a member of the House of Commons may commit a very gross error. Now mark, say we, in the language of Mr. Croker. The fact is, that Johnson took his Master's degree in 1754, and his Doctor's degree in 1775. In the spring of 1776 he paid a visit to Oxford, and at this visit a conversation respecting the works of Home and Macpherson might have taken place, and, in all probability, did take place. The only real objection to the story Mr. Croker has missed. Boswell states, apparently on the best autho-ry, that as early at least as the year 1763, Johnson, in conversation with Blair, used the same expressions respecting Ossian—which Sir Joseph represents him as having used respecting Douglas.
Sir Joseph, or Garrick, confounded, we suspect, the two stories. But their error is venial, compared with that of Mr.
Croker."

"Boswell has preserved a poor epigram by Johnson, inscribed "ad Lauram parituram." Mr. Croker censures the poet for applying the word puella to a lady in Laura's situation, and for talking of the beauty of Lucina. "Lucina," he says,
"was never famed for her beauty." If Sir Robert Peel had seen this note, he possibly would again have refuted Mr.
Croker's criticisms by an appeal to Horace. In the secular ode, Lucina is used as one of the names of Diana, and the beauty of Diana is extolled by all the most orthodox doctors of ancient mythology, from Homer, in his Odyssey, to Claudian, in his Rape of Proserpine. In another ode, Horace describes Diana as the goddess who assists the "laborantes utero puellas.""

Answer.

"Son said of Ossian, that "many men, many women, and many children, might have written it;" and Mr. Croker concludes by inferring exactly what the Reviewer himself does, that Sir Joseph Mawbe was inaccurate in thus applying to Douglas what had been really said of Ossian!

But the Reviewer, in addition to suppressing Mr. Croker's statement, blunders his own facts; for he tells us that Johnson's visit to Oxford, about the time of his doctor's degree, was in the spring of 1776. I beg to inform him it was in the latter end of May, 1775. (See Boswell,
v. iii. p. 254.) The matter is of no mo-moment at all, but shows that the Reviewer falls into the very inaccuracies for which he arraigns Mr. Croker, and which he politely calls in this very instance "scandalous!"

Euge! by this rule the Reviewer would prove that Hecate was famed for her beauty, for Hecate is one of the names of Diana, and the beauty of Diana," and, consequently, of Hecate, is extolled by all the most orthodox doctors of heathen mythology. Mr. Croker does not, as the Reviewer says he does, censure the poet for the application of the word puella to a lady in Laura's situation; but he says that the designation in the first line—which was proposed as a thesis—of the lady as pulcherrima puella, would lead us to expect anything rather than the turn which the latter lines of the epigram take, of representing her as about to lie-in. It needs not the authority either of Horace or the Reviewer to prove that 'puella' will sometimes be found 'laborantes utero.'
But it will take more than the authority of the Reviewer to persuade me that Mr.
Croker was wrong in saying that it seems a very strange mode of complimenting an English beauty.
Review.

Johnson found in the library of a French lady, whom he visited during his short visit to Paris, some works which he regarded with great disdain. "I looked," says he, "into the books in the lady's closet, and, in contempt, showed them to Mr. Thrale. Prince Titi—Bibliothèque des Fées—and other books." "The History of Prince Titi," observes Mr. Croker, "was said to be the autobiography of Frederick Prince of Wales, but was probably written by Ralph his secretary." A more absurd note never was penned. The History of Prince Titi, to which Mr. Croker refers, whether written by Prince Frederick or by Ralph, was certainly never published. If Mr. Croker had taken the trouble to read with attention the very passage in Park's Royal and Noble Authors, which he cites as his authority, he would have seen that the manuscript was given up to the government.

Even if this memoir had been printed, it was not very likely to find its way into a French lady's bookcase. And would any man in his senses speak contemptuously of a French lady for having in her possession an English work so curious and interesting as a Life of Prince Frederick, whether written by himself or by a confidential secretary, must have been?

The history at which Johnson laughed was a very proper companion to the Bibliothèque des Fées—a fairy tale about good Prince Titi, and naughty Prince Violent. Mr. Croker may find it in the Magasin des Enfans, the first French book which the little girls of England read to their governesses.

Answer.

Here is a pretty round assertion of a matter of fact. 'The History of Prince Titi, whether written by Prince Frederick or Ralph, was certainly never published.' Now, unfortunately for this learned Reviewer, we have at this moment on our table the Histoire du Prince Titi. A(legend) R(oyale).

Paris chez la Veuve Oissot, Quai de Conti à la Croix d'Or.

And not only was it thus published in Paris, but it was translated into English, and republished in London, under the title of The History of Prince Titi, A Royal Allegory. Translated by a Lady.

What say you to that, Mr. Reviewer? Is not this, to say the least of it, a scandalous inaccuracy, and is not he who falls into such a mistake as this entitled to no confidence whatever?

But "if it had been printed, it was not likely to have found its way into the French lady's bookcase." Why not?—it was written in French, printed in Paris, a very neat little volume, and is, moreover, just such a piece of fashionable secret history as would be sure to find its way to a French lady's bookcase.

But the real fairy tale would have been a very proper companion to the Bibliothèque des Fées. Indeed! Pray has the Reviewer, then, ever seen that fairy tale in a separate volume? He seems to imply that it has been so published; and yet in the next sentence he tells us it is to be found in the Magasin des Enfans. But even here he is mistaken. The old fairy tale of Prince Titi is not to be found in the 'Magasin des Enfans,' but a rifacimento of it, and Madame de Beaumont was even blamed by some critics for having spoiled the old story by her modern version.

We have no doubt in the world that Mr. Croker is quite right that the Royal Allegory of Prince Trri (the only volume with that title which we ever heard of) was on the lady's table, perhaps laid there purposely, in the expectation that her English visitors would think it a literary curiosity, which, indeed, it has proved to be; for Dr. Johnson seems not to have known what it was, and the Edinburgh Reviewer had never seen it, and, even now, so obstinately disbelieves the fact, that he ungratefully calls his informant very hard names.

We add, as a point of literary history connected with this curious little volume, that it is possible that Ralph may have been preparing a continuation of it, which has been suppressed; but it is hardly possible that he could have had any share in the composition of the original volume, which was written before Ralph was in the Prince's confidence.

The question is not here about classical Greek, but what Johnson meant by the cipher θ φ. Mr. Croker's solution is not only ingenious, but, we think, absolutely certain: it means "departed friends," beyond all doubt. See, in Dr. Strahan's book, under 'Easter Sunday, 1781,' an instance of the same kind—"I commenced (in prayer) my Θ friends." The Reviewer, with notable caution, omits to tell us which of the derivatives of θεῖος and θεῖκας he would have chosen; but we think with Mr. Croker that none was more likely to have occurred to Johnson's mind than θεῖος, because it is good Greek, and is moreover a word which we find him quoting on another occasion, in which he deplores the loss of a friend. Good Greek, we say, in defiance of the menaced flogging; for we have authority that we suppose even the Reviewer may bow to.

What does the Reviewer think of the well-known passage in the Supplices of Euripides, cited even in Hederic?

'Βάθι, καλ ἀνοίγειν—
Τέκνων τε θεῖον κλίματι δίμας.'—v. 275.

where Τέκνων θεῖον is used in the same sense as Τέκνων θεῖων, v. 12 and 85;
Mr. Croker has also given us a specimen of his skill in translating Latin. Johnson wrote a note in which he consulted his friend, Dr. Lawrence, on the propriety of losing some blood. The note contains these words:—“Si per te licet, imperatur nuncio Holderum ad me demueere.” Johnson should rather have written “imperatim est.” But the meaning of the words is perfectly clear. “If ‘you say yes, the messenger has orders ‘to bring Holder to me.’ Mr. Croker translates the words as follows: “If you ‘consent, pray tell the messenger to bring ‘Holder to me.” If Mr. Croker is resolved to write on points of classical learning, we would advise him to begin by giving an hour every morning to our old friend Corderius.”

This is excellent! The Reviewer tells us that Johnson’s Latin is incorrect, and then blames Mr. Croker for not having correctly translated that which the Reviewer thinks himself obliged to alter, in order to make it intelligible.

Mr. Croker probably saw, as well as the Reviewer, that the phrase was inaccurate; but, instead of clumsily changing imperatur into imperatum est, (which, with all deference to the Reviewer, is much worse than the original,) he naturally supposes that imperatur, the indicative mood, is merely the transcriber’s error of a single letter for either the imperative or the conditional moods, and translates it accordingly, without thinking it necessary to blazon the exploit in a long explanation,—

We venture to surmise, that, if Johnson’s original note be in existence, it will be found that he wrote the word as Mr. Croker has translated it, and has therefore not deserved the ignominy of having his Latin corrected by an Edinburgh Reviewer; though, to be sure, that is no great insult, seeing that these omniscients appear inclined to correct the Greek of Euripides.*

I have thus shown that he has charged Mr. Croker—in some instances ignorantly, and in others falsely—with ignorance and falsehood; and such being the Reviewer’s own sins in the course of half a sheet of the Blue and Yellow, manifestly got up with much assiduity, (for he quotes, I perceive, from all the five volumes,) is it not contemptible to hear his chuckle over Mr. Croker, who, in the course of between two and three thousand additions to Boswell, has been shown to have fallen, perhaps, into some half-dozen errors or inaccuracies, one of them evidently a misprint—one an expression apparently incorrect, because elliptical, and the others—

† The whole of the passages objected to by the Reviewer are about 26; viz. 17 as to dates or facts, 11 as to literature and criticism. We have noticed 18 or 19 of the most considerable of both classes, and the reader may judge for himself as to the importance and value of the 28 questions raised by the Reviewer upon the 2860 notes of Mr. Croker.
Mr. Croker has been convicted of the 'gross and scandalous' inaccuracy of having assigned wrong dates to the deaths of Derrick, Sir Herbert Croft, and the amiable Sir William Forbes, biographer of Beattie.* He has, moreover, attributed to Henry Bate Dudley, the Fighting Parson, the Editorship of the old Morning Herald, instead of the old Morning Post; and he has erroneously said that Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga took place in March, 1778, instead of October, 1777. He is mistaken, too, in saying that Lord Townshend was not Secretary of State till 1720,† the perpetration of which has so incensed the immaculate and infallible Reviewer, that he has not scrupled to assert that the whole of Mr. Croker's part of the work is ill compiled, ill arranged, ill expressed, and ill printed.

* These and several similar errors are probably errors of the press, as 1759 for 1769—1806 for 1816: every one knows how frequently 0 and 9—0 and 1—3 and 2—are confounded in the press.
† For he had been Secretary in 1714, and was a second time called to office in 1720.

"Mr. Macaulay has republished from the Edinburgh Review his slashing article on Mr. Croker's edition of Boswell's Johnson, repeating in a text of to-day accusations which were refuted long ago, and charges which, if ever true, are not true now, as Mr. Macaulay knows. Everybody is aware that the article was originally levelled less against Mr. Croker the editor than Mr. Croker the politician, and the abuse which may have been relished in times of hot passion and party vindictiveness, reads in our calmer days as so much bad taste and bad feeling. Mr. Croker's 'Johnson,' as it stands in recent editions, is a valuable and ably-edited book."

CHAPTER I.

Introduction.—Johnson's Birth and Parentage.—He inherits from his Father "a vile melancholy."—His Account of the Members of his Family.—Traditional Stories of his Precoce.—Taken to London to be touched by Queen Anne for the Seroquina.

To write the life of him who excelled all mankind in writing the lives of others, and who, whether we consider his extraordinary endowments, or his various works, has been equalled by few in any age, is an arduous task. Had Dr. Johnson written his own Life, in conformity with the opinion which he has given, that every man's life may be best written by himself, 1 had he employed in the preservation of his own history, that clearness of narration and elegance of language in which he has embalmed so many eminent persons, the world would probably have had the most perfect example of biography that was ever exhibited. But although he at different times, in a desultory manner, committed to writing many particulars of the progress of his mind and fortunes, he never had persevering diligence enough to form them into a regular composition. Of these memorials a few have been preserved; but the greater part was consigned by him to the flames, a few days before his death.

As I had the honour and happiness of enjoying his friendship for upwards of twenty years; as I had the scheme of writing his life constantly in view; as he was well apprised of this circumstance, and from time to time obligingly satisfied my inquiries, by communicating to me the incidents of his early years; as I acquired a facility in recollecting, and was very assiduous in recording his conversation, of which the extraordinary vigour and vivacity constituted one of the first features of his character; and as I have spared no pains in obtaining materials concerning him, from every quarter where I could discover that they were to be found, and have been favoured with the most liberal communications by his friends; I flatter myself that few biographers have entered upon such a work as this, with more advantages; independent of literary abilities, in which I am not vain enough to compare myself with some great names who have gone before me in this kind of writing.

Since my work was announced, several Lives and Memoirs of Dr. Johnson have been published, the most voluminous of which is one compiled for the booksellers of London, by Sir John Hawkins, Knight, 2 a man whom, during my long intimacy with Dr. Johnson, I never saw in his company, I think, but once, and I am sure not above twice. Johnson might have esteemed him for his decent religious demeanour, and his knowledge of books and literary history; but, from the rigid formality of his manners, it is evident that they never could have lived together with companionable ease and familiarity; nor had Sir John Hawkins that nice perception which was necessary to mark the finer and less obvious parts of Johnson's character. His being appointed one of his executors gave him an opportunity of taking possession of such fragments of a diary and other papers as were left; of which, before delivering them up to the residuary legatee, whose property they were, he endeavoured to extract the substance. In this he has not been very successful, as I have found upon a perusal of those papers, which have been since transferred to me. Sir John Hawkins's ponderous labours, I must acknowledge, exhibit a farrago, of which a considerable portion is not devoid of entertainment to the lovers of literary gossiping; but besides its being swelled out with long unnecessary extracts from various works, (even one of several

2 The greatest part of this book was written while Sir John Hawkins was alive; and I avow, that one object of my strictures was to make him feel some compunction for his illiberal treatment of Dr. Johnson. Since his decease, I have suppressed several of my remarks upon his work. But though I would not "war with the dead" offensively, I think it necessary to be strenuous in defence of my illustrious friend, which I cannot be, without strong animadversions upon a writer who has greatly injured him. Let me add, that though I doubt I should not have been very prompt to gratify Sir John Hawkins with any compliment in his lifetime, I do now frankly acknowledge, that, in my opinion, his volume, however inadequate and improper as a life of Dr. Johnson, and however discredited by unpardonable inaccuracies in other respects, contains a collection of curious anecdotes and observations, which few men but its author could have brought together.—Boswell. I will here observe, once for all, that Mr. Boswell is habitually unjust to Sir J. Hawkins, whose Life leaves from Osborne's Harleian Catalogue, and those not compiled by Johnson, but by Oldys,) a very small part of it relates to the person who is the subject of the book; and, in that, there is such an inaccuracy in the statement of facts, as in so solemn an author is hardly excusable, and certainly makes his narrative very unsatisfactory. But what is still worse, there is throughout the whole of it a dark uncharitable cast, by which the most unfavourable construction is put upon almost every circumstance in the character and conduct of my illustrious friend; who, I trust, will, by a true and fair delineation, be vindicated both from the injurious misrepresentations of this author, and from the slighter aspersions of a lady who once lived in great intimacy with him.

There is, in the British Museum, a letter from Bishop Warburton to Dr. Birch, on the subject of 'biography,' which, though I am aware it may expose me to a charge of artfully raising the value of my own work, by contrasting it with that of which I have spoken, is so well conceived and expressed, that I cannot refrain from here inserting it:—

"I shall endeavour," says Dr. Warburton, "to give you what satisfaction I can in any thing you want to be satisfied in any subject of Milton, and am extremely glad you intend to write his life. Almost all the life-writers we have had before Toland and Dennaux are indeed strange insipid creatures; and yet I had rather read the worst of them, than be obliged to go through with this of Milton's, or the other's life of Boileau, where there is such a dull, heavy succession of long quotations of disinteresting passages, that it makes their method quite nauseous. But the verbose, tasteless Frenchman seems to lay it down as a principle, that every life must be a book, and, what's worse, it proves a book without a life; for what do we know of Boileau, after all his tedious stuff? You are the only one (and I speak it without a compliment) that by the vigour of your style and sentiments, and the real importance of your materials, have the art (which one would imagine no one could have missed) of adding agreements to the most agreeable subject in the world, which is literary history. — Nov. 24. 1737."¹

Instead of melting down my materials into one mass, and constantly speaking in my own person, by which I might have appeared to have more merit in the execution of the work, I have resolved to adopt and enlarge upon the excellent plan of Mr. Mason, in his Memoirs of Gray. Wherever narrative is necessary to explain, connect, and supply, I furnish it to the best of my abilities; but in the chronological series of Johnson's life, which I trace as distinctly as I can, year by year, I produce, wherever it is in my power, his own minutes, letters, or conversation, being convinced that this mode is more lively, and will make my readers better acquainted with him, than even most of those who actually knew him — but could know him only partially; whereas there is here an accumulation of intelligence from various points, by which his character is more fully understood and illustrated.

Indeed, I cannot conceive a more perfect mode of writing any man's life, than not only relating all the most important events of it in their order, but interweaving what he privately wrote, and said, and thought; by which mankind are enabled as it were to see him live, and to "live o'er each scene" with him, as he actually advanced through the several stages of his life. Had his other friends been as diligent and ardent as I was, he might have been almost entirely preserved. As it is, I will venture to say, that he will be seen in this work more completely than any man who has ever yet lived.

And he will be seen as he really was; for I profess to write not his panegyric, which must be all praise, but his life; which, great and good as he was, must not be supposed to be entirely perfect. To be as he was, is indeed subject of panegyric enough to any man in this state of being; but in every picture there should be shade as well as light; and when I delineate him without reserve, I do what he himself recommended, both by his precept and his example:—

"If the biographer writes from personal knowledge, and makes haste to gratify the public curiosity, there is danger lest his interest, his fear, his gratitude, or his tenderness, overpower his fidelity, and tempt him to conceal, if not to invent. There are many who think it an act of piety to hide the faults or failings of their friends, even when they can no longer suffer by their detection; we therefore see whole ranks of characters adorned with uniform panegyric, and not to be known from one another but by extrinsic and casual circumstances. 'Let me remember,' says Hale, 'when I find myself inclined to pity a criminal, that there is likewise a pity due to the country.' If we owe regard to the memory of the dead, there is yet more respect to be paid to knowledge, to virtue, and to truth."—Rambler, No. 60.

What I consider as the peculiar value of the following work, is the quantity it contains of Johnson's Conversation; which is universally acknowledged to have been eminently instructive and entertaining; and of which the specimens that I have given upon a former occasion² have been received with so much approbation, that I have good grounds for supposing that the world will not be indifferent to more ample communications of a similar nature.

² In this "Journal of a Tour in the Hebrides," separately published in 1785, but which I have incorporated under his proper date in the general "Life of Johnson."—Croker.
That the conversation of a celebrated man, if his talents have been exerted in conversation, will best display his character, is, I trust, too well established in the judgment of mankind, to be at all shaken by a sneering observation of Mr. Mason, in his Memoirs of Mr. William Whitehead, in which there is literally no Life, but a mere dry narrative of facts. I do not think it was quite necessary to attempt a depreciation of what is universally esteemed, because it was not to be found in the immediate object of the ingenious writer’s pen; for, in truth, from a man so still and so tame as to be contented to pass many years as the domestic companion of a superannuated lord and lady, conversation could no more be expected, than from a Chinese mandarin on a chimney-piece, or the fantastic figures on a gilt leather screen.

If authority be required, let us appeal to Plutarch, the prince of ancient biographers:

"Orate sunt quae in ipsius annos praebent partes, nullaque, quin etiam ex ejus amore quisque potestiam, etiam, cum idem et ipsis verborum ipse, etiam maiorem nullum et magnum manum, et magnum retinentem, pastasque nunc qui nunc, et pulchrum pulchrumque inactavisse; "Nor is it always in the most distinguished achievements that men’s virtues or vices may be best discerned; but very often an action of small note, a short saying, or a jest, shall distinguish a person’s real character more than the greatest sieges, or the most important battles."

To this may be added the sentiments of the very man whose life I am about to exhibit:

"The business of the biographer is often to pass slightly over those performances and incidents which produce vulgar greatness, to lead the thoughts into domestic privacies, and display the minute details of exterior aspects of his mind, cast aside, and men excelled each other only by prudence and by virtue. The account of Thamus is, with great propriety, said by its author to have been written, that it might lay open to posterity the private and familiar character of that man, ejus ingenium et condorem ex ipso scriptis sunt oliv semper miraturi,—whose candour and genius will, to the end of time, be by his writings preserved in admiration.

"There are many invisible circumstances, which, whether we read as enquirers after natural or moral knowledge, whether we intend to enlarge our science or increase our virtue, are more important than public occurrences. Thus, Solinus, the great master of nature, has not forgot, in his account of Caiusine, to remark, that his walk was now quick, and again slow, as an indication of a mind revolving with violent commotion. Thus the story of Molochetion affords a striking lecture on the value of time, by informing us, that when he had made an appointment, he expected not only the hour, but the minute to be fixed, that the day might not run out in the idleness of suspense; and all the plans and enterprizes of De Witt are now of less importance to the world, than that part of his personal character, which represents him as careful of his health, and negligent of his life.

"But biography has often been allotted to writers who seem very little acquainted with the nature of their task, or very negligent about the performance. They rarely afford any other account than might be collected from public papers, but imagine themselves writing a life, when they exhibit a chronological series of actions or preferments; and have so little regard to the manners or behaviour of their heroes, that more knowledge may be gained of a man’s real character by a short conversation with one of his servants, than from a formal and studied narrative, begun with his pedigree, and ended with his funeral.

"There are, indeed, some natural reasons why these narratives are often written by such as were not likely to give much instruction or delight, and why most accounts of particular persons are barren and useless. If a life be delayed till interest and envy are at an end, we may hope for impartiality, but must expect little intelligence; for the incidents which give excellence to biography are of a volatile and evanescent kind, such as soon escape the memory, and are rarely transmitted by tradition. We know how few can pourtray a living acquaintance, except by his most prominent and observable particulars, and the grosser features of his mind, and it may be easily imagined how much of this little knowledge may be lost in imparting it, and how soon a succession of copies will lose all resemblance of the original." [Rambler, No. 60.]

I am fully aware of the objections which may be made to the minuteness, on some occasions, of my detail of Johnson’s conversation, and how happily it is adapted for the petty exercise of ridicule, by men of superficial understanding, and ludicrous fancy; but I remain firm and confident in my opinion, that minute particulars are frequently characteristic, and always amusing, when they relate to a distinguished man. I am therefore exceedingly unwilling that any thing, however slight, which my illustrious friend thought it worth his while to express, with any degree of point, should perish. For this almost superstitious reverence, I have found very old and venerable authority, quoted by our great modern prelate, Seeker, in whose tenth sermon there is the following passage:

"Rabbi David Kimchi, a noted Jewish commentator, who lived about five hundred years ago, explains that passage in the first psalm, ‘His leaf also shall not wither,’ from rabbins yet older than himself, thus: — That ‘even the idle talk,’ so he expresses it, ‘of a good man ought to be regarded;’ the most superfluous things, he saith, are always of some value. And other ancient authors have the same phrase nearly in the same sense."

Of one thing I am certain, that, considering how highly the small portion which we have of the table-talk, and other anecdotes, of our celebrated writers is valued, and how earnestly it is regretted that we have not more, I am justified in preserving rather too many of Johnson's sayings, than too few; especially as, from the diversity of dispositions, it cannot be known with certainty beforehand, whether what may seem trifling to some, perhaps to the collector himself, may not be most agreeable to many; and the greater number of an author that can please in any degree, the more pleasure does there arise to a benevolent mind.

To those who are weak enough to think this a degrading task, and the time and labour which have been devoted to it misemployed, I shall content myself with opposing the authority of the greatest man of any age, Julius Cæsar, of whom Bacon observes, that "in his book of apophthegms which he collected, we see that he esteemed it more honour to make himself but a pair of tables, to take the wise and pithy words of others, than to have every word of his own to be made an apophthegm or an oracle." [Advancement of Learning, Book I.]

Having said thus much by way of Introduction, I commit the following pages to the censure of the public.

Samuel Johnson was born at Lichfield, in Staffordshire, on the 18th of September, N.S. 1709; and his initiation into the Christian church was not delayed; for his baptism is recorded, in the register of St. Mary's parish in that city, to have been performed on the day of his birth: his father is there styled Gentleman, a circumstance which an ignorant pamphlist would probably find pleasant; but the true reason why, the truth is, that the appellation of Gentleman, though now lost in the indiscriminate assumption of Esquire, was commonly taken by those who could not boast of gentility.² His father was Michael Johnson, a native of Derbyshire, of obscure extraction, who settled in Lichfield as a bookseller and stationer. His mother was Sarah Ford, descended of an ancient race of substantial yeomanry in Warwickshire. They were well advanced in years when they married, and never had more than two children, both sons; Samuel, their first-born, who lived to be the illustrious character whose various excellence I am to endeavour to record, and Nathanael, who died in his twenty-fifth year.

Mr. Michael Johnson was a man of a large and robust body, and of a strong and active mind; yet, as in the most solid rocks veins of unsond substance are often discovered, there was in him a mixture of that disease, the nature of which eludes the most minute enquiry, though the effects are well known to be a weariness of life, and unconcern about those things which agitate the greater part of mankind, and a general sensation of gloomy wretchedness. From him, then, his son inherited, with some other qualities, "a vile melancholy"³

1 He derived, no doubt, his christian name from his godfather, Doctor Samuel Swinfen, a gentleman of landed property in the neighbourhood of Lichfield, who happened to reside in Michael Johnson's house at the time of the birth of the child, in whose welfare he seems ever after to have taken a lively interest. This, and some other circumstances subsequent to the birth, show, that Michael Johnson was a large young man; he is described in a small volume entitled "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Dr. Johnson," published in 1785, anonymously; but the writer speaks in so flattering a spirit that we are inclined to believe it to be written by Dr. Swinfen, his daughter, Mrs. Desmoulins, and Johnson's early friend, Mr. Elphinstone. Dr. Swinfen took a degree of Doctor of Medicine at Cambridge, in 1715, and obtained considerable eminence in his profession. — Croker.

2 The title Gentleman had still, in 1709, some degree of its original meaning; and as Mr. Johnson served the office of sheriff of Lichfield in that year, he seems to have been in some measure entitled to it. The Doctor, at his entry on the books of Pembroke college, and at his matriculation, designated himself as filius generati. There seems, however, considerable difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory solution as to Michael Johnson's real condition and circumstances. That in the latter years of his life he was poor, is certain; and Dr. Johnson (in the "Account of his early Life," see Appendix, No. 1) not only admits the general fact of poverty, but gives several instances of what may be called indignating; yet, on the other hand, there is evidence that for near fifty years he occupied a respectable rank amongst his fellow-citizens, and appeared in the annals of Lichfield on occasions not bespeaking poverty. In 1707, a subscription for rescuing the cathedral bells was set on foot, headed by the bishop, dean, &c., aided by the neighbouring gentry; Michael Johnson's name stands the highest in the list of contributors: on which occasion his rank was not comparatively contemptible: for no one, except the bishop and dean, gave so much as 12d. Barons and knights gave 100l. or more, and the great body of the contributors gave less than Johnson. (Harwood's Lichfield, p. 69.) In 1704, we find him buried in the cathedral, and placing a marble stone over a young woman in whose fate he was interested. His house, a handsome one, and in one of the best situations in the town, had been sold during his lifetime; and it appears that the rents collected from the house had been added to it, for we find in the books of the corporation the following entry: "1708, July 18. Agreed, that Mr. Michael Johnson, bookseller, have a lease of his encroachment of his house in Sadler's Street, for forty years, at 2s. 6d. per an.*

And this lease, at the expiration of the forty years, was renewed to the Doctor as a mark of the respect of his fellow-citizens. In 1709, Michael Johnson served the office of sheriff of the county of the city of Lichfield. Not is it a predilection from the respectability of a county-town tradesman that he should let part of his house in lodgings to the principal physicians of the city. In 1712, he was elected and honored with the office of bailiff, and in 1725, senior bailiff, or chief magistrate. Thus respected and apparently thriving in Lichfield, the following extract of a letter, from the Rev. Mr. Lord Gower, will show the high estimation in which he was held in the neighbouring country: — "Threnthan, St. Peter's chapel, 1716. Johnson the Librarian here; he propagates learning all over this diocese, and refresheth knowledge to its just height; all the clergy here are his pupils, and all that have from him; Allen cannot make a warrant without his precedent, nor our quondam John Evans draw a recognition sine directione Michaelis." (Gentleman's Magazine, October, 1721.) But on the whole it seems probable that the growing expenses of a family, and losses in trade, had in his latter years reduced Mr. Johnson, from the state of competency which he had before enjoyed, to very narrow circumstances. — Croker.

3 See post, September 16, 1773. — Boswell. Miss Seward who latterly showed a great deal of malevolence towards Johnson, delighted to repeat a story that one of his uncles had suffered the last penalty of the law. "Shortly after Mr. Porter's death, Johnson asked his mother's consent to marry the old widow. After expressing her surprise at a quest so extraordinary — "No, Sam, my willing consent you will never have to so preposterous an union. You are not twenty years old. — 'John,' says she, 'I am sure you know what risks I have taken by this request had never been made to me. Where are your means of subsistence? Porter has died poor, in consequence of his wife's expensive habits. You have great talents, but as yet have turned them into no profitable channel.' "

"Mother, I have not deceived Mrs. Porter: I have told her the whole story. As soon as I got wind of your intentions, I turned my mind to money; and that I have had an uncle hanged." She replied, 'That she valued no one more or less for his descent that she had for the money she had; if she had not had a relation hanged, she had fifty who deserved hanging.' (Seward's Letters, vol. 1, p. 45.) This account was given to Mr. Boswell, who, as Miss Seward could not which, in his too strong expression of any disturbance of the mind, "made him mad all his life, at least not sober." Michael was, however, forced by the narrowness of his circumstances to be very diligent in business, not only in his shop, but by occasionally resorting to several towns in the neighbourhood, some of which were at a considerable distance from Lichfield. At that time booksellers' shops in the provincial towns of England were very rare, so that there was not one even in Birmingham, in which town old Mr. Johnson used to open a shop every market-day. He was a pretty good Latin scholar, and a citizen so creditable as to be made one of the magistrates of Lichfield; and, being a man of good sense, and skill in his trade, he acquired a reasonable share of wealth, of which, however, he afterwards lost the greatest part, by engaging un-successfully in a manufacture of parchment. He was a zealous high-churchman and royalist, and retained his attachment to the unfortunate house of Stuart, though he reconciled himself, by casuistical arguments of expediency and necessity, to take the oaths imposed by the prevailing power.

There is a circumstance in his life somewhat romantic, but so well authenticated, that I shall not omit it. A young woman of Leek, in Staffordshire, while preserved his apprenticeship there, conceived a violent passion for him; and, though it met with no favourable return, followed him to Lichfield, where she took lodgings, having known it of her own knowledge, asked the lady for her authority. Mrs. Seward, in reply, quoted Mrs. Cobb, an old friend of Johnson's, who resided at Lichfield. To her, then, Boswell addressed himself; and, to his equal surprise and satisfaction, was answered that Mrs. Cobb had not only never told such a story, but that she had not even heard of it.

Gent. Mag. vol. 63. p. 1069.) It is painful to have to add, that his strong attachment and affection for her were, after she declined his suit, never forgotten by him; and his story to the last. The report at to the kangling was probably derived from a casual passage in the Rev. Donald M'Gibbon's "Boswell's Bricks." "But whatever the Doctor may intimate about the present scarcity of trees in Scotland, we are much deceived by the account given of the nobility and gentry of that country, which did not find to his cost that a love was not quite such a rarity in his days." (P. 18. ed. 1779.) There seems no reason whatever to believe that any of Dr. Johnson's family were natives of Scotland. —Croker.

1 One of the most curious and important chapters in the history of human mind is still to be written, that of Hereditary Insanity. The symptomatic facts by which the disease might be traced are generally either disregarded from ignorance of their real cause and character, or, when observed, carefully suppressed by domestic or professional delicacy. This is natural, and even laudable; yet there are several important and efficient causes which lead to the utter suppression of this malady, and usually buried by neglect. Morally, we should wish to know, as far as may be permitted to us, the nature of our own intellect, its powers, and its weaknesses — medially, it might be possible, by early and systematic treatment, to avert or mitigate the disease which, there is reason to suppose, is now often unknown or mistaken — legally, it would be desirable to have any additional means of discriminating between guilt and misfortune, and of ascertaining, with more precision, the degree of the community of interest, in such cases of so-called physical errors; — and in the highest and most important of all the springs of human thought or action, it would be desirable to have a criterion of the degree of religious conviction which, with greater certainty, rational faith and judicious piety, from the enthusiastic confidence or the gloomy despondence of disinterested faith, would distinguish the man who has lived not insensitively in society will furnish him with instances to which such considerations as these might have been applied. The life of Doctor Johnson (who was conscious of the disease and of its cause, and of whose blood there remains no one whose feelings can be now offended), they should be kept constantly in view; not merely as a subject of general interest, but as elucidating and explaining many of the errors, peculiarities, and weaknesses of that extraordinary man. —Croker.

2 Johnson, in his Dictionary, defines "excise, a hateful tax, levied upon commodities, and adjudged not by the common judges of property but by those to whom excise is paid," and, in the idler (No. 65), he calls a Commissioner of Excise "one of the lowest of all human beings." This violence of language seems so unreasonable, that I was induced to suspect some cause of personal animosity against this mention of the trade in parchments (an excisable article) afforded a clue, which led to the confirmation of that suspicion. In the records of the Excise Board is to be found the following letter, addressed to the supervisor of excise at Lichfield: — "July 31. 1752. The Commissioners received yours of the 22nd instant, and since the justices would not give judgment against Mr. Michael Johnson, the tanner, notwithstanding the facts, and the recommendation of the Board direct that the next time he offends, you do not lay an information against him, but send an affidavit of the fact, that he may be prosecuted in the Exchequer." — It does not appear whether he was offended again, but here is a sufficient cause of his son's animosity against Commissioners of Excise, and of the allusion in the Dictionary to the special jurisdiction under which that revenue is administered. The register of the justices to convict will appear not unnatural, when it is recollected that Mr. Johnson had, this very year, chief magistrate of the city. — Croker.

3 The romantic part of this story does not seem otherwise authenticated. It is an assertion in the Gentleman's Magazine, vol. 55, p. 106, as it would appear, from the doubtful authority of Miss Seward, that Doctor Johnson had told it. Admitting that it is true, it is to be observed that the fact happened fifteen years before he returned; and his father may be excused if he gave to his wife and son a romantic account of an affair of the past. — Croker.

4 He died Sept. 2, 1794, Ed. 85. He was, therefore, about the same age as Johnson. — Croker.
to Thomas Jackson, their man-servant: he not being in the way, this was not done; but there was no occasion for any artificial aid for its preservation.

In following so very eminent a man from his cradle to his grave, every minute particular which can throw light on the progress of his mind is interesting. That he was remarkable, even in his earliest years, may easily be supposed; for, to use his own words in his Life of Sydenham, "That the strength of his understanding, the accuracy of his discernment, and the ardour of his curiosity, might have been remarked from his infancy, by a diligent observer, there is no reason to doubt; for there is no instance of any man, whose history has been minutely related, that did not in every part of life discover the same proportion of intellectual vigour."

In all such investigations it is certainly unwise to pay too much attention to incidents which the credulity relates with eager satisfaction, and the more scrupulous or witty inquirer considers only as topics of ridicule; yet there is a traditional story of the infant Hercules of toryism, so curiously characteristic, that I shall not withhold it. It was communicated to me in a letter from Miss Mary Adye of Lichfield.

When Dr. Sacheverel was at Lichfield, Johnson was not quite three years old. My grandfather Hammond observed him at the cathedral perched upon his father's shoulders, listening and gaping at the much celebrated preacher. Mr. Hammond asked Mr. Johnson how he could possibly think of bringing such an infant to church, and in the midst of so great a crowd. He answered, because it was impossible to keep him at home; for, young as he was, he believed he had caught the public spirit and zeal for Sacheverel, and would have staid for ever in the church, satisfied with beholding him.

Nor can I omit a little instance of that jealous independence of spirit, and impetuousity of temper, which never forsook him. The fact was acknowledged to me by himself, upon the authority of his mother. One day, when the servant who used to be sent to school to conduct him home had not come in time, he set out by himself, though he was then so near-sighted, that he was obliged to stoop down on his hands and knees to take a view of the kennel before he ventured to step over it. His school-mistress, afraid that he might miss his way, or fall into the kennel, or be run over by a cart, followed him at some distance. He happened to turn about and perceive her. Feeding her careful attention as an insult to his manliness, he ran back to her in a rage, and beat her, as well as his strength would permit.

Of the power of his memory, for which he was all his life eminent to a degree almost incredible, the following early instance was told me in his presence at Lichfield, in 1776, by his step-daughter, Mrs. Lucy Porter, as related to her by his mother. When he was a child in petticoats, and had learnt to read, Mrs. Johnson one morning put the common prayer-book into his hands, pointed to the collect for the day, and said, "Sam, you must get this by heart." She went up stairs, leaving him to study it: but by the time she had reached the second floor, she heard him following her. "What's the matter?" said she. "I can say it," he replied; and repeated it distinctly, though he could not have read it more than twice.

But there has been another story of his infant precocity generally circulated, and generally believed, the truth of which I am to refute upon his own authority. It is told that, when a child of three years old, he chanced to tread upon a duckling, the eleventh of a brood, and killed it; upon which, it is said, he dictated to his mother the following epitaph:—

"Here lies good master duck, Whom Samuel Johnson trod on;
If it had lived, it had been good tub,
For then we'd had an odd one."

There is surely internal evidence that this little composition combines in it what no child of three years old could produce, without an extension of its faculties by immediate inspiration; yet Mrs. Lucy Porter, Dr. Johnson's step-daughter, positively maintained to me, in his presence, that there could be no doubt of the truth of this anecdote, for she had heard it from his mother. So difficult is it to obtain an authentic relation of facts, and such authority may there be for error; for he assured me, that his father made the verses, and wished to pass them for his child's. He added, "My father was a foolish old man; that is to say, foolish in talking of his children."

2 The gossiping anecdotes of the Lichfield ladies are all apocryphal. Sacheverel, by his sentence, pronounced in Feb. 1710, was interdicted for three years from preaching; so that he could not have preached at Lichfield while Johnson was under three years of age. Sacheverel, indeed, made a triumphant progress through the midland counties in 1710; and it appears by the books of the corporation of Lichfield, that he was received in that town and complimented by the attendance of the corporation, and a present of three dozen wigs, on the 16th of June, 1710; but then the "infant Hercules of toryism" was just nine months old. —Croker.

Young Johnson had the misfortune to be much afflicted with the scrofula, or king's evil, which disfigured a countenance naturally well formed, and hurt his visual nerves so much, that he did not see at all with one of his eyes, though its appearance was little different from that of the other. There is amongst his prayers, one inscribed "When my eye was restored to its use (P. & M. p. 27.)," which ascertains a defect that many of his friends knew he had, though I never perceived it. 1 I supposed him to be only near-sighted; and indeed I must observe, that in no other respect could I discern any defect in his vision; on the contrary, the force of his attention and perceptive quickness made him see and distinguish all manner of objects, whether of nature or of art, with a nicety that is rarely to be found. When he and I were travelling in the Highlands of Scotland, and I pointed out to him a mountain which I observed resembled a cone, he corrected my inaccuracy, by showing me that it was, indeed, pointed at the top, but that one side of it was larger than the other. And the ladies with whom he was acquainted agreed that no man was more nicely and minutely critical in the elegance of female dress. When I found that he saw the romantic beauties of Islam, in Derbyshire, much better than I did, I told him that he resembled an able performer upon a bad instrument. How false and contemptible, then, are all the remarks which have been made to the prejudice either of his candour or of his philosophy, founded upon a supposition that he was almost blind. It has been said, that he contracted this grievous malady from his nurse. 2 His mother — yielding to the superstitious notion, which, it is wonderful to think, prevailed so long in this country, as to the virtue of the regal touch, a notion which our kings encouraged, and to which a man of such inquiry and such judgment as Carte 3 could give credit — carried him to London, where he was actually touched by Queen Anne. 4 Mrs. Johnson, indeed, as Mr. Hector informed me, acted by the advice of the celebrated Sir John Floyer, then a physician in Lichfield. Johnson used to talk of this very frankly; and Mrs. Piozzi has preserved his very picturesque description of the scene, as it remained upon his fancy. Being asked, if he could remember Queen Anne, — "He had," he said, "a confused, but somehow a sort of solemn recollection of a lady in diamonds, and a long black hood." This touch, however, was without any effect. I ventured to say to him, in allusion to the political principles in which he was educated, and of which he ever retained some colour, that "his mother had not carried him far enough; she should have taken him to Rome."—[to the Pretender].

Johnson at Lichfield School. — Boyish Days. — Removed to Stourbridge. — Specimens of his School Exercises and early Verses. — He leaves Stourbridge, and passes two Years with his Father.

He was first taught to read English by Dame Oliver, a widow, who kept a school for young children in Lichfield. 5 He told me she could read the black letter, and asked him to borrow for her, from his father, a bible in that character. When he was going to Oxford, she came to take leave of him, brought him, in the simplicity of her kindness, a present of gingerbread, and said he was the best scholar she ever had. He delighted in mentioning this early compliment; adding, with a smile, that "this was as high a proof of his merit as he could conceive." His next instructor in English was a master, whom, when he spoke of him to me, he familiarly called Tom Brown, who, said he, "published a spelling-book, and dedicated it to the Universe: but, I fear, no copy of it can now be had."

He began to learn Latin with Mr. Hawkins, usher or under-master of Lichfield school, "a man," said he, "very skilful in his little way." With him he continued two years, and then rose to be under the care of Mr. Hunter, the head master, who, according to his account, "was very severe, and wrongly headed severe. 6 He used," said he, "to beat us unmercifully; and he did not distinguish between ignorance and the work instantly fell into almost total, but certainly undeserved, neglect. — Nicholas Hawkins repeats, after several old writers, that this healing gift was derived to our princes from Edward the Confessor; but the Kings of France claimed the same privilege, which they exercised under this modest formula. — Le roi te touche. Dieu te guerisse. — Croker. 4 1 It appears, by the newspapers of the time, that on the 19th of March, 1712, two hundred persons were touched by Queen Anne. — Wright.

2 She lived in Dam Street, at the north corner of Quorn's Lane. — Harewood. — Croker.

3 "Mr. Hunter was an odd mixture of the pedant and the sportsman; he was a very severe disciplinar and a great setter of game. Happy was the boy who could inform his offended master where a covey of partridges was to be found; this notice was a certain pledge of his pardon." — Davies' Life of Garrick, vol. i. p. 48. He was a prebendary in the Cathedral of Lichfield, and grandfather to Miss Seward. One of this lady's complaints against Johnson was, that he, in all his works, never expressed any gratitude to his preceptor. It does not appear that he owed him much. — Croker.

4 She was a person who, for a good deal of her life, I am told, said she was a pedant, and had no book but a dictionary. — Croker.
and negligence; for he would beat a boy equally for not knowing a thing, as for neglecting to know it. He would ask a boy a question, and if he did not answer it, he would beat him, without considering whether he had an opportunity of knowing how to answer it. For instance, he would call up a boy and ask him Latin for a candlestick, which the boy could not expect to be asked. Now, sir, if a boy could answer every question, there would be no need of a master to teach him."

It is, however, but justice to the memory of Mr. Hunter to mention, that though he might err in being too severe, the school of Lichfield was very respectable in his time. The late Dr. Taylor, prebendary of Westminster, who was educated under him, told me, that "he was an excellent master, and that his ushers were most of them men of eminence; that Holbrook, one of the most ingenious men, best scholars, and best preachers of his age, was usher during the greatest part of the time that Johnson was at school. Then came Hague, of whom as much might be said, with the addition that he was an elegant poet. Hague was succeeded by Green, afterwards bishop of Lincoln, whose character in the learned world is well known. In the same form with Johnson was Congreve, who afterwards became chaplain to Archbishop Boulter, and by that connection obtained good preferment in Ireland. He was a younger son of the ancient family of Congreve, in Staffordshire, of which the poet was a branch. His brother sold the estate. There was also Lowe, afterwards canon of Windsor."

Indeed, Johnson was very sensible how much he owed to Mr. Hunter. Mr. Langton one day asked him, how he had acquired so accurate a knowledge of Latin, in which, I believe, he was exceeded by no man of his time: he said, "My master whipt me very well. Without that, sir, I should have done nothing." He told Mr. Langton, that while Hunter was flogging his boys unmercifully, he used to say, "And this I do to save you from the gallows."

Johnson, upon all occasions, expressed his approbation of enforcing instruction by means of the rod: "I would rather," said he, "have the rod to be the general terror to all, to make them learn, than tell a child, if you do thus or thus, you will be more esteemed than your brothers or sisters. The rod produces an effect which terminates in itself. A child is afraid of being whipped, and gets his task, and there's an end on; whereas, by exciting emulation and comparisons of superiority, you lay the foundation of lasting mischief; you make brothers and sisters hate each other."

When Johnson saw some young ladies in Lincolnshire who were remarkably well-behaved, owing to their mother's strict discipline and severe correction, he exclaimed, in one of Shakespeare's lines a little varied:

"Rott, I will honour thee for this thy duty."

That superiority over his fellows, which he maintained with so much dignity in his march through life, was not assumed from vanity and ostentation, but was the natural and constant effect of those extraordinary powers of mind, of which he could not but be conscious by comparison; the intellectual difference, which in other cases of comparison of characters is often a matter of undecideable question, being as clear in his ease as the superiority of stature in some men above others. Johnson did not strut or stand on tip-toe: he only did not stoop. From his earliest years, his superiority was perceived and acknowledged. He was from the beginning ο ἀνόητος, a king of men. His school-fellow, Mr. Hector, has obligingly furnished me with many particulars of his boyish days; and assured me that he never knew him corrected at school, but for talking and diverting other boys from their business. He seemed to learn by intuition; for though indolence and procrastination were inherent in his constitution, whenever he made an exertion he did more than any one else. In short, he is a memorable instance of what has been often observed, that the boy is the man in miniature; and that the distinguishing characteristics of each individual are the same, through the whole course of life. His favourites used to receive very liberal assistance from him; and such was the submission and deference with which he was treated, such the desire to obtain his regard, that three of the boys, of whom Mr. Hector was sometimes one, used to come in the morning as his humble attendants, and carry him to school. One in the middle stooped, while he sat upon his back, and one on each side supported him; and thus he was borne triumphant. Such a proof of the early predominance of intellectual vigour is very remarkable, and does honour to human nature. Talking to me once himself of his being much distinguished at school, he told me, "They never thought to raise me by comparing me to any one; they never said, Johnson is as good a scholar as such a one, but such a one is as good a scholar as Johnson; and this was said but of one, but of Lowe; and I do not think he was as good a scholar.

He discovered a great ambition to excel, which roused him to counteract his idleness. He was uncommonly inquisitive; and his memory was so tenacious, that he never forgot any thing that he either heard or read. Mr. Hector remembers having recited to him eighteen verses, which, after a little pause, he repeated verbatim, varying only one epithet, by which he improved the line.

He never joined with the other boys in their ordinary diversions; his only amusement was in winter, when he took a pleasure in being drawn upon the ice by a boy barefooted, who pulled him along by a garter fixed round him; no very easy operation, as Mr. Johnson was remarkably lame. His defective sight, indeed, prevented him from enjoying the common sports; and he once pleasantly remarked to me, "how wonderfully well he had contrived to be idle without them." Lord Chesterfield, however, has justly observed in one of his letters, when earnestly cautioning a friend against the pernicious effects of idleness, that active sports are not to be reckoned idleness in young people; and that the listless torpor of doing nothing alone deserves that name. Of this dismal inertness of disposition, Johnson had all his life too great a share. Mr. Hector relates, that "he could not oblige him more than by unsparing away the hours of vacation in the fields, during which he was more engaged in talking to himself than to his companion." 1

Dr. Percy, the Bishop of Dromore, who was long intimately acquainted with him, and has preserved a few anecdotes concerning him, regretting that he was not a more diligent collector, informs me, that "when a boy he was immoderately fond of reading romances of chivalry, and he retained his fondness for them through life; so that," adds his lordship, "spending part of a summer at my parsonage-house in the country, he chose for his regular reading the old Spanish romance of Felizmarie de Hircania 2, in folio, which he read quite through. Yet I have heard him attribute to these extravagant fictions that unsettled turn of mind which prevented his ever fixing in any profession."

After having resided for some time at the house of his uncle, Cornelius Ford, Johnson was, at the age of fifteen, removed to the school of Stourbridge, in Worcestershire, of which Mr. Wentworth 3 was then master. This step was taken by the advice of his cousin the Rev. Mr. Ford, a man in whom both talents and good dispositions were disgraced by licentiousness, but who was a very able judge of what was right. At this school he did not receive so much benefit as was expected. It has been said, that he acted in the capacity of an assistant master. Mr. Wentworth, in teaching the younger boys. "Mr. Wentworth," he told me, "was a very able man, but an idle one, and to me very severe; but I cannot blame him much. I was then a big boy; he saw I did not reverence him, and that he should get no honour by me. I had brought enough with me to carry me through; and all I should get at his school would be ascribed to my own labour, or to my former master. Yet he taught me a great deal."

He thus discriminated, to Dr. Percy, bishop of Dromore, his progress at his two grammar-schools:—"At one, I learned much in the school, but little from the master; in the other, I learnt much from the master, but little in the school."

The Bishop also informs me, that Dr. Johnson's father, before he was received at Stourbridge, applied to have him admitted as a scholar and assistant to the Rev. Samuel Lea, M.A., head master of Newport school, in Shropshire;—a very diligent good teacher, at that time in high reputation, under whom Mr. Hollis is said, in the Memoirs of his Life,

1 Mr. Hector's recollections had already been published by Hawkins, but Boswell suppressed a remarkable passage: "After a long absence from Lichfield, when he returned I was apprehensive of something wrong in his constitution, which might either impair his intellect, or endanger his life, but, thanks to Almighty God, my fears have proved false." — This was, no doubt, his residence at Oxford, on his return from which he had a severe fit of hypochondriacal illness, at Lichfield, in 1729-30. — Croker.

2 Dr. Thomas Percy, the editor of the "Reliquiae" was born at Bridgenorth, in 1729. In 1752 he was nominated to the see of Dromore; where he died in 1811. — Wright.

3 In one of his journeys we shall see (22th March, 1776), that he used to call him "il Palmirino d'Inghilterra" in Italian, but then it was for exercise in the language, and he took no pleasure in the work itself. — Croker.

4 Dr. Ford, an eminent physician, was brother of Johnson's mother.—Malone. Dr. Johnson had four uncles Ford, Dr. Joseph (the eldest), Cornelius, and Samuel, after whom he was named. — N. M.

5 Hawkins says that his name was Winchworth, but that, affecting to be of the Stafford family, he assumed that of Heathworth.—Croker.

6 He is said to be the original of the parson in Hogarth's Midnight Modern Conversation. — Boswell.

This fact has been doubted, though Johnson himself seems to have believed it (see post, 19 May, 1786), and in his Life of Fenton, admits the blameless levity of his cousin's character. "Ford, a clergyman at that time too well known, whose abilities, instead of furnishing convivial merriment to the voluptuous and dissolute, might have enabled him to excel among the virtuous and the wise," in the Historical Register for 1781, we find, "Died Aug. 22, the Rev. Mr. Ford, well known to the world for his great wit and abilities." And the Gentleman's Magazine of the same date states that he was "esteemed for his polite and agreeable conversation." Mr. Murphy asserts that he was chaplain to Lord Chesterfield, but this was a mistake, arising, as Mr. Peter Cunningham has pointed out to me, from the following passage in the Richardsoniana: "When Parson Ford, an infamous fellow, but of much off-hand conversation and wit, besought Lord Chesterfield to carry him over with him as his chaplain when he went ambassador to Holland, he said to him, 'I would certainly take you, if you had one vice more than you already have.' "My Lord," said Ford, "I thought I should never be reproached for my deficiency that way." 'True,' replied the cur' but, if you had still one more almost worse than all the rest put together, it would hinder these from giving scandal." — p. 225. — Croker, 1794.
to have been also educated. This application to Mr. Lea was not successful; but Johnson had afterwards the gratification to hear that the old gentleman, who lived to a very advanced age, mentioned it as one of the most memorable events of his life, that "he was very near having that great man for his scholar."

He remained at Stourbridge little more than a year, and then he returned home, where he may be said to have loitered, for two years, in a state very unworthy his uncommon abilities. He had already given several proofs of his poetical genius, both in his school-exercises and in other occasional compositions. Of these I have obtained a considerable collection, by the favour of Mr. Wentworth, son of one of his masters, and of Mr. Hector, his school-fellow and friend; from which I select the following specimens:

TRANSLATION OF VIRGIL. Pastoral I.

Melibæus.

Now, Tityrus, you, supine and careless laid, Play on your pipe beneath this beechen shade; While wretched we about the world must roam, And leave our pleasing fields and native home, Here at your ease you sing your amorous flame, And the wood rings with Amaranth's name.

Tityrus.

Those blessings, friend, a deity bestow'd, For I shall never think him less than God: Oft on his altar shall my firstlings lie, Their blood the consecrated stones shall dye: He gave my flocks to graze the flowery meads, And me to tune at ease th' unequal reeds.

Melibæus.

My admiration only I express (No spark of envy harbours in my breast), That, when confusion o'er the country reigns, To you alone this happy state remains. Here I, though faint myself, must drive my goats, Far from their ancient fields and humble cots. This scarce I lead, who left on yonder rock Two tender kids, the hopes of all the flock. Had we not been pensive and careless grown, This dire event by omens was foreshown; Our trees were blasted by the thunder stroke, And left-hand crows, from an old hollow oak, Foretold the coming evil by their dismal coo.

TRANSLATION OF HORACE. Book I. Ode xxii.

The man, my friend, whose conscious heart With virtue's sacred ardour glows, Nor taints with death the envenom'd dart, Nor needs the guard of Moorish bows: Though Scythian's joy cliffs he treads, Or horrid Afric's faithless sands; Or where the famed Hydaspes spreads His liquid wealth o'er barbarous lands.

For while by Chloe's image charm'd, Too far in Sabine woods I stray'd; Me singing, careless and unmind'd, A grizzly wolf surpris'd, and fled.

No savage more portentous stain'd Apulia's spacious wilds with gore; No fiercer Juba's thirsty land, Dire nurse of raging lions, bore.

Place me where no soft summer gale Among the quivering branches sighs; Where clouds condens'd for ever veil With horrid gloom the frowning skies:

Place me beneath the burning line, A clime denied to human race: I'll sing of Chloe's charms divine, Her heavenly voice and beauteous face.

TRANSLATION OF PART OF THE DIALOGUE BETWEEN Hector and Andromache, From the Sixth Book of Homer's Iliad.

She ceased; then godlike Hector answer'd kind (His various plumage sporting in the wind), That post, and all the rest, shall be my care; But shall I, then, forget the unfinished war? How would the Trojans brand great Hector's name! And one base action sully all my fame, Acur'd by wounds and battles bravely fought! Oh! how my soul abhors so mean a thought.

company of the place, and had no common attention paid to him; of which remarkable instances were long remembered there. — Percy.

To a Young Lady on her Birthday.

This tributary verse receive, my fair,
Warm with an ardent lover's fondest prayer.
May this returning day for ever find Thy form more lovely, more adorn'd thy mind;
All pains, all cares, may favouring Heaven remove,
And sweet solitudes of love give way.
May powerful nature join with grateful art,
To point each glance, and force it to the heart!
Oh then, when conquer'd crowds confess thy sway,
When ev'n proud wealth and prouder wit obey,
My fair, be mindful of the mighty trust.
Alas! 'tis hard for beauty to be just.
Those sovereign charms with strictest care employ;
Nor give the generous pain, the worthless joy:
With his own form acquaint the forward fool,
Shown in the faithful glass of ridicule.
Teach mimic censure her own faults to find,
No more let coquettes to themselves be blind,
So shall Belinda's charms improve mankind.

The Young Author.

When first the peasant, long inlin'd to roam,
Forsakes his rural sports and peaceful home,
Plies'd with the scene the smiling ocean yields,
He scorns the verdant meads and flow'ry fields;
Then dances jocund o'er the watery way,
While the breeze whispers, and the streamers play.
Unbounded prospects in his bosom roll,
And future millions lift his rising soul;
In blissful dreams he diggs the golden mine,
And raptur'd sees the new-found ruby shine.
Joys insincere! thick clouds invade the skies,
Loud roar the billows, high the waves arise;

Sick'ning with fear, he longs to view the shore,
And vows to trust the faithless deep no more.
So the young Author, panting after fame,
And the long honours of a lasting name,
Intrusts his happiness to human kind,
More false, more cruel, than the sea or wind.
"Toil on, dull crowd," in ecstacies he cries,
For youth or title, perishable prize;
While I those transitory blessings scorn, Secure of praise from ages yet unborn.
This thought once form'd, all counsel comes too late,
He flies to press, and hurries on his fate;
Swiftly he sees the imagin'd laurels spread,
And feels the unfading wreath surround his head.
Warr'd by another's fate, vain youth, be wise,
Those dreams were Settle's once, and Ogilvy's.
The pamphlet spreads, incessant hisses rise,
To some retreat the baffled writer flies;
Where no sour critics snarl, no snears molest,
Safe from the tart lampoon and stinging jest;
There begs of Heaven a less distasteful lot,
Glad to be hid, and proud to be forgot.

Epilogue intended to have been spoken by a Lady who was to personate the Ghost of Hermione.

Ye blooming train, who give despair or joy,
Bless with a smile, or with a frown destroy;
In whose fair cheeks destructive Cupids wait,
And with unerring shafts distribute fate;
Whose snowy breasts, whose animated eyes,
Each youthful admirer, though each admires dies;
Whilst ye deride their pangs in banter's play,
Unpitied see them weep, and hear them pray.
And unrelenting sport ten thousand lives away;
For you, ye fair, I quit the gloomy plains,
Where sable night in all her horror reigns;
No fragrant bower, no delightful glades,
Receive the unhappy ghosts of scornful maids.
For kind, for tender nymphs the myrth blooms,
And weaves her bending boughs in pleasing glooms,
Perennial roses deck each purple vale,
And scents ambrosial breath in every gale:
Far hence are banish'd vapours, spleen, and tears,
Each scandal, ivory teeth, and languid airs.
No pug, nor favourite Cupid there enjoys
The balny kiss, for which poor Thysria dies;
Form'd to delight, they use no foreign arms,
Nor torturing whalcons pinch them into charms;
No conscious blisses thare their cheeks inflame,
For those who feel no guilt can know no shame;
Unfaded still their former charms they shew, Around them pleasures wait, and joys for ever new.
But cruel virgins meet severer fates;
Expell'd and exiled from the blissful seats,
To dismal realms, and regions void of peace,
Where furies ever howl, and serpents hiss.
O'er the sad plains perpetual tempests sigh,
And pois'nous vapours black'ning all the sky,
With livid hue the fairest face o'ercast,
And every beauty withers at the blast:

1 Mr. Hector informs me that this was made almost impromptu in his presence. — BOSWELL.
2 This he inserted, with many alterations, in the Gentleman's Magazine, 1743, p. 378. — BOSWELL. He, however, did not add his name. — MALONE.
3 Some young ladies at Lichfield having proposed to act "The Distressed Mother," Johnson wrote this, and gave it to Mr. Hector to convey it privately to them. — BOSWELL.
Where'er they fly their lovers' ghosts pursue,
Inflicting all those ills which once they knew;
Vexation, Fury, Jealousy, Despair,
Vex e'ry eye, and e'ry bosom tear;
Their soul deformities by all deceased,
No maid toJeopard with a paint to hide.
Then tell ye fair, while clouds around you sigh,
Nor let disdain sit pouring in your eye;
With pity soften every awful grace,
And beauty smile auspicious in each face;
To ease their pains exert your milder power,
So shall you guiltless reign, and all mankind adore.

The two years which he spent at home, after his return from Stourbridge, he passed in what he thought idleness, and was scolded by his father for his want of steady application. 1
He had no settled plan of life, nor looked forward at all, but merely lived from day to day. Yet he read a great deal in a desultory manner, without any scheme of study, as chance threw books in his way, and inclination directed him through them. He used to mention one curious instance of his casual reading, when but a boy.
Having imagined that his brother had hid some apples behind a large folio upon an upper shelf in his father's shop, he climbed up to search for them. There were no apples; but the large folio proved to be Petrarch, whom he had seen mentioned, in some preface, as one of the restorers of learning. His curiosity having been thus excited, he sat down with avidity and read a great part of the book. 2
What he read during these two years, he told me, was not works of mere amusement, "not voyages and travels, but all literature, Sir, all ancient writers, all manly; though but little Greek, only some of Anaeraceon and Hisiod; but in this irregular manner," added he, "I had looked into a great many books, which were not commonly known at the universities, where they seldom read any books but what are put into their hands by their tutors; so that when I came to Oxford, Dr. Adams, now master of Pembroke College, told me, I was the best qualified for the university that he had ever known come there."

In estimating the progress of his mind during these two years, as well as in future periods of his life, we must not regard his own hasty confection of idleness; for we see, when he explains himself, that he was acquiring various stores;
and, indeed, he himself concluded the account with saying, 4 "I would not have you think I

1 He probably helped his father in his business. Hawkins heard him say that he himself was able to bind a book, and Dr. Harwood showed me a pocket-book with a parchment cover, said to have been made by him. — Croker.
2 Probably, the folio edition of Petrarch's Opera Omnia greater, Bâz. 1504; which contain both his Latin and Italian works; this accident may have led to Johnson's early study, though probably slight acquaintance with Italian.
(See post, p. 31, n. 4.) — Croker.
3 Hawkins says that "A neighbouring gentleman, Mr.
Andrew Corbett, having a son, who had been educated in the same school with Johnson, and seemed about to send to Pembroke College, in Oxford, a proposal was made and accepted, that Johnson should attend his son thither in quality of assistant in his studies;" 4 but the indisputable dates of Corbett's college life do not tally with the accounts of either Boswell or Hawkins. Corbett was of the University twenty months before and twelve or thirteen months after Johnson. And, on reference to the college books, it appears that Corbett's residence was so irregular, and so little coincident with Johnson's, that there is no reason to suppose that Johnson was employed either as the private tutor of Corbett, as Hawkins states, or his companion, as Boswell suggests. Much more probable is the statement made in the Memoirs before mentioned, that his godfather Dr. Swinfini and some other gentlemen of the neighbourhood contributed to send him to Oxford. This information is corroborated by the fact that a volume had been sent to Dr. Swinfen's own college, and of his constant and generous protection of Mrs. Desmond, Dr. Swinfen's daughter, from whom, indeed, the writer of the Memoirs seems to have derived his information. — Croker.
church; "for form's sake, though he wanted not a tutor, he was put under the tuition of Dr. John Bancroft, afterwards Bishop of Oxon."

His father seemed very full of the merits of his son, and told the company he was a good scholar, and a poet, and wrote Latin verses. His figure and manner appeared strange to them; but he behaved modestly, and sat silent, till upon something which occurred in the course of conversation, he suddenly struck in and quoted Macrobins; and thus he gave the first impression of that more extensive reading in which he had indulged himself.

His tutor, Mr. Jorden, fellow of Pembroke, was not, it seems, a man of such abilities as we should conceive requisite for the instructor of Samuel Johnson, who gave me the following account of him:—

"He was a very worthy man, but a heavy man; and I did not profit much by his instructions. Indeed, I did not attend him much. The first day after I came to college I waited upon him, and then staid away four. On the sixth, Mr. Jorden asked me why I had not attended. I answered, I had been sliding in Christ-church meadow. And this I said with as much nonchalance as I am now talking to you. I had no notion that I was wrong or irreverent to my tutor." — Boswell.

"That, Sir, was great fortitude of mind." — Johnson.

"No, Sir; stark insensibility." 4

The fifth of November was at that time kept with great solemnity at Pembroke College, and exercises upon the subject of the day were required. Johnson neglected to perform his, which is much to be regretted; for his vividness of imagination, and force of language, would probably have produced something sublime upon the Gunpowder Plot. To apologise for his neglect, he gave in a short copy of verses, entitled Somnium, containing a common thought—"that the Muse had come to him in his sleep and whispered, that it did not become him to write on such subjects as politics; he should confine himself to humbler themes:" but the versification was truly Virgilian.

He had a love and respect for Jorden, not for his literature 5 but for his worth. "Whenever," said he, "a young man becomes Jorden's pupil, he becomes his son."

Having given such a specimen of his poetical powers, he was asked by Mr. Jorden to translate Pope's Messiah into Latin verse, as a Christmas exercise. 6 He performed it with uncommon rapidity, and in so masterly a manner, that he obtained great applause from it, which ever after kept him high in the estimation of his college, and, indeed, of all the university.

It is said, that Mr. Pope expressed himself concerning it in terms of strong approbation. Dr. Taylor told me, that it was first printed for old Mr. Johnson, without the knowledge of his son, who was very angry when he heard of it. A Miscellany of Poems, collected by a Writer of the name of Husbands, was published at Oxford in 1731. 7 In that Miscellany, Johnson's Translation of the Messiah appeared, with this modest motto from Scaliger's Poetics, "Ex alieno ingenua poeta, ex suo tantum versificator." 8

I am not ignorant that critical objections have been made to this and other specimens of Johnson's Latin poetry. I acknowledge myself not competent to decide on a question of such extreme nicety. But I am satisfied with 2 There are, as Dr. Hall informed me, several errors in Mr. Boswell's account of Johnson's college life. He either did not examine, or must have misunderstood Adams's information. There are at Pembroke two tutors for the whole college, so that Mr. Jorden was no more the instructor of his own son than of any other student. And Johnson was equally the pupil of the other college tutor. But a more serious error is that as to the period of Johnson's actual residence at Oxford, which pervades, and, in some important points, falsifies Boswell's narrative. Boswell assumes that the years 1729, 1730, and 1731 were all spent — with only the usual interruption of the college vacations — at Oxford, and he adapts all his subsequent statements, and several anecdotes, to this hypothesis; but an examination of the college books proves that Johnson, who entered on the 31st October, 1728, remained there, even during the vacations, to the 12th December, 1728, when he personally left the college, and never returned till the following 5th October, 1731. This abrupt termination of his residence was no doubt occasioned by the hypochondriacal illness mentioned (ante, p. 9, n. 1, and post, p. 14), and it is probable that his name remained on the books in the hope that his health, which it then was, would return. In this, his health, we shall see, mended, but the pecuniary resources failed. If Johnson had remained in college in 1730, there were two scholarships to which he would have been eligible, and one of which Dr. Hall did not doubt that he would have obtained. But see, in his visit to Oxford, in 1734, his own declaration that it was fortunate for his literary character that he had been forced out of the routine of a college life.

4 Jorden used to say, "He scarcely knew a noun from an adverb." — Nicholas. Johnson told Mr. Windham that he was so ignorant as to say that the Ramus (the disciplines of Ramus) is a "two-hooped structure." — Croker.
5 This must have been the Christmas (1728) immediately following his entering into college; for he never spent a second Christmas at Pembroke. — Croker.
6 John Husbands was a contemporary of Johnson at Pembroke College, having been admitted a Fellow and A.M. in 1726. Hawkins says that the poem has been shown to Pope, by a son of Dr. Arbuthnot, then a gentleman companion of Christ-church, was read, and returned with this emendation: "the writer of this poem will leave it a question, whether his or mine be the original." But Pope's own statement, post, p. 41. I do not find that it was published till 1729. (Post, under which it appeared in the Gent. Mag. for 1729 with Johnson's name. — Croker.

the just and discriminative eulogy pronounced upon it by my friend Mr. Courtenay.

And with like ease his vivid lines assume
The garb and dignity of ancient Rome.
Let college verse-men trite conceits express,
Trick'd out in splendid shreds of Virgil's dress;
From playful Ovid call the tinsel phrase,
And vacant notions hitch in pillar'd lays,
Then with mosaic art the piece combine,
And boast the glitter of each dulcet line:
Johnson adventur'd boldly to transfuse
His vigorous sense into the Latin muse;
Aspir'd to shine by unreflected light,
And with a Roman ardour think and write.
He felt the tuneful Nine his breast inspire,
And, like a master, wak'd the soothing lyre:
Horatian strains a grateful heart proclaim,
While Sky's wild rocks resound his Thracian name.1
Hesperia's plant, in some less skilful hands,
To bloom a while, fastidious heat demands:
Though glowing Maro a scant warmth supplies,
The sickly blossom in the hot-house dies
By Johnson's genial culture, art, and toil,
Its root strikes deep, and owns the fostering soil;
Imbibe our sun through all its swelling veins,
And grows a native of Britannia's plains.2

The "morbid melancholy," which was lurking in his constitution, and to which we may ascribe those particularities, and that aversion to regular life, which at a very early period marked his character, gathered such strength in his twentieth year, as to afflict him in a dreadful manner. While he was at Lichfield, in the college vacation of the year 1729, he felt himself overwhelmed with a horrible hypochondria, with perpetual irritation, fretfulness, and impatience; and with a dejection, gloom, and despair, which made existence misery.

From this dismal malady he never afterwards was perfectly relieved, and all his labours, and all his enjoyments, were but temporary interruptions of its baleful influence. How wonderful, how unsearchable are the ways of God! Johnson, who was blessed with all the powers of genius and understanding in a degree far above the ordinary state of human nature, was at the same time visited with a disorder so afflicting, that they who knew it by dire experience will not envy his exalted endowments. That it was, in some degree, occasioned by a defect in his nervous system, that inexplicable part of our frame, appears highly probable. He told Mr. Paradise3 that he was sometimes so languid and inefficient, that he could not distinguish the hour upon the town-clock.

Johnson, upon the first violent attack of this disorder, strove to overcome it by forcible exertions. He frequently walked to Birmingham and back again, and tried many other expedients, but all in vain. His expression concerning it to me was, "I did not then know how to manage it." His distress became so intolerable, that he applied to Dr. Swinfen, physician in Lichfield, his god-father, and put into his hands a state of his case, written in Latin. Dr. Swinfen was so much struck with the extraordinary acuteness, research, and eloquence of this paper, that in his zeal for his godson he showed it to several people. His daughter, Mrs. Desmoulins, who was many years humanely supported in Dr. Johnson's house in London, told me, that upon his discovering that Dr. Swinfen had communicated his case, he was so much offended that he was never afterwards fully reconciled to him. He indeed had good reason to be offended; for though Dr. Swinfen's motive was good, he inconsiderately betrayed a matter deeply interesting and of great delicacy, which had been intrusted to him in confidence; and exposed a complaint of his young friend and patient, which, in the superficial opinion of the generality of mankind, is attended with contempt and disgrace.

But let not little men triumph upon knowing that Johnson was an Hypochondriac, was subject to what the learned, philosophical, and pious Dr. Cheyne has so well treated under the title of "The English Malady." Though he suffered severely from it, he was not therefore degraded. The powers of his great mind might be troubled, and their full exercise suspended at times; but the mind itself was ever entire. As a proof of this, it is only necessary to consider, that, when he was at the very worst, he composed that state of his own case, which showed an uncommon vigour, not only of fancy and taste, but of judgment. I am aware that he himself was too ready to call such a complaint by the name of madness; in conformity with which notion, he has traced its gradations, with exquisite nicety, in one of the chapters of his Rasselas.4 But there is surely a clear distinction between a disorder which affects only the imagination and spirits, while the judgment is sound, and a disorder by which the judgment itself is impaired. This distinction was made to me by the late Professor Gaubius5 of Leyden, physician to the Prince of Orange, in a conversation which I had with him several years ago, and he expanded it thus: "If," said he, "a man tells me that he is grievously disturbed, for that he imagines he sees a ruffian coming against him with a drawn sword, though at the same time he is conscious it is a delusion, I pronounce him to have a disordered imagination; but if a man tells me that he sees this, and in consternation calls to me to look at it, I pronounce him to be mad."

It is a common effect of low spirits or melancholy, to make those who are afflicted with it imagine that they are actually suffering those evils which happen to be most strongly presented to their minds. Some have fancied themselves to be deprived of the use of their limbs, some to labour under acute diseases, others to be in extreme poverty; when, in truth, there was not the least reality in any of the suppositions; so that, when the vapours were dispelled, they were convinced of the delusion. To Johnson, whose supreme enjoyment was the exercise of his reason, the disturbance or obscuration of that faculty was the evil most to be dreaded. Insanity, therefore, was the object of his most dismal apprehension; and he fancied himself seized by it, or approaching to it, at the very time when he was giving proofs of a more than ordinary soundness and vigour of judgment. That his own diseased imagination should have so far deceived him is strange; but it is stranger still that some of his friends should have given credit to his groundless opinion, when they had such undoubted proofs that it was totally fallacious; though it is by no means surprising that those who wish to depreciate him should, since his death, have laid hold of this circumstance, and insisted upon it with very unfair aggravation.1

Amidst the oppression and distraction of a disease which very few have felt in its full extent, but many2 have experienced in a slighter degree, Johnson, in his writings, and in his conversation, never failed to display all the varieties of intellectual excellence.3 In his march through this world to a better, his mind still appeared grand and brilliant, and impressed all around him with the truth of Virgil's noble sentiment—

The history of his mind as to religion is an important article. I have mentioned the early impatience of the young Johnson upon his tender imagination by his mother, who continued her pious cares with assiduity, but, in his opinion, not with judgment. "Sunday," said he, "was a woeful day to me when I was a boy. My mother confined me on that day, and made me read 'The Whole Duty of Man,' from a great part of which I could derive no instruction. When, for instance, I read the chapter on theft, which from my infancy I had been taught was wrong, I was no more convinced that theft was wrong than before; so there was no accession of knowledge. A boy should be introduced to such books, by having his attention directed to the arrangement, to the style, and other excellencies of composition; that the mind being thus engaged by an amusing variety of objects, may not grow weary."

He communicated to me the following particulars upon the subject of his religious progress:—"I fell into an inattention to religion, or an indifference about it, in my ninth year. The church at Lichfield, in which we had a seat, wanted repairation, so I was to go and find a seat in other churches; and having bad eyes, and being awkward about this, I used to go and read in the fields on Sunday. This habit continued till my fourteenth year; and still I find a great reluctance to go to church. I then became a sort of lax talker against religion, for I did not much think against it; and this lasted till I went to Oxford, where it would not be suffered. When at Oxford, I took up Law's5 Serious Call to a Holy Life, expecting to find it a dull book (as such books generally are), and perhaps to laugh at it. But I found Law quite an overmatch for me; and this was the first occasion of my thinking in the author of the best French comedy after Moliere, was attribulious, and Moliere himself saturnine. Dr. Johnson, Gray, and Burns, were all, more or less, affected by it occasionally. It was the prelude to the more awful malady of Collins, Cowper, Swift, and Smart; but it by no means follows that a partial affliction of this disorder is to terminate like theirs." Byron, vol. vi. p. 396. — Wright. This list of superior intellects liable to constitutional, and, as I believe, hereditary disorder, might be largely augmented, and would, in my opinion, include Lord Byron himself.—Croker, 1846.

Johnson's parish church, St. Mary's, being in a decayed state, was taken down in 1716, and the present structure was finished and consecrated in 1730. How important is this otherwise trivial circumstance towards enforcing the "habit of church-going!" The accidental interruption of this duty for a time Johnson's faith, and was felt even in his maturer days. — Croker.

1 This, it is to be presumed, was Boswell's reason for concealing that passage of Mr. Hector's paper quoted in p. 9, note 1; but Johnson himself was not so scrupulous. He said (post. Sept. 16, 1783), that "he had inherited from his father a vile melancholy, which had made him mad all his life." — Croker.

2 (Dec. 24, 1754), he says of Collins, then insane, "Poor dear Collins! I have been often near his state, and therefore have it in great commination." — Croker.

3 Mr. Boswell was himself occasionally afflicted with this morbid depression of spirits, and was, at intervals, equally liable to paroxysms of what may be called morbid vanity. He wrote a Series of Essays in the London Magazine, under the title of the "Hypochondriac," seventy in number, commenced in 1777, and carried on till 1784. — Croker.

Jan. 29. 1791, Boswell writes thus to Mr. Malone: — "I have, for some weeks, had the most woful return of melancholy such as that I have not only had no relish of anything, but a continual uneasiness; and all the prospect before me, for the rest of life, has seemed gloomy and hopeless." Again, March 5, "To the letter written the last of February and first of this month, I had a sudden relief from the inexplicable disorder, which occasionally clouds my mind and makes me miserable." — From the originals in the possession of Mr. Upcott. — Wright.

earnest of religion, after I became capable of rational enquiry.” From this time forward religion was the predominant object of his thoughts; though, with the just sentiments of a conscientious Christian, he lamented that his practice of its duties fell far short of what it ought to be.

This instance of a mind such as that of Johnson being first disposed, by an unexpected incident, to think with anxiety of the momentous concerns of eternity, and of “what he should do to be saved,” may for ever be produced in opposition to the superficial and sometimes profane contempt that has been thrown upon those occasional impressions which it is certain many Christians have experienced: though it must be acknowledged that weak minds, from an erroneous supposition that no man is in a state of grace who has not felt a particular conversion, have, in some cases, brought a degree of ridicule upon them; a ridicule, of which it is insconsiderate or unfair to make a general application.

How seriously Johnson was impressed with a sense of religion, even in the vigour of his youth, appears from the following passage in his minutes kept by way of diary: — “Sept. 7. 1736. I have this day entered upon my 28th year. Mayest thou, O God, enable me, for Jesus Christ’s sake, to spend this in such a manner, that I may receive comfort from it at the hour of death, and in the day of judgment!”

The particular course of his reading while at Oxford, and during the time of vacation which he passed at home, cannot be traced. Enough has been said of his irregular mode of study. He told me, that from his earliest years he loved to read poetry, but hardly ever read any poem to an end; that he read Shakespeare at a period so early, that the speech of the ghost in Hamlet terrified him when he was alone; that Horace’s odes were the compositions in which he took most delight, and it was long before he liked his Epistles and Satires. He told me what he read solidly at Oxford was Greek; not the Grecian historians, but Homer and Euripides, and now and then a little Epigram; that the study of which he was the most fond was metaphysics, but he had not read much, even in that way. I always thought that he did himself injustice in his account of what he had read, and that he must have been speaking with reference to the vast portion of study which is possible, and to which a few scholars in the whole history of literature have attained; for when I once asked him whether a person, whose name I have now forgotten, studied hard, he answered, “No, Sir. I do not believe he studied hard. I never knew a man who studied hard. I conclude, indeed, from the effects, that some men have studied hard, as Bentley and Clarke.”

Trying him by that criterion upon which he formed his judgment of others, we may be absolutely certain, both from his writings and his conversation, that his reading was very extensive. Dr. Adam Smith, than whom few were better judges on this subject, once observed to me, that “Johnson knew more books than any man alive.” He had a peculiar facility in seizing at once what was valuable in any book, without submitting to the labour of perusing it from beginning to end. He had, from the irritability of his constitution that all times, an impatience and hurry when he either read or wrote. A certain apprehension arising from novelty made him write his first exercise at college twice over; but he never took that trouble with any other composition; and we shall see that his most excellent works were struck off at a heat, with rapid exertion.

Yet he appears, from his early notes or memorandums in his possession, to have at 1 Mrs. Piozzi has given a strange fantastical account of the original of Dr. Johnson’s belief in our most holy religion.

2 At the age of ten years his mind was disturbed by scruples of infidelity, which preyed upon his spirits, and made him very uneasy; the more so, as he revealed his uneasiness to none, being naturally (as he said) of a sullen temper, and reserved disposition. He searched, however, diligently, but fruitlessly, for evidences of the truth of revelation; and at length, recollecting a book he had once seen [I suppose at five years old] in his father’s shop, entitled Do Veritate Religionis, he began to think himself highly culpable for neglecting such means of information, and took himself sumptuously to be converted to that faith, and to others unknown, penance. The first opportunity which offered, of course, he seized the book with avidity; but, on examination, not finding himself scholar enough to peruse its contents, set his heart at rest; and not thinking to inquire whether there were any English books written on the subject, followed his usual anxieties, and considered his conscience as lightened of a crime. He redoubled his diligence to learn the language that contained the information he most wished for; but from the pain which it caused me, having omitted to read what I did not understand, he gave himself up to the idea of perusing a great composition of pain in this world being an unquestionable proof of existence in another, which was the point that belief first stopped at; and from that moment reasoning to be a Christian, became one of the most zealous and pious ones our nation ever produced. (Anecdotes, p. 17.) This is one of the many instances of the malice of forging of a name, which it is worth while to correct; for if credit should be given to such childish, irrational, and ridiculous statement of the foundation of Dr. Johnson’s faith in Christianity, how little credit would be due to it! Mrs. Piozzi seems to wish, that the world should think Dr. Johnson also under the influence of that easy logic, “Sist pro ratione voluntas.” — BOSWELL.

3 He was then married and resident at Edial. — CROKER.

4 Though three of his pieces are easy, and in what he perhaps thought the Horatian style, we shall see that to Miss Carter he confessed a fondness for Martial, and his epigrams certainly savour of that partiality. Dr. Hall had a small volume of hendecasyllabic poetry, entitled Poeta Rusticona Literatum Oitum, sine Carmina Andre Fiacruci Landesi, Lond. 1717. The number of his poems was immense, and the oddities of the style of these verses may be traced in his college compositions. — CROKER.

5 Boswell might have selected, if not a better judge, at least a better authority; for Adam Smith had but a slight acquaintance with Johnson, and the judgment pronounced by Smith is one which could only be justified by an intimate literary intercourse. But Boswell’s nationality inclined him to that view, and he never wrote any of his works that were printed, twice over. Dr. Burney’s wonder at seeing several pages of his Lives of the Poets, in manuscript, with scarce a blot or erasure, drew this observation from him. — MALONE. But he made large corrections in the second edition of the Ramsbury, and in the third edition of the Lives of the Poets, in 1775 and 1776, respectively, as to be printed in a separate pamphlet, for the use of former purchasers. — CROKER.
him this account as given me by Dr. Adams, he said, "Ah, Sir, I was mad and violent. It was bitterness which they mistook for frolic. I was miserably poor, and I thought to fight my way by my literature and my wit; so I disregarded all power and all authority.

The Bishop of Dromore observes in a letter to me, "The pleasure he took in vexing the tutors and fellows has been often mentioned. But I have heard him say, what ought to be recorded to the honour of the present venerable master of that college, the Reverend William Adams, D.D., who was then very young, and one of the junior fellows; that the mild but judicious expostulations of this worthy man, whose virtue awed him, and whose learning he revered, made him really ashamed of himself, though I fear (said he) I was too proud to own it."

"I have heard from some of his contemporaries that he was generally seen lounging at the college gate, with a circle of young students round him, whom he was entertaining with wit, and keeping from their studies, if not spiriting them up to rebellion against the college discipline, which in his master's years he so much extolled."

He very early began to attempt keeping notes or memoranda, by way of a diary of his life. I find, in a parcel of loose leaves, the following spirited resolution to contend against his natural indolence: "Oct. 1729. Desidiae vaeclici; syrens ipsis cantibus sardanum posthac aurem obsexeurs. I bid farewell to Sloth, being resolved henceforth not to listen to her siren strains."

I have also in my possession a few leaves of another Libellus, or little book, entitled Annales, in which some of the early particulars of his history are registered in Latin.

I do not find that he formed any close intimacies with his fellow-collegians. But Dr. Adams told me, that he contracted a love and various times attempted, or at least planned, a methodical course of study, according to computation, of which he was all his life fond, as it then had a power of steadily wearing him nothing without and prevented his mind from preying upon itself. Thus I find in his handwriting the number of lines in each of two of Euripides' Tragedies, of the Georgics of Virgil, of the first six books of the Æneid, of Horace's Art of Poetry, of three of the books of Ovid's Metamorphoses, of some parts of Theocritus, and of the tenth Satire of Juvenal; and a table, showing at the rate of various numbers a day, (I suppose, verses to be read,) what would be, in each case, the total amount in a week, month, and year. 1 No man had a more ardent love of literature, or a higher respect for it, than Johnson. His apartment in Pembroke College was that upon the second floor over the gateway. The enthusiasm of learning will ever contemplate it with veneration. One day, while he was sitting in it quite alone, Dr. Panting, 2 then master of the College, whom he called "a fine Jacobite fellow," overheard him uttering this soliloquy in his strong emphatic voice: "Well, I have a mind to see what is done in other places of learning. I'll go and visit the universities. I'll go to France and Italy. I'll go to Padua. And I'll mind my business. For an Athenian blockhead is the worst of all blockheads." 3

Dr. Adams told me that Johnson, while he was at Pembroke College, "was caressed and loved by all about him, was a gay and floridoméus fellow, and passed there the happiest part of his life." But this is a striking proof of the fallacy of appearances, and how little any of us know of the real internal state even of those whom we see most frequently; for the truth is, that he was then depressed by poverty, and irritated by disease. When I mentioned to Six hundred and forty verses every Sunday will nearly comprise the Scriptures in a year. — The plan which I formed for reading the Scriptures was to read six hundred verses in the Old Testament, and two hundred in the New, every week." pp. 57, 99. It appears by a subsequent passage that he meant to read the Old Testament in the Septuagint version. There is no trace of his having attempted Hebrew.

2 Dr. Matthew Panting died 12th Feb. 1730. — Croker.

3 I had this anecdote from Dr. Adams, and Dr. Johnson confirmed it. Bramston, in his "Man of Taste," has the same thought: "Sure of all blockheads scholars are the worst." — Boswell.

Johnson's meaning, however, is, that a scholar who is a blockhead, must be the worst of all blockheads, because he is without excuse. But Bramston, in the assumed character of an ignorant coxcomb, maintains, that all scholars are blockheads, on account of their scholarship. — J. Boswell, jun.

4 Dr. Adams was about two years older than Johnson, having been born in 1707. He became a Fellow of Pembroke in 1725, D.D. in 1736, and Master of the College in 1773. — Croker.

5 There are preserved, in Pembroke College, some of these themes, or emblemes, both in prose and verse, followed up; though the two first lines are awkward, has more point and pleasantness than his epigrams usually have. It may be surmised that the college beer was at this time indifferent: —

"Miaeae Falernae
Temperant aliter, neque Forniarni Facula calida." — Hor. 1 Od. 20. 10.
must we feel when we read such an anecdote of Samuel Johnson!

His spirited refusal of an eleemosynary supply of shoes arose, no doubt, from a proper pride. But, considering his ascetic disposition at times, as acknowledged by himself in his Meditations, and the exaggeration with which some have treated the peculiarities of his character, I should not wonder to hear it ascribed to a principle of superstitious mortification; as we are told by Tursellinus, in his Life of St. Ignatius Loyola, that this intrepid founder of the order of Jesuits, when he arrived at Goa, after having made a severe pilgrimage through the eastern deserts, persisted in wearing his miserable shattered shoes, and when new ones were offered him, rejected them as an unsuitable indulgence.

The res augesta domi prevented him from having the advantage of a complete academical education. The friend to whom he had trusted for support had deceived him. His debts in college, though not great, were increasing; and his scanty remittances from Lichfield, which had all along been made with great difficulty, could be supplied no longer, his father having fallen into a state of insolvency. Compelled, therefore, by irresistible necessity, he left the college in autumn 1731, without a degree, having been a member of it little more than three years.

Dr. Adams, the worthy and respectable master of Pembroke College, has generally had the reputation of being Johnson's tutor. The fact, however, is, that in 1731, Mr. Jorden quitte the college, and his pupils were transferred to Dr. Adams; so that had Johnson returned, Dr. Adams would have been his tutor: It is to be wished, that this connection had taken place. His equal temper, mild disposition, and politeness of manners, might have insensibly softened the harshness of Johnson, and infused into him those more delicate charities, those petites morales, in which, it must be confessed, our great moralist was more deficient than his best friends could fully justify. Dr. Adams paid Johnson this high compliment. He said to me at Oxford, in 1776, "I was his nominal tutor; but he was above my mark." When I repeated it to Johnson, his eyes flashed with grateful satisfaction, and he exclaimed, "That was liberal and noble."

1 Dr. Hall says, "Certainly, not all; and those which we have are not all marked as presented by him." — Croker.

2 To the list should be added, Francis Beaumont, the dramatic writer; Sir Thomas Brown, whose life Johnson wrote; Sir James Dyer, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, Lord Chancellor Harcourt, John Pym, Francis Rouz, the Speaker of Cromwell's parliament, and Bishop Bonner. — Watson.

3 Authoritatively and circumstantially as this story is told, it seems impossible to reconcile it with some indisputable facts and dates. Taylor was admitted commoner of Christchurch, 27 June 1730; but Johnson had left Oxford six months before. The only solution that can be made of this discrepancy, is the improbable one of Johnson's having accompanied Taylor to Oxford without reappearing at his own college. — Croker.

4 See ante, p. 12, note 3. — Croker.

5 Error: he was but fourteen months at Oxford. (Ante, p. 13, n. 1.) Here, then, are two important years, the 21st and 22nd of his age, to be accounted for; and Mr. Boswell's assertion (a little farther on), "that he could not have been assistant to Anthony Blackwall, because Blackwall died in 1730, before Johnson had left college," falls to the ground. He might have been for two or three months with Blackwall, who died in April, 1730. — Croker.

6 There is an obvious discrepancy between Boswell's and Dr. Adams's statements, arising, no doubt, from the partial error as to the date of Johnson's leaving college. Dr. Adams never was, in any sense, Johnson's tutor. — Croker.
CHAPTER IV.

And now (I had almost said poor) Samuel Johnson returned to his native city, destitute, and not knowing how he should gain even a decent livelihood. His father’s misfortunes in trade rendered him unable to support his son; and for some time there appeared no means by which he could maintain himself. In the December of this year his father died.

The state of poverty in which he died appears from a note in one of Johnson’s little diaries of the following year, which strongly displays his spirit and virtuous dignity of mind.

"1732, July 15. Undecim aureos depositi, quo die quinque ante matriis floruit (quod sermum sit præcor) de parentem bonis sperari licet, eginilis scilicet libras, accipio. Usque adeo nihil fortuna fingenda est. Interea ne paupertate vires animi languescant, tace in flagitia egestas abiat, exaudia. I layed by eleven guineas on this day, when I received twenty pounds, being all that I have reason to hope for out of my father’s effects, previous to the death of my mother; an event which I pray God may be very remote. I now therefore see that I must make my own fortune. Meanwhile, let me take care that the powers of my mind be not debilitated by poverty, and that indigence do not force me into any criminal act."

Johnson was so far fortunate, that the respectable character of his parents, and his own merit, had, from his earliest years, secured him a kind reception in the best families at Lichfield. Among these I can mention Mr. Howard, Dr. Swinfin, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Levett, Captain Garrick, father of the great ornament of the British stage; but above all, Mr. Gilbert Walmsley, Registrar of the Ecclesiastical Court of Lichfield, whose character, long after his decease, Dr. Johnson has, in his life of Edmund Smith [1779], thus drawn in the glowing colours of gratitude:

"Of Gilbert Walmsley, thus presented to my mind, let me indulge myself in the remembrance. I knew him very early; he was one of the first friends that literature procured me, and I hope, that at least my gratitude made me worthy of his notice.

"He was of an advanced age, and I was only not a boy, yet he never received my notions with contempt. He was a Whig, with all the virulence and malevolence of his party; yet difference of opinion did not keep us apart. I honoured him, and he endured me.

"He had mingled with the gay world without exemption from its vices or its follies; but had never neglected the cultivation of his mind. His belief of revelation was unshaken; his learning preserved his principles; he grew first regular, and then pious.

"His studies had been so various, that I am not able to name a man of equal knowledge. His acquaintance was great; there was much which I did not immediately know, he could, at least, tell where to find. Such was his amplitude of learning, and such his copiousness of communication, that it may be doubted whether a day now passes, in which I have not some advantage from his friendship.

"At this man’s table I enjoyed many cheerful and instructive hours, with companions such as are not often found — with one who has lengthened, and one who has gladdened life; with Dr. James, whose skill in physic will be long remembered; and with David Garrick, whom I hoped to have gratified with this character of our common friend. But what are the hopes of men? I am disappointed by that stroke of death which has eclipsed the gaiety of nations, and impoverished the public stock of harmless pleasure."

In these families he passed much time in his early years. In most of them, he was in the company of ladies, particularly at Mr. Walmsley’s, whose wife and sisters-in-law, of the name of Aston, and daughters of a baronet, were remarkable for good breeding; so that the notion which has been industriously circulated and believed, that he never was in good company till late in life, and, consequently, had been confirmed in coarse and ferocious manners by long habits, is wholly without foundation. Some of the ladies have assured me,

1 "Johnson’s father," says Hawkins, "either during his continuance at the university, or possibly before, had been by misfortunes rendered insolvent, if not, as Johnson told me, an actual bankrupt."
2 Amongst the MSS. of Pembroke College are some letters which state that his widow was left in great poverty. — Croker.
3 Mr. Howard was a protonotary in the Ecclesiastical Court, and resided in the Close. — Croker.
4 Mr. Levett was a gentleman of fortune in this neighbour-hood, and must not be confounded with the humble friend of the same name to whom Johnson was so charitable in after life. — Croker.
5 Mr. Johnson informs me, that this early friend of Johnson was entered a Commissary of Trinity College, Oxford, aged 17, in 1698; and is the author of many Latin verse translations in the Gentleman’s Magazine. One of them [vol. xv. p. 102] is a translation of "My time, O ye Muses, was happily spent."

He died August 3, 1731, and a monument to his memory has been erected in the cathedral of Lichfield, with an inscription written by Mr. Seward, one of the prebendaries. — Boswell. He was the son of W. Walmsley, (so they spelled their name,) L.L.D., chancellor of the diocese, and in 1701 M.P. for the city of Lichfield, and was born in 1669; but I think Dr. Warton was mistaken in attributing the translation of the song to him, for, though signed "G. Walmsley," it is dated Sid. Col. Cambridge. Johnson’s friend was at that date (1743) 55 years of age. — Croker.

His original acquaintance with these ladies must have been short and slight, for Mr. Walmsley’s marriage with Miss Aston, the link of the intercourse, did not take place till April 1736, (when Mr. Walmsley was 56), about which time Johnson had removed to Edial, as he did in the following year to London. — Croker.
they recollected him well when a young man, as distinguished for his complaisance.

And that his politeness was not merely occasional and temporary, or confined to the circles of Lichfield, is ascertained by the testimony of a lady, who, in a paper with which I have been favoured by a daughter of his intimate friend and physician, Dr. Lawrence, thus describes Dr. Johnson some years afterwards:

"As the particulars of the former part of Dr. Johnson's life do not seem to be very accurately known, a lady hopes that the following information may not be unacceptable. — She remembers Dr. Johnson on a visit to Dr. Taylor, at Ashbourn, some time between the end of the year 37, and the middle of the year 40; she rather thinks it to have been after he and his wife were removed to London. During his stay at Ashbourn, he made frequent visits to Mr. Boothby, and to Mr. Meer Brabazon, who was much desired by the ladies of the family, who were, perhaps, in point of elegance and accomplishments, inferior to few of those with whom he was afterwards acquainted. Mr. Meynell's eldest daughter was afterwards married to Mr. Fitzherbert, father to Mr. Alleyn Fitzherbert, lately minister to the court of Russia [and since Lord St. Helens]. Of her, Dr. Johnson said in Dr. Lawrence's study, that she had the best understanding he ever met with in any human being. At Mr. Meynell's he also commenced that friendship with Mrs. Hill Boothby, sister to the present Mr. Brook Boothby, which continued till her death. The young woman whom he used to call Molly Aston, was sister to Sir Thomas Aston, and daughter to a baronet; she was also sister to the wife of his friend, Mr. Gilbert Walmsley. Besides his intimacy with the above-mentioned persons, who were surely people of rank and education, while he was yet at Lichfield he used to be frequently at the house of Dr. Swinfen, a gentleman of very ancient family in Staffordshire, from which, after the death of his elder brother, he inherited a good estate. He was, besides, a physician of very extensive practice; but for want of due attention to the management of his domestic concerns, left a very large family in indigence. One of his daughters, Mrs. Desmoulins, afterwards found an asylum in the house of her old friend, whose doors were always open to the unfortunate, and who well observed the precept of the Gospel, for he "was kind to the untalented and to the evil.""

JOHNSON TO MR. GEO. HICKMAN.

Sir,—I have so long neglected to return you thanks for the favour and assistance received from you at Stourbridge, that I am afraid you have now done expecting it. I can, indeed, make no apology, but by assuring you, that I owe all, whatever was the cause of it, proceeded neither from forgetfulness, disrespect, nor ingratitude. Time has not made the sense of obligation less warm, nor the thanks I return less sincere. But while I am acknowledging one favour, I must beg another — that you would excuse the composition of the verses you desired. Be pleased to consider, that versifying against one's inclination is the most disagreeable thing in the world; and that one's own disappointment is no inviting subject; and that though the gratifying of you might have prevailed over my dislike of it, yet it proves, upon reflection, so barren, that to attempt to write upon it, is to undertake to build without materials. As I am yet unemployed, I hope you will, if any thing should offer, remember and recommend, "Sir, your humble servant, "SAM. JOHNSON."

In the forlorn state of his circumstances, he accepted of an offer to be employed as usher, in the school of Market-Bosworth, in Leicestershire, to which it appears, from one of his little fragments of a diary, that he went on foot, on the 16th of July, "Julii 16. Bosworthiam pedes petit."

But it is not true, as has been erroneously related, that he was assistant to the famous Anthony Blackwall, whose merit has been honoured by the testimony of Bishop Hurd, who was his scholar; for Mr. Blackwall (in a dialogue which she falsely I have no doubt) reports herself to have had with him. She died in 1763, in the 55th year of her age. The youngest sister married a Mr. Pro- juean (post, 24 Jan. 1770). — CROKER.

3 Mr. Boswell should not have admitted this uncharitable insinuation of an anonymous informant against poor Mrs. Des- moulins; who was, probably, not popular with "the ladies of Lichfield." She is supposed to have forfeited the protection of her own family by, what they thought, a derogatory marriage with a writing-master. She and her son were in close and grateful attendance on Johnson in his last days, and she was watching him at the moment of death. — CROKER.

4 Mr. Nichols, on the authority of this letter to Mr. HICK- man, who was master of the Grammar School at Stour- bridge, thought that Johnson had at this time made a fruitless attempt to obtain the situation of usher there. (Literary Anecdotes, vol. viii. p. 416.) But I do not think that the letter itself is quite conclusive on this point. His failure in such an object would be a strange theme for a poetical com- pliment. See post, p. 32, n. 4. — CROKER.

5 There is here (as Mr. James Boswell observes to me) a slight indication of Bishop Hurd, in his Epitome Introductorius prefixed to his Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry, &c., does not praise Blackwell, but the Rev. Mr. Budworth, head- master of the Grammar School at Lichfield, who had himself been bred under Blackwell. — M. LOONE. We shall see presently (p. 54, n. 1), on the authority of Mr. Nichols, that Johnson proposed himself to Mr. Budworth, as an assist- ant. — CROKER.
He continued to live as Mr. Hector's guest for about six months, and then hired lodgings in another part of the town, finding himself as well situated at Birmingham as he supposed he could be anywhere, while he had no settled plan of life, and very scanty means of subsistence. He made some valuable acquaintances there, amongst whom were Mr. Porter, a mercer, whose wife he afterwards married, and Mr. Taylor, who, by his ingenuity in mechanical inventions, and his success in trade, acquired an immense fortune. But the comfort of being near Mr. Hector, his old schoolfellow and intimate friend, was Johnson's chief inducement to continue here.

In what manner he employed his pen at this period, or whether he derived from it any pecuniary advantage, I have not been able to ascertain. He probably got a little money from Mr. Warren; and we are certain, that he executed here one piece of literary labour, of which Mr. Hector has favoured me with a minute account. Having mentioned that he had read at Pembroke College a Voyage to Abyssinia, by Lobo, and a Portuguese Jesuit, and that he thought an abridgment and translation of it from the French into English might be an useful and profitable publication, Mr. Warren and Mr. Hector joined in urging him to undertake it. He accordingly agreed; and the book not being to be found in Birmingham, he borrowed it of Pembroke College. A part of the work being very soon done, one Osborn, who was Mr. Warren's printer, was set to work with what was ready, and Johnson engaged to supply the press with copy as it should be wanted; but his constitutional indolence soon prevailed, and the work was at a stand.

Mr. Hector, who knew that a motive of humanity would be the most prevailing argument with his friend, went to Johnson, and represented to him that the printer could have no other employment till this undertaking was finished, and that the poor man and his family were suffering. Johnson, upon this, exerted the powers of his mind, though his body was relaxed. He lay in bed with the book, which was a quarto, before him, business, his uit's Wisconsin companionship. After some months at the college, he came to London, where he lodged at the sign of the Cuckoo, in the Strand, being attended by his housekeeper, Mrs. Porter, and her servants. He soon found that he was not suited to the society of the college, and that he was not able to support himself on his own means. Therefore he resolved to seek another occupation, and to try his fortune in a literary career. He accordingly obtained a situation as a schoolmaster, and engaged to teach English and Latin at a small salary. He soon found, however, that his abilities were not sufficiently cultivated to enable him to carry on a successful profession, and he determined to turn his attention to literature. He accordingly applied himself to the study of the classics, and made rapid progress in his acquisitions. He was soon invited to join the literary circle of Sir Wolstan Dixie, the patron of the school, in whose house he had been previously employed. He accepted the invitation, and immediately set to work upon the composition of his Life of Johnson, which he was to publish in the following year.

1 See Gent. Mag., Dec. 1784, p. 348. — Boswell. But see and, p. 18, n. 3, that Boswell did not mean to deposit this statement as fact: it is a mistake.

2 This portion of Johnson's life is involved in great obscurity. Mr. Malone states, that he had read a letter of Johnson's to Lord Halifax, on July 26, 1732, saying, that he had then recently left Sir Wolstan Dixie's house, and had some hopes of succeeding, either as master or usher, in the school of Abbeville. Now if Mr. Boswell be right in applying the entry in Johnson's diary of July 16, 1732, to his first visit to Bosworth, his surmise must have been more than ten days; a time too short to be characterized as "a period of complicated misery," and to be remembered during a long life with the advantage of so many amiable qualities and the evidence of their excellency. It is the walk to Bosworth, on the 15th July, 1732, was not his first appearance there, but that having been called there to Lichfield to receive his share of his father's property (which we have just seen that he did on the 15th July), he returned to Bosworth on the 15th, perhaps for the purpose of making his final arrangements for leaving it, which he did within ten days. The Memoirs already quoted say that "he went to Bosworth immediately after he had left Oxford, and remained there much longer than was expected by any one who knew him, assiduously employed in the pursuit of intellectual acquisition," but we have seen that he was "unemployed" at Lichfield in October, 1721. — Boswell.
and dictated while Hector wrote. Mr. Hector carried the sheets to the press, and corrected almost all the proof sheets, very few of which were even seen by Johnson. In this manner, with the aid of Mr. Hector’s active friendship, the book was completed, and was published in 1735, with Loudon upon the title-page, though it was in reality printed at Birmingham, a device too common with provincial publishers. For this work he had from Mr. Warren only the sum of five guineas.

This being the first, prose work of Johnson, it is a curious object of enquiry how much may be traced in it of that style which marks his subsequent writings with such peculiar excellence; with so happy an union of force, vivacity, and perspicuity. I have perused the book with this view, and have found that here, as I believe in every other translation, there is in the work itself no vestige of the translator’s own style; for the language of translation being adapted to the thoughts of another person, insensibly follows their cast, and, as it were, runs into a mould that is ready prepared.

“I lived here above a year, and completed my studies in divinity; in which time some letters were received from the fathers of Ethiopia, with an account that Sultan Segned, Emperor of Abyssinia, was converted to the church of Rome; that many of his subjects had followed his example, and that there was a great want of missionaries to improve these prosperous beginnings. Every body was very desirous of seconding the zeal of our fathers, and of sending them the assistance they requested; to which we were the more encouraged, because the Emperor’s letter informed our Provincial, that we might easily enter his dominions by the way of Dancala; but, unhappily, the secretary wrote Geila for Dancala, which cost two of our fathers their lives.”

Every one acquainted with Johnson’s manner will be sensible that there is nothing of it here; but that this sentence might have been composed by any other man. But, in the Prefae the Johnsonian style begins to appear; and though use had not yet taught his wing a permanent and equable flight, there are parts of it which exhibit his best manner in full vigour. I had once the pleasure of examining it with Mr. Edmund Burke, who confirmed me in this opinion, by his superior critical sagacity, and was, I remember, much delighted with the following specimen:—

1 This very extract was published in the Memoirs as an early specimen of Johnson’s peculiar style, long before Mr. Boswell’s notice of it. — Croker, 1846.

3 May we not trace a fanciful similarity between Politian and Johnson? Huetina, speaking of Paulus Pelissonius Fontanerius, says, “in quo natura, ut olim in Angelo Politiano, fictious; whatever he relates, whether true or not, is at least probable; and he who tells nothing exceeding the bounds of probability, has a right to demand that they should believe him who cannot contradict him.

“He appears, by his modest and unaffected narration, to have described things as he saw them, to have copied nature from the life, and to have consulted his senses, not his imagination. He meets with no basilisks that destroy with their eyes, his crocodiles devour their prey without tears, and his cataracts fall from the rocks without deafening the neighbouring inhabitants.

“The reader will here find no regions cursed with irremediable barrenness, or blest with spontaneous fecundity; no perpetual gloom, or unceasing sunshine; nor are the nations here described either devoid of all sense of humanity, or consummate in all private or social virtues. Here are no Hottentots without religious policy or articulate language; no Chinese perfectly polite, and completely skilled in all sciences; he will discover, what will always be discovered by a diligent and impartial inquirer, that whatever human nature is to be found, there is a mixture of vice and virtue, a contest of passion and reason; and that the Creator doth not appear partial in his distributions, but has balanced, in most countries, their particular inconveniences by particular favours.”

Here we have an early example of that brilliant and energetic expression, which, upon innumerable occasions in his subsequent life, justly impressed the world with the highest admiration. Nor can any one, conversant with the writings of Johnson, fail to discern his hand in this passage of the Dedication to John Warren, Esq., of Pembroke-shire, though it is ascribed to Warren the bookseller:—

“A generous and elevated mind is distinguished by nothing more certainly than an eminent degree of curiosity; nor is that curiosity ever more agreeably or usefully employed, than in examining the laws and customs of foreign nations. I hope, therefore, the present I now presume to make will not be thought improper; which, however, it is not my business as a dedicator to commend, nor as a bookseller to deprecate.”

It is reasonable to suppose, that his having been thus accidentally led to a particular study of the history and manners of Abyssinia, was the remote occasion of his writing, many years afterwards, his admirable philosophical tale, the principal scene of which is laid in that country.

Johnson returned to Lichfield early in 1734, and in August that year he made an attempt to procure some little subsistence by his pen; for he published proposals for printing by subscription the Latin Poems of Politian:—‘An-

In this learned masquerade of “Paulus Pelissonius Fontanerius,” we have some difficulty in detecting Madame de Serigne’s friend, Pelisson, of whom M. de Guilleragues used the phrase, which has since grown into a proverb, "qu’il abusait de la permission qu’ont les hommes d’étre bouffis."
JOHNSON TO CAVE.

"Nov. 29, 1734.

Sir,—As you appear no less sensible than your readers of the defects of your poetical article, you will not be displeased, if, in order to the improvement of it, I communicate to you the sentiments of a person who will undertake, on reasonable terms, sometimes to fill a column.

His opinion is, that the public would not give you a bad reception, if, beside the current wit of the article, which the critical examination would generally reduce to a narrow compass, you admitted not only poems, inscriptions, &c. never printed before, which he will sometimes supply you with, but likewise short literary dissertations in Latin or English, critical remarks on authors ancient or modern, forgotten poems that deserve revival, or loose pieces, like Floyer's, worth preserving. By this method, your literary article, for so it might be called, will, he thinks, be better recommended to the public than by low jests, awkward buffoonery, or the dull scruffineries of either party.

"If such a correspondence will be agreeable to you, be pleased to inform me in two posts what the conditions are on which you shall expect it. Your late offer gives me no reason to distrust your generosity. If you engage in any literary projects besides this poem, I have other designs to impart, if I could be secure from having others reap the advantage of what I should hint.

"Your letter, by being directed to S. Smith, to be left at the Castle in Birmingham, will reach "Your humble servant.

Mr. Cave has put a note on this letter, "Answered Dec. 2." But whether any thing was done in consequence of it we are not informed.

Johnson had, from his early youth, been sensible to the influence of female charms. When at Stourbridge school, he was much enamoured of Olivia Lloyd, a young quaker, to whom he wrote a copy of verses, which I have not been able to recover; but with what facility and elegance he could warble the amorous lay, will appear from the following lines which he wrote for his friend Mr. Edmund Hector:

VERSES TO A LADY, ON RECEIVING FROM HER A SPRING OF MYRTLE.

"What hopes, what terrors does thy gift create,
Ambiguous emblem of uncertain fate?

The myrtle, ensign of supreme command,
Consign'd by Venus to Melissa's hand;
Not less capricious than a reigning fair,
Now grants, and now rejects, a lover's prayer.

In myrtle shades oft sings the happy swain,
In myrtle shades despairing ghosts complain;"
This was experienced by Johnson, when he became the fervent admirer of Mrs. Porter, after her first husband's death. Miss Porter told me, that when he was first introduced to her mother, his appearance was very forbidding: he was then lean and lank, so that his immense structure of bones was hideously striking to the eye, and the scars of the scrofula were deeply visible. He also wore his hair, which was straight and still, and separated behind; and he often had, seemingly, convulsive starts and odd gesticulations, which tended to excite at once surprise and ridicule. 3 Mrs. Porter was so much engaged by his conversation, that she overlooked all these external disadvantages, and said to her daughter, "This is the most sensible man that I ever saw in my life." Though Mrs. Porter was double the age of Johnson 4, and her person and manner, as described to me by the late Mr. Garrick, were by no means pleasing to others; she must have Wishing you multos et felices annos, I shall subscribe myself your obliged humble servant, E. Hecro. Birmingham, Jan. 5, 1783.

In 1735 Mr. Walmsley endeavoured to procure Johnson the mastership of the grammar-school at Solihull, in Warwickshire. This and the cause of failure appear by the following curious letter, addressed to Mr. Walmsley, and preserved in the records of Pembroke College:

Solihull, ye 30 August, 1735. Sir, — I was favoured with yours of ye 13th inst. in due time, but deferred answering it till now, it being desired by Mr. Johnson to have it by return of post. I have enclosed the flores of [the school] of the contents thereof; and before they would return an Answer, desired some time to make enquiry of ye Master of the School, who, when I next met him, desired an Account, and upon that account desires much better than to be schoolmaster of Solihull. But then he has the character of being a very haughty, ill-educated gent., and yt he has such a way of distorting his face (as though he can't) ye gent, think it may affect some young lads; for these two reasons he is not approved of, ye late master Mr. Crompton's halting the flores being still in their memory. However we are all extremely obliged to you for thinking of us, and for proposing such a good a servant, but more especially the very humble servant,

HENRY GREWOLD.

It was probably prior to this that an attempt to obtain the situation of assistant in Mr. Budworth's school, at Brewood, had also failed, and for the same reasons. Mr. Budworth presented his situation at Brewood, by way of engagement from an apprehension that the paralytic affection under which Johnson laboured might become the object of imitation or ridicule amongst his pupils. This anecdote, Captain Budworth, his grandson, (who afterwards married Miss Palmer, and took her name), confirmed to Mr. Nichols.

COOKES.

5 Johnson's countenance, when in a good humour, was not diacreatable:— his face clear, his complexion good, and his features not ill-formed, many ladies have thought they might not be unattractive when he was young. Much misrepresentation has prevailed on this subject. — Fanny.

6 Though there was a great diversity of years between her and Dr. Johnson, she was not quite so old as she is here represented, being only at the time of her marriage in his forty-eighth year, as appears by the following extract from the parish register of Great Peatling, in Leicestershire:—

Anno Dom. 1696-9. Elizabeth, the daughter of William Jervis, Esq, and Mrs. Anne his wife, was born the 26th day of February and sau'd, baptized 16th day of the same month, by Mr. Smith, Curate of Little Peatling. John Allen, Vicar, "M. A."

7 Malone, however, in his unpolite manners, probably made him look older than he really was, and diminished his appearance. — Cookes.

8 That in Johnson's eyes she was handsome, appears from the epitaph which he caused to be inscribed on her tombstone, not long before his own death, and which will be found in a subsequent page, under the year 1759. The following account of Mrs. Johnson, and her family, is copied from a paper, written by Mr. Howze, in 1762. The following notice has been recommended by her to Mr. Hoole, the translator of Metastasis, &c:—

Mrs. Williams's account of Mrs. Johnson was, that she had a good understanding, and great sensibility, but inclined had a superiority of understanding and talents, as she certainly inspired him with more than ordinary passion; and she having signified her willingness to accept of his hand, he went to Lichfield to ask his mother's consent to the marriage; which he could not but think of with conceptions was a very imprudent scheme, both on account of their disparity of age, and her want of fortune. But Mr. Johnson knew too well the arch of Boswell's temper, and was too tender a parent to oppose his inclinations.

I know not for what reason the marriage ceremony was not performed at Birmingham; but a resolution was taken that it should be at Derby, for which place the bride and bridegroom set out on horseback, I suppose in very good humour. But though Mr. Topham Beauclerk used ardently to mention Johnson's having told him, with much gravity, "Sir, it was a love-marriage on both sides," I have had from my illustrious friend the following curious account of their journey to church upon the nuptial morn [9th July]: — "Sir, she had read the old romances, and had got into her head the fantastical notion that a woman of spirit should use her lover like a dog. So, sir, at first she told me that I rode too fast, and she could not keep up with me; and, when I rode a little slower, she passed me, and complained that I lagged behind. I was not to be made the slave of caprice; and I resolved to begin as I meant to end. I therefore pushed on briskly, till I was fairly out of her sight. The road lay between two hedges, so I was sure she could not miss it; and I contrived that she should soon come up with me. When she did, I observed her to be in tears."

This, it must be allowed, was a singular beginning of conjugal felicity; but there is no doubt, that Johnson, though he thus showed a manly firmness, proved a most affectionate and indulgent husband to the last moment of Mrs. Johnson's life; and in his Prayers and Meditations, we find very remarkable evidence that his regard and fondness for her never ceased after her death. 2

He now set up a private academy, for which purpose he hired a large house, well situated near his native city. 3 In the Gentleman's Magazine for 1796 there is the following advertisement: —

"At Erival, near Lichfield, in Staffordshire, young gentlemen are instructed in the Latin and Greek languages, by samuel johnson." 4

But the only pupils that were put under his care were the celebrated David Garrick and his brother George, and a Mr. Offley, 5 a young gentleman of good fortune, who died early. As yet, his name had nothing of that celebrity which afterwards commanded the highest attention and respect of mankind. Had such an advertisement appeared after the publication of his London, or his Rambler, or his Dictionary, how would it have burst upon the world! with what eagerness would the great and the wealthy have embraced an opportunity of putting their sons under the learned tuition of Samuel Johnson! The truth, however, is, that he was not so well qualified for being a teacher of elements and a conductor in learning by regular gradations, as men of inferior powers of mind. His own acquisitions had been made by fits and starts, by violent irritations into the regions of knowledge; and it could not be expected that his impatience would be subdued, and his impetuousity restrained, so as to fit him for a quiet guide to novices. The art of communicating instruction, of whatever kind, is much to be valued; and I have ever thought that those who devote themselves to this employment, and do their duty with diligence and success, are entitled to very high respect from the community, as Johnson himself often maintained. Yet I am of opinion, that the greatest abilities are not only not required for this office, but render a man less fit for it. While we acknowledge the justness of Thomson's beautiful remark, —

To escape the angry notice of the widow's family and friends seems an obviously sufficient reason. — Croker.

For instance: — "Wednesday, March 26, 1770. "This is the day [17th, O. S.] on which, in 1792, I was deprived of poor dear Tetty. Having left off the practice of thinking on her with some particular combinations, I have recalled her to my mind of late less frequently; but when I recollect the time in which we lived together, my grief for her departure is not abated; and I have less pleasure in any good that befals me, because she does not partake it. On many occasions, I think what she would have said or done.

When I saw the sea at Breatthelstone, I wished for her to have seen it with me. But, with respect to her, so rational a wish: she might, indeed, but that we may meet at last where the mercy of God shall make us happy, and perhaps make us instrumental to the happiness of each other. It is now eighteen years." — Prayers and Med., p. 50, 51. — Croker.

3 This project must have been formed before his marriage, for the advertisement appears in the magazine for June and July, 1760. It is possible that the obvious advantage of having a woman of experience to superintend an establishment of this kind may have had some influence with Johnson; but even if it had, such powers could not excuse her having made so disproportionate an alliance. — Croker.

4 A view of "Jedidiah Hall, the residence of Dr. Samuel Johnson," is given in Harwood's History of Lichfield, 1808, where it is stated that "the house has undergone no material alteration since it was inhabited by this illustrious tenant." — Croker.

5 The Memoirs mention Dr. Hawkinsworth as one of his pupils, and seems to imply (as, indeed, does Mr. Garrick's subsequent testimony) that there were more. — Croker.
Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
To teach the young idea how to shoot!

we must consider that this delight is perceptible only by "a mind at ease," a mind at once calm and clear; but that a mind gloomy and impetuous, like that of Johnson, cannot be fixed for any length of time in minute attention, and must be so frequently irritated by unavoidable slowness and error in the advances of scholars, as to perform the duty, with little pleasure to the teacher, and no great advantage to the pupils. Good temper is a most essential requisite in a preceptor. Horace paints the character as bland:

Doctores, elementa velint ut discere prima.

Johnson was not more satisfied with his situation as the master of an academy, than with that of the usher of a school; we need not wonder, therefore, that he did not keep his academy above a year and a half. From Mr. Garrick's account, he did not appear to have been profoundly reverenced by his pupils. His oddities of manner, and uncouth gesticulations, could not but be the subject of merriment to them; and, in particular, the young rogues used to listen at the door of his bedchamber, and peep through the key-hole, that they might turn into ridicule his tumultuous and awkward fondness for Mrs. Johnson, whom he used to name by the familiar appellation of Tetty or Tetsy, which, like Betty or Betsey, is provincially used as a contraction for Elizabeth, her Christian name, but which to us seems ludicrous, when applied to a woman of her age and appearance. Mr. Garrick described her to me as very fat, with a bosom of more than ordinary protuberance, with swelled cheeks, of a florid red, produced by thick painting, and increased by the liberal use of cordials; flaring and fantastic in her dress, and affected both in her speech and her general behaviour. I have seen Garrick exhibit her, by his exquisite talent of mimicry, so as to excite the heartiest bursts of laughter; but he, probably, as is the case in all such representations, considerably aggravated the picture.

That Johnson well knew the most proper course to be pursued in the instruction of youth is authentically ascertained by the following paper in his own handwriting, given about this period to a relation, and now in the possession of Mr. John Nichols:

SCHEDULE FOR THE CLASSES OF A GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

When the introduction, or formation, of nouns and verbs, is perfectly mastered, let them learn Cordierius by Mr. Clarke, beginning at the same time to translate out of the introduction, that by this means they may learn the syntax. Then let them proceed to Erasmus, with an English translation, by the same author.

Class II. learns Eutropius and Cornelius Nepos, or Justin, with the translation.

N.B. The first class gets for their part every morning the rules which they have learnt before, and in the afternoon learns the Latin rules of the nouns and verbs. They are examined in the rules which they have learnt, every Thursday and Saturday.

The second class does the same whilst they are in Eutropius; afterwards their part is in the irregular nouns and verbs, and in the rules for making and scanning verses. They are examined as the first.

Class III. Ovid's Metamorphoses in the morning, and Caesar's Commentaries in the afternoon.

Practise in the Latin rules till they are perfect in them; afterwards in Mr. Leeds's Greek Grammar. Examined as before. Afterwards they proceed to Virgil, beginning at the same time to write themes and verses, and to learn Greek; from thence passing on to Horace, &c., as shall seem most proper.

I know not well what books to direct you to, because you have not informed me what study you will apply yourself to. I believe it will be most for your advantage to apply yourself wholly to the languages, till you go to the university. The Greek authors I think it best for you to read are these:—

Cebes.
Elian.
Lucian, by Leeds.
Xenophon.
Homeric.
Theocritus.
Euripides.

Attic.
Ionic.
Doric.
Attic and Doric.

Thus you will be tolerably skilled in all the

In Loggan's drawing of the company at Tunbridge Wells, in 1748, engraved and published in Richardson's Correspondence, Mrs. Johnson's figure is not inferior to that of the other ladies (some of whom were fashionable beauties) either in shape or dress; but it is a slight sketch, and too small and indistinct to be relied upon for details. — Croker.

5. Mr. Boswell was mistaken in supposing this to have been

"The greatest and most necessary task still remains, to attain a habit of expression, without which knowledge is little profit. This is necessary in Latin, and more necessary in English; and can only be acquired by a daily imitation of the best and correctest authors.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

While Johnson kept his academy, there can be no doubt that he was insensibly furnishing his mind with various knowledge; but I have not discovered that he wrote any thing except a great part of his tragedy of Irene. Mr. Peter Garrick, the elder brother of David, told me that he remembered Johnson’s borrowing the Turkish History 1 of him, in order to form his play from it. When he had finished some part of it, he read what he had done to Mr. Walmesley, who objected to his having already brought his heroine into great distress, and asked him, “How can you possibly contrive to plunge her into deeper calamity?” Johnson, in sly allusion to the supposed oppressive proceedings of the court of which Mr. Walmesley was registrar, replied, “Sir, I can put her into the Spiritual Court!”

Mr. Walmesley, however, was well pleased with this proof of Johnson’s abilities as a dramatic writer, and advised him to finish the tragedy, and produce it on the stage.

JOHNSON now thought of trying his fortune in London, the great field of genius and exertion, where talents of every kind have the fullest scope and the highest encouragement. It is a memorable circumstance, that his pupil, David Garrick, went thither at the same time, with intent to complete his education and follow the profession of the law, from which he was soon diverted by his decided preference for the stage.

This joint expedition of those two eminent men to the metropolis was many years afterwards noticed in an allegorical poem on Shakspere’s mulberry tree, by Mr. Lovibond, the ingenious author of “The Tears of Old-Mayday.”

They were recommended to Mr. Colson, an eminent mathematician and master of an academy, by the following letter from Mr. Walmesley:

TO THE REV. JOHN COLSON.

"Lichfield, March 5. 1735-6.

"Dear Sir,—I had the favour of yours, and am extremely obliged to you; but I cannot say I had a greater affliction for you upon it than I had before, being long since so much indebted to you, as well by an early friendship, as by your many excellent and valuable qualifications; and, had I a son of my own, it would be my ambition, instead of sending him to the university, to dispose of him as this young gentleman is.

"He, and another neighbour of mine, one Mr. Samuel Johnson, set out this morning for London together. Davy Garrick to be with you early the next week, and Mr. Johnson to try his fate with the tragedy, and to see to get himself employed in some translation, either from the Latin or the French. Johnson is a very good scholar and poet, and I have great hopes will turn out a fine tragedy-writer. If to complete his education and prepare for the bar, could not have been in such indigent circumstances.—CROKER.

3 Edward Lovibond was a gentleman, residing at Hampton, whose works were little known in his own day, and are now quite and deservedly neglected, though Dr. Anderson has introduced them into the Scotch edition of the British Poets, with a life of the author, in a strain of the most hyperbolic and ridicule. If I am correct, his ‘Ibidus’ was written in 1733.

4 The Rev. John Colson, educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, became, in 1709, first master of the free school at Rochester. In 1719, he was appointed Lucasian Professor of Mathematics, and died in December, 1759. Mrs. Piozzi, and after her Mr. Malone, have stated that the character of Géridus, in the 24th Rambler, was meant to represent Mr. Colson; but this is a mistake. It does not appear that Johnson ever saw Professor Colson, who resided at Rochester; but there was, as we shall see hereafter, a Mr. Coulson, an acquaintance of Johnson’s, fellow of University College, Oxford, and a very eccentric man, who, at first supposed, might have offended Johnson somewhat peculiar traits for his Géridus. But my venerable friend, Dr. Fisher, formerly of University College, and lately Master of the Charter House, was intimate with both Mr. Coulson and Piozzi, informed me that the character of Géridus had no resemblance to this Mr. Colson, whom, moreover, Johnson had never seen till after he had written the Rambler.—CROKER, 1845.
it should any way lie in your way, doubt not that you would be ready to recommend and assist your countryman.

"G. WALMESLEY."

How he employed himself upon his first coming to London is not particularly known. I never heard that he found any protection or encouragement by the means of Mr. Colson, to whose academy David Garrick went. Mrs. Lucy Porter told me, that Mr. Walmesley gave him a letter of introduction to Lintot, his bookseller, and that Johnson wrote some things for him; but I imagine this to be a mistake, for I have discovered no trace of it, and I am pretty sure he told me, that Mr. Cave was the first publisher by whom his poems was engaged in London.

He had a little money when he came to town, and he knew how he could live in the cheapest manner. His first lodgings were at the house of Mr. Norris, a staymaker, in Exeter Street, adjoining Catherine Street, in the Strand. "I dined," said he, "very well for eight-pence, with very good company, at the Pine-Apple in New Street just by. Several of them had travelled. They expected to meet every day; but did not know one another's name. It used to cost the rest a shilling, for they drank wine; but I had a cut of meat for sixpence, and bread for a penny, and gave the waiter a penny; so that I was quite well served, and better than the rest, for they gave the waiter nothing." 2

He at this time, I believe, abstained entirely from fermented liquors: a practice to which he rigidly conformed for many years together, at different periods of his life. 3

His Ofellus, in the Art of Living in London, I have heard him relate, was an Irish painter, whom he knew at Birmingham, and who had practised his own precepts of economy for several years in the British capital. He assured Johnson, who, I suppose, was then meditating to try his fortune in London, but was apprehensive of the expense, "that thirty pounds a year was enough to enable a man to live there without being contemptible. He allowed ten pounds for clothes and linen. He said a man might live in a garret at eighteen-pence a week; few people would inquire where he lodged; and if they did, it was easy to say, 'Sir, I am to be found at such a place.' By spending three-pence in a coffee-house, he might be for some hours every day in very good company; he might dine for sixpence, breakfast on bread and milk for a penny, and do without supper. On clean-shirt-day he went abroad, and paid visits." 6 I have heard him more than once talk of his frugal friend, whom he recollected with esteem and kindness, and did not like to have one smile at the recital. "This man," said he, gravely, "was a very sensible man, who perfectly understood common affairs: a man of a great deal of knowledge of the world, fresh from life, not strained through books. He borrowed a horse and ten pounds at Birmingham. Finding himself master of so much money, he set off for West Chester, in order to get to Ireland. He returned the horse, and probably the ten pounds too, after he had got home."

Considering Johnson's narrow circumstances in the early part of his life, and particularly at the interesting era of his launching into the ocean of London, it is not to be wondered at, that an actual instance, proved by experience, of the possibility of enjoying the intellectual luxury of social life upon a very small income, should deeply engage his attention, and be ever recollected by him as a circumstance of much importance. He amused himself, I remember, by computing how much more expense was absolutely necessary to live upon the same scale with that which his friend described, when the value of money was diminished by the progress of commerce. It may be estimated that double the money might now with difficulty be sufficient.

Amidst this cold obscurity, there was one brilliant circumstance to cheer him; he was well acquainted with Mr. Henry Hervey 7 one

1 Mr. P. Cunningham observes, that this letter must have been to the son of the celebrated Bernard Lintot, the latter having died 36 Feb. 1796. —Croker, 1846.

2 One curious anecdote was communicated by himself to Mr. John Nicholls. Mr. Wilcox, the bookseller, on being inform'd by him that his intention was to get his livelihood as an author, eyed his robust frame attentively, and, with a signifieant look, said, "You had better buy a porter's knot." He, however, added, "Wilcox was one of my best friends." —Boswell. Perhaps he meant that Cave was the first to whom he was regularly and constantly engaged; but Wilcox and Lintot may have employed him occasionally; and Dodsley certainly printed his London before Cave had printed anything of his last two or three trines in the Gentleman's Magazine. —Croker.

3 But if we trust Mr. Cumberland's recollection, he was about this time, or very soon after, reduced still lower: "for, painful as it is to relate," (says gentleman in his Memoirs, vol. i. p. 653.) "I have heard that illustrious scholar, Dr. Johnson, assert, and he never varied from the truth of fact, that he subsisted himself for a considerable space of time upon the scanty pittance of four-pence halfpenny per day." —Croker.

4 At this time his abstinence from wine may, perhaps, be attributed to his present situation of life. He was recollected from that indulgence by, as it appears, moral, or rather medical considerations. He found by experience that wine, though it dissipated for a moment, yet eventually aggravated the hereditary disease under which he suffered: and perhaps it may have been owing to a long course of abstinence, that his mental health seems to have been better in the latter than in the earlier portion of his life. He says, in his Prayers and Meditations, (17 Aug. 1751,) "By abstinence from wine and suppers, I obtained sudden and great relief, and had freedom of mind restored to me; which I have wanted for all this year, without being able to find any means of obtaining it." See also post, Sept. 16, 1773. Those remarks are important, because depression of spirits is too often treated on a contrary system, from ignorance of, or inattention to, what may be its real cause. —Croker.

5 Otelus was a Roman rustick whom Horace introduces as a living precept for economy. This is that version of this Irish professor of economy Johnson's Otelus. —Croker.

6 This species of economy was not confined to indifference. Swift, I think, talks of making visits on shaving-day and clean-shirt-day. —Croker.

7 The Hon. Henry Hervey, third [fourth] son of the first Earl of Bristol, [born 1708] quittd the army and took orders. He married [in 1730, Catherine the eldest] sister of Sir Thomas Aston, by whom he got the Aston Estate, and assumed the name and armes of that family. Johnson's acquaintance and kindness Johnson owed, no doubt, to his acquaintance with Mr. Walmesley, whom he called into his acquaintance with Mrs. Hervey's sister, Margaret Aston. But I doubt whether Mr. Boswell does not anticipate this intimacy with Hervey and Johnson's love of that name by some of a couple of years, —for the first of the branches of the noble family of that name, who had been quartered at Lichfield as an officer of the army, and had at this time a house in London, where Johnson was frequently entertained, and had an opportunity of meeting genteel company. Not very long before his death, he mentioned this, among other particulars of his life, which he was kindly communicating to me; and he described this early friend 'Harry Hervey,' thus: 'He was a vicious man, but very kind to me. If you call a dog Hervey, I shall love him.'

He told me he had now written only three acts of his Irene, and that he retired for some time to lodgings at Greenwich, where he proceeded in it somewhat further, and used to compose, walking in the Park; but did not stay long enough at that place to finish it.

At this period we find the following letter from him to Mr. Edward Cave, which, as a link in the chain of his literary history, it is proper to insert:

JOHNSON TO CAVE.

"Greenwich, next door to the Golden Heart, Church Street, July 12. 1757.

"Sir,—Having observed in your papers very uncommon offers of encouragement to men of letters, I have chosen, being a stranger in London, to communicate to you the following design, which, I hope, if you join in it, will be of advantage to both of us.

"The History of the Council of Trent having been lately translated into French, and published with large notes by Dr. Le Courayer, the reputation of that book is so much revived in England, that, it is presumed, a new translation of it from the Italian, together with Le Courayer's notes from the French, could not fail of a favourable reception.

"If it be answered, that the History is already in English, it must be remembered that there was the same objection against Le Courayer's undertaking, with this disadvantage, that the French had a version by one of their best translators, whereas you cannot read three pages of the English history without discovering that the style is capable of great improvements; but whether those improvements are to be expected from this attempt, you must judge from the specimen, which, if you approve the proposal, I shall submit to your examination.

"Suppose the merit of the versions equal, we may hope that the addition of the notes will turn the balance in our favour, considering the reputation of the annotator.

"Be pleased to favour me with a speedy answer, if you are not willing to engage in this scheme; and appoint me a day to wait upon you, if you are. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

It should seem from this letter, though subscribed with his own name, that he had not yet been introduced to Mr. Cave. We shall presently see what was done in consequence of the proposal which it contains.

In the course of the summer he returned to Lichfield ², where he had left Mrs. Johnson, and there he at last finished his tragedy, which was not executed with his rapidity of composition upon other occasions, but was slowly and painfully elaborated. A few days before his death, while burning a great mass of papers, he picked out from among them the original unformed sketch of this tragedy, in his own handwriting, and gave it to Mr. Langton, by whose favour a copy of it is now in my possession. It contains fragments of the intended plot, and speeches for the different persons of the drama, partly in the raw materials of prose, partly worked up into verse; as also a variety of hints for illustration, borrowed from the Greek, Roman, and modern writers. The handwriting is very difficult to be read, even by those who were best acquainted with Johnson's mode of penmanship, which at all times was very particular. The King having graciously accepted of this manuscript as a literary curiosity, Mr. Langton made a fair and distinct copy of it, which he ordered to be bound up with the original and the printed tragedy; and the volume is deposited in the King's library. His Majesty was pleased to permit Mr. Langton to take a copy of it for himself.

The whole of it is rich in thought and imagery, and happy expressions; and of the disjecta membra scattered throughout, and as yet unarranged, a good dramatic poet might avail himself with considerable advantage. I shall give my readers some specimens of different kinds, distinguishing them by the italics character:

"Nor think to say, here will I stop,
Here will I fix the limits of transgression,
Nor further tempt the avenging rage of heaven.
When guilt like this once harbours in the breast,
Those holy beings, whose unseen direction
Guides through the maze of life the steps of man, Fly the detested mansions of impiety,
And quit their charge to horror and to ruin."

A small part only of this interesting admonition is preserved in the play, and is varied, I think, not to advantage:—

"The soul once tainted with so foul a crime,
No more shall glow with friendship's hallow'd ardour,
Those holy beings whose superior care
Guides erring mortals to the paths of virtue, Affrighted at impiety like thine, Resign their charge to baseness and to ruin."

—Croker.

1 For the excesses which Dr. Johnson justly characterises as vicious, Mr. Hervey was, perhaps, as much to be pitied as blamed. He was very eccentric. See ante, p. 5. n. 1. His eldest brother was the celebrated Lord Hervey, Pope's Sporus; the next, Thomas, of whom we shall see more here.

2 Or more probably to Edial, where it seems Mrs. Johnson had remained. —Croker.

3 The library of King George III. was given, as I always have thought, under very erroneous advice, by George IV., to the British Museum. Surely the Sovereign should not have been left without a private library. —Croker.
"I feel the soft infection
Flush in my cheek, and wander in my veins, Teach me the Grecian arts of soft persuasion."

"Sure this is love, which herebefore I conceived
The dream of idle maidens, and wanton poets."

"Though no comets or prodigies foretold the ruin
Of Greece, signs which heaven must by another miracle Enable us to understand, yet might it be foreseen, by tokens no less certain, by the vices which always bring it on."

This last passage is worked up in the tragedy itself as follows: —

LEONTIUS.

"That power that kindly spreads
The clouds, a signal of impending showers,
To warm the wand’ring linnet to the shade,
Behold, without concern, expiring Greece,
And not one prodigy foretold our fate.

DEMETERS.

"A thousand horrid prodigies foretold it;
A feeble government, eluded laws,
A factious populace, luxurious nobles,
And all the maladies of sinking states.
When public villany, too strong for justice,
Shows his bold front, the harbinger of ruin,
Can brave Leontius call for airy wonders,
Which cheats interpret, and which fools regard?
When some neglected fabric nodds beneath
The weight of years, and totters to the tempest, Must heaven despatch the messengers of light,
Or wake the dead, to warn us of its fall?"

MAHOMET (to IRENE). "I have tried thee, and joy to find that thou dost merit to be loved by Mahomet, —with a mind great as his own. Sure, thou art an error of nature, and an exception to the rest of thy sex, and art immortal; for sentiments like thine were never to sink into nothing. I thought all the thoughts of the fair had been to select the graces of the day, dispose the colours of the flattering (flowing) robe, tune the voice and roll the eyes, place the gown, choose the dress, and add new roses to the fading cheek, but — sparkling."

Thus in the tragedy: —

"Illustrous maid, new wonders fix me thine;
Thy soul completes the triumphs of thy face;
I thought, forgive my fair, the noblest aim,
The strongest effort of a female soul
Was but to choose the graces of the day,
To tune the tongue, to teach the eyes to roll,
Dispose the colours of the flowing robe,
And add new roses to the faded cheek."

I shall select one other passage, on account of the doctrine which it illustrates.

IRENE observes, "that the Supreme Being will accept of virtue, whatever outward circumstances it may be accompanied with, and may be delighted with

1 See ante, p. 23. n. 1.
2 This list, Mr. Boswell placed under the date at which it was dictated to him (10th Oct. 1779). It seems more conveniently introduced here, and I have added, as far as I have varieties of worship; but is answered, That variety cannot affect that Being, who, infinitely happy in his own perfections, wants no external gratifications; nor can infinite truth be delighted with falsehood; that though he may guide or pity those who leaves in darkness, he abandons those who shut their eyes against the beams of day."

Johnson’s residence at Lichfield, on his return to it at this time, was only for three months; and as he had as yet seen but a small part of the wonders of the metropolis, he had little to tell his townsmen. He related to me [Sept. 20. 1773] the following minute anecdote of this period: — "In the last age, when my mother lived in London, there were two sets of people, those who gave the wall and those who took it; the peacable and the quarrilsome. When I returned to Lichfield, after having been in London, my mother asked me, whether I was one of those who gave the wall, or those who took it. Now it is fixed that every man keeps to the right; or, if one is taking the wall, another yields it; and it is never a dispute."

He now removed to London with Mrs. Johnson; but her daughter, who had lived with them at Edial, was left with her relations in the country.¹ His lodgings were for some time in Woodstock Street, near Hanover Square, and afterwards in Castle Street, near Cavendish Square. As there is something pleasingly interesting, to many, in tracing so great a man through all his different habitations, I shall [here]² present my readers with an exact list of his lodgings and houses, in order of time, which, in placid condescension to my respectful eu-riosity, he one evening [Oct. 10. 1779] dictated to me, but without specifying how long he lived at each.

1. Exeter-street, Catherine-street, Strand [1737].
2. Greenwich [1737].
3. Woodstock-street, near Hanover-square [1737].
4. Castle-street, Cavendish-square, No. 6. [1738].
5. Boswell-court. [1739].
6. Strand.
7. Strand again.² [1741].
8. Bow-street.
11. Holborn again [at the Golden Anchor, Holborn-bars, 1745].
12. Gough-square [1748].
13. Staple-inn [1755].
14. Gray’s-inn [1759].
15. Inner Temple-lane, No. 1. [1760].

In the progress of his life I shall have occasion to mention some of them as connected with particular incidents, or with the writing of particular parts of his works. To some, this minute attention may appear trilling; but when we consider the punctilious exactness with which the different houses in which Milton resided have been traced by the writers of his life, a similar enthusiasm may be pardoned in the biographer of Johnson.

His tragedy being by this time, as he thought, completely finished and fit for the stage, he was very desirous that it should be brought forward. Mr. Peter Garrick told me, that Johnson and he went together to the Fountain tavern, and read it over, and that he afterwards solicited Mr. Fleetwood, the patentee of Drury Lane theatre, to have it acted at his house; but Mr. Fleetwood would not accept it, probably because it was not patronised by some man of high rank; and it was not acted till 1749, when his friend David Garrick was manager of that theatre.

The Gentleman's Magazine, begun and carried on by Mr. Edward Cave, under the name of Sylvanus Urban, had attracted the notice and esteem of Johnson, in an eminent degree, before he came to London as an adventurer in literature. He told me, that when he first saw St. John's Gate, the place where that deservedly popular miscellany was originally printed, he "beheld it with reverence." I suppose, indeed, that every young author has had the same kind of feeling for the magazine or periodical publication which has first entertained him, and in which he has had first an opportunity to see himself in print, without the risk of exposing his name. I myself recollect such impressions from the Scots Magazine, which was begun at Edinburgh in the year 1739, and has been ever conducted with judgment, accuracy, and propriety. I yet cannot help thinking of it with an affectionate regard.

Johnson has dignified the Gentleman's Magazine by the importance with which he invests the life of Cave; but he has given it still greater lustre by the various admirable essays which he wrote for it.

Though Johnson was often solicited by his friends to make a complete list of his writings, and talked of doing it, I believe with a serious intention that they should all be collected on his own account, he put it off from year to year, and at last died without having done it perfectly. I have one in his own handwriting, which contains a certain number; I indeed doubt if he could have remembered every one of them, as they were so numerous, so various, and scattered in such a multiplicity of unconnected publications; nay, several of them published under the names of other persons, to whom he liberally contributed from the abundance of his mind. We must, therefore, be content to discover them, partly from occasional information given by him to his friends, and partly from internal evidence.

His first performance in the Gentleman's Magazine, which for many years was his principal source of employment and support, was a copy of Latin verses, in March, 1738, addressed to the editor in so happy a style of compliment, that Cave must have been destitute both of taste and sensibility, had he not felt himself highly gratified.

1 Johnson never could have said seriously that he looked at St. John's Gate as the printing-office of Cave, with reverence. The Gentleman's Magazine had been, at this time, but six years before the public, and its contents were, even when Johnson himself had contributed to improve it, not much entitled to reverence: Johnson's reverence would have been more justly excited by the recollections connected with the ancient Gate itself, the last relic of the once extensive and magnificent Priory of the heroic knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, so interested at the Dissolution, and destroyed by successive dilapidations? Its last prior, Sir William Weston, though compensated with the annual pension (enormous in those days) of 1000l., died of a broken heart, on Ascension-day, 1540, the very day the house was suppressed. — Croker, 1831. I learn with pleasure that this relic of antiquity, which is much dilapidated, is about to be carefully restored. — Croker, 1846.

2 While, in the course of my narrative, I enumerate his writings, I shall take care that my readers shall not be led to waver in doubt, between certainty and conjecture, with regard to their authenticity, and for that purpose shall mark with an asterisk (*) those which he acknowledged to his friends, and with a dagger (†) those which are ascertained to be his by internal evidence. When any other pieces are ascribed to him I shall give my reasons. — Boswell.

3 Taste and sensibility were very certainly not the distinguishing qualities of Cave; but was this ode, indeed, "a happy style of compliment?" Are "fronte serium in erudit" — "Laugus placenta spicula" — "Vitrix per obstantes catervas" — "Lycoris et Iris" — "Lycoris et Iris — the rose — the violet — and the rainbow — in any way appropriate to the printer of St. John's Gate, his magazine, or his antagonists? How Johnson would in later life have decided, in another, such misapplied pedantry! Mr. Murphy surmises that "this ode may have been suggested to the mind of Johnson, who had meditated a history of the modern Latin poets (see ante, p. 52.), by Casimir's ode to Pope Urban. —

* Urbane regum maxime, maxime Urbane vatum." — Croker.

It appears that he was now enlisted by Mr. Cave as a regular coadjutor in his magazine, by which he probably obtained a tolerable livelihood. At what time, or by what means, he had acquired a competent knowledge both of French and Italian, I do not know; but he was so well skilled in them, as to be sufficiently qualified for a translator. That part of his labour which consisted in emendation and improvement of the productions of other contributors, like that employed in levelling ground, can be perceived only by those who had an opportunity of comparing the original with the altered copy. What we certainly know to have been done by him in this way was the debates in both houses of Parliament, under the name of "The Senate of Lilliput," sometimes with feigned denunciations of the several speakers, sometimes with denunciations formed of the letters of their real names, in the manner of what is called anagram, so that they might easily be deciphered. Parliament then kept the press in a kind of mysterious awe, which made it necessary to have recourse to such devices. In our time it has acquired an unrestrained freedom, so that the people in all parts of the kingdom have a fair, open, and exact report of the actual proceedings of their representatives and legislators, which in our constitution is highly to be valued; though, unquestionably, there has of late been too much reason to complain of the petulance with which obscure scribblers have presumed to treat men of the most respectable character and situation.

This important article of the Gentleman's Magazine was, for several years, executed by Mr. William Guthrie, a man who deserves to be respectfully recorded in the literary annals of this country. He was descended of an ancient family in Scotland; but having a small patrimony, and being an adherent of the unfortunate house of Stuart, he could not accept of any office in the State; he therefore came to London, and employed his talents and learning as an "author by profession." His writings in history, criticism, and politics, had considerable merit. He was the first English historian who had recourse to that authentic source of information, the Parliamentary Journals; and such was the power of his political pen, that, at an early period, government thought it worth their while to keep it quiet by a pension, which he enjoyed till his death. Johnson esteemed him enough to wish that his life should be written. The debates in Parliament, which were brought home and digested by Guthrie, whose memory, though surpassed by others who have since followed him in the same department, was yet very quick and tenacious, were sent by Cave to Johnson for his revision; and, after some time, when Guthrie had attained to greater variety of employment, and the speeches were more and more curried by the accession of Johnson's genius, it was resolved that he should do the whole himself, from the scanty notes furnished by persons employed to attend in both houses of Parliament. Sometimes, however, as he himself told me, he had nothing more communicated to him than the names of the several speakers, and the part which they had taken in the debate.

CHAPTER VI.

1738—1741.

"London, a Poem." — Letters to Cave. — Endeavours to obtain the Degree of M. A. — Recommended

Thus the pale violet to the rose

And thus the changeful rainbow throws
Its varied splendours o'er the skies." — Croker.

2 French it seems early, as he translated Lobo in 1733; but he certainly never attained ease and fluency in speaking that language. We see by his communication with General Paoli (10th Oct. 1759), and a letter to a French lady, (post under Nov. 1775), — if indeed these specimens were not elaborated beforehand, — that he could write it freely. As to Italian, we have just seen (p. 25.) that he proposed to translate Father Paul from the original, and in a letter to Cave, undated, but in 1744, he gave an emission on some Italian production. His attention had, probably, been directed to that language by the volume of Petrarch mentioned ante, p. 12. — Croker.

3 They appeared under this title, for the first time, in June 1738; but as to Johnson's share in them, we shall see more presently. — Croker.

4 How much poetry he wrote I know not; but he informed me that he was the author of the beautiful little piece, "The Eagle and Robin Hood," in the collection of poems entitled, "The Union," though it is there said to be written by Alexander Scott, before the year 1690. — Boswell. Mr. P. Cunningham has seen a letter of Jos. Watson's, which states that this poem was written by his brother Tom, who edited the volume. — Croker. 1846.

5 See, in D'Israeli's Calanaisies of Authors, vol. I. p. 5., a letter from Guthrie to the minister, dated June 8. 1762, stating that a pension of £200 a-year had been "regularly and quarterly" paid him ever since the year 1743-6. Guthrie was born at Brechin, in 1708, and died in 1770. — Croker.
Thus was Johnson employed during some of the best years of his life, as a mere literary labourer "for gain, not glory," solely to obtain an honest support. He, however, indulged himself in occasional little sallies, which the French so happily express by the term jeux d'esprit, and which will be noticed in their order, in the progress of this work. But what first displayed his transcendent powers, and "gave the world assurance of the man," was his "London, a Poem, in imitation of the third Satire of Juvenal," which came out in May this year, and burst forth with a splendour, the rays of which will for ever encircle his name. Boileau had imitated the same satire with great success, applying it to Paris; but an attentive comparison will satisfy every reader, that he is much excelled by the English Juvenal. Oldham had also imitated it, and applied it to London; all which performances concur to prove, that great cities, in every age, and in every country, will furnish similar topics of satire. Whether Johnson had previously read Oldham's imitation I do not know; but it is not a little remarkable, that there is scarcely any coincidence found between the two performances, though upon the very same subject. The only instances are, in describing London as the sink of foreign worthlessness:

1. "the common shore,
   Where France does all her filth and ordure pour."
   Oldham.

2. "The common shore of Paris and of Rome."
   Johnson.

And,

1. "No calling or profession comes amiss,
   A needly monsieur can be what he please."
   Oldham.

2. "All sciences a fasting monsieur knows."
   Johnson.

The particulars which Oldham has collected, both as exhibiting the horrors of London, and of the times, contrasted with better days, are different from those of Johnson, and in general well chosen, and well expressed.1

1. It is hardly fair to compare the poems in this antagonist way: Boileau's was a mere badinage, complaining of, or rather laughing at, the personat dangers and inconveniences of Paris. Johnson's main object, like Juvenal's, was to satirize gravely the moral depravity of an overgrown city. — Cockburn.

2. I own it pleased me to find amongst them one trait of the manners of the age in London, in the last century, to

There are in Oldham's imitation, many prosaic verses and bad rhymes, and his poem sets out with a strange inadvertent blunder:

1. "Though much concerned to leave my old dear friend,
   I must, however, his design commend
   Of fixing in the country."

2. It is plain he was not going to leave his friend; his friend was going to leave him. A young lady at once corrected this with good critical sagacity, to

3. "Though much concerned to lose my old dear friend."

There is one passage in the original better transfused by Oldham than by Johnson:

1. "Nil habet infelix paupertas durius in se, Quam quod ridiculos homines facit —" which is an exquisite remark on the galling meanness and contempt annexed to poverty. Johnson's imitation is,

1. "Of all the griefs that harass the distrest, Sure the most bitter is a scornful jest."

Oldham's, though less elegant, is more just,

1. "Nothing in poverty so ill is borne,
   As its exposing men to grinning scorn."

Where or in what manner this poem was composed, I am sorry that I neglected to ascertain with precision from Johnson's own authority. He has marked upon his corrected copy of the first edition of it, "Written in 1738;" and, as it was published in the month of May in that year, it is evident that much time was not employed in preparing it for the press. The history of its publication I am enabled to give in a very satisfactory manner; and judging from myself, and many of my friends, I trust that it will not be uninteresting to my readers.

We may be certain, though it is not expressly named in the following letters to Mr. Cave, in 1738, that they all relate to it:

JOHNSON TO CAVE.

1. "Castle Street, Wednesday Morning. [March, 1738.]
   "Sir, — When I took the liberty of writing to you a few days ago, I did not expect a repetition of this same pleasure so soon; for a pleasure I shall always think it, to converse in any manner with an ingenious and candid man: but having the enclosed poem in my hands to dispose of for the benefit of the author (of whose abilities I shall say nothing, since I send you his performance), I believe I could not procure more advantageous terms from

   "shied from the sneer of English ridicule, what was, some time ago, too common a practice in my native city of Edinburgh.

   "If what I've said can't from the town affright,
   Consider other dangers of the night;
   When brick-kats are from upper stories thrown,
   And emptied chamberpots come pouring down
   From garret windows." — Boswell.
any person than from you, who have so much distinguished yourself by your generous encouragement of poetry; and whose judgment of that art nothing but your commendation of my trifle 1 can give me any occasion to call in question. I do not doubt but you will look over this poem with another eye, and reward it in a different manner from a mercenary bookseller, who counts the lines he is to purchase, and considers nothing but the bulk. I cannot help taking notice, that, besides what the author may hope for on account of his abilities, he has likewise another claim to your regard, as he lies at present under very disadvantageous circumstances of fortune. I beg, therefore, that you will favour me with a letter to-morrow, that I may know what you can afford to allow him, that he may either part with it to you, or find out (which I do not expect) some other way more to his satisfaction.

"I have only to add, that as I am sensible I have transcribed it very coarsely, which, after having altered it, I was obliged to do, I will, if you please, transmit the sheets from the press, correct it for you; and take the trouble of altering any stroke of satire which you may dislike.

"By exerting on this occasion your general generosity, you will not only encourage learning, and relieve distress, but (though it be in comparison of the other motives of very small account) oblige, in a very sensible manner, Sir, your very humble servant,

"S. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON TO CAVE.

"Monday, No. 6. Castle Street. [March, 1738.]

"Sir, — I am to return you thanks for the present you were so kind as to send by me, and to entreat that you will be pleased to inform me, by the penny-post, whether you resolve to print the poem, bearing my name. If you do, I will send the post, with a note to Doddsly, I will go and read the lines to him, that we may have his consent to put his name in the title-page. As to the printing, if it can be set immediately before you, I will be so much the author's friend, as not to content myself with mere solicitations in his favour. I propose, if my calculation be near the truth, to engage for the reimbursement of all that you shall lose by an impression of five hundred; provided, as you very generously propose, that the profit, if any, be set aside for the author's use, excepting the present you made, which, if he be a gainer, it is fit he should repay. I beg that you will let one of your servants write an exact account of the expense of such an impression, and send it with the poem, that I may know what I engage for. I am very sensible, from your generosity on this occasion, of your regard to learning, even in its unhappiest state; and cannot but think such a tender deserving of the gratitude of those who suffer so often from a contrary disposition. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

"S. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON TO CAVE. [April, 1738.]

"Sir, — I waited on you to take the copy to Doddsly's: as I remember the number of lines which it contains, it will be no longer than Juvenal's, with the quotations, which must be subjoined at the bottom of the page; part of the beauty of the performance (if any beauty be allowed it) consisting in adapting Juvenal's sentiments to modern facts and persons. It will, with those additions, very conveniently make five sheets. And since the expense will be no more, I shall contentedly insist on what I mentioned in my last. If it be not therefore gone to Doddsly's, I beg it may be sent me by the penny-post, that I may have it in the evening. I have composed a Greek epigram to Eliza 4, and think she ought to be celebrated in as many different languages as Lewis le Grand.

Pray send me word when you will begin upon the poem, for it is a long way to walk. I would leave my Epigram, but have not daylight to transcribe it. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

"S. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON TO CAVE. [April, 1738.]

"Sir, — I am extremely obliged by your kind letter, and will not fail to attend you to-morrow with Irene, who looks upon you as one of her best friends.

"I was to-day with Mr. Doddsly, who declares very warmly in favour of the paper you sent him, which he desires to have a share in, if being, as he says, a credible thing to be concerned in, I knew not what answer to make till I had consulted you, nor what to demand on the author's part; but am very willing that, if you please, he should have a part in it, as he will undoubtedly be more diligent to disperse and promote it. If you can send me word to-morrow what I shall say to him, I will settle matters, and bring the poem with me for the press, which, as the town empties, we cannot be too quick with. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

"S. JOHNSON.

To us who have long known the manly force, bold spirit, and masterly versification of this poem, it is a matter of curiosity to observe the difference with which its author brought it forward into public notice, while he is so cautious as not to avow it to be his own produce.

"Mr. Cave was the means of introducing her to many authors and scholars of note; among those was Dr. Johnson. This was early in his life, and his name was then but beginning to be known, having just published his celebrated Imitations of the Third Satire of Juvenal, under the name of London. Neither this work nor his general character were as yet much known in the country; for Dr. Carter, in a letter to his daughter, dated June 25, 1738, says: 'You mention Johnson; but that is a name with which I am utterly unacquainted. Neither his scholastic, critical, nor poetical character ever reached my ears. I a little suspect his judgment, if he is very fond of Martial. Their friendship continued as long as Johnson lived.' Pennington's Life of Mrs. Carter, p. 39. — Chorley.

1 No doubt the Ode "Ad Urbanam," the publication of which, in March 1738, and that of London in May, fix the date of this and the following interesting letters. — Chorley.
2 Though Cave hesitated about publishing the poem, he seems to have relieved the pressing wants of the author by a present. — Chorley.
3 A poem, published in 1737, of which see an account, post, under April 30, 1737. — Boswell.
4 The learned Mrs. Elizabeth Carter. This lady, of whom frequent mention will be found in these Memoirs, was daughter of Nicholas Carter, D.D. She was born at Deal in 1717, and died, in Clerges Street, February 19, 1806, in her eighty-ninth year. — Malone. Her early acquaintance with Johnson is thus noticed by her nephew and biographer:
tion; and with what humility he offers to allow the printer to "alter any stroke of satire which he might dislike." That any such alteration was made, we do not know. If we did, we could not but feel an indignant regret; but how painful is it to see that a writer of such vigorous powers of mind was actually in such distress, that the small profit which so short a poem, however exceedent, could yield, was courted as a "relief"!

It has been generally said, I know not with what truth, that Johnson offered his "London" to several booksellers, none of whom would purchase it. To this circumstance Mr. Derriek 1 alludes in the following lines of his "Fortune, a Rhapsody":—

"Will no kind patron Johnson own?
Shall Johnson friendless range the town?
And every publisher refuse
The offspring of his happy muse?"

But we have seen that the worthy, modest, and ingenious Mr. Robert Dodsley 2 had taste enough to perceive its uncommon merit, and thought it creditable to have a share in it. The fact is, that, at a future conference, he bargained for the whole property of it, for which he gave Johnson ten guineas, who told me, "I might, perhaps, have accepted of less; but that Paul Whitehead had a little before got ten guineas for a poem, and I would not take less than Paul Whitehead."

I may here observe, that Johnson appeared to me to undervalue Paul Whitehead upon every occasion when he was mentioned, and, in my opinion, did not do him justice; but when it is considered that Paul Whitehead was a member of a riotous and profane club 3 we may account for Johnson's having a prejudice against him. Paul Whitehead was, indeed, unfortunate in being not only slighted by Johnson, but violently attacked by Churchill, who utters the following imprecation:—

"May I (can worse disgrace on manhood fall?)
Be born a Whitehead, and baptized a Paul!"

yet I shall never be persuaded to think meanly of the author of so brilliant and pointed a satire as "Manners." 4

Johnson's "London" was published in May, 1738 5; and it is remarkable, that it came out on the same morning with Pope's satire, entitled "1738;" so that England had at once its Juvenal and Horace as poetical companions. The Rev. Dr. Douglas 6, now Bishop of Salisbury, to whom I am indebted for some obliging communications, was then a student at Oxford, and remembers well the effect which "London" produced. Every body was delighted with it; and there being no name to it, the first buzz of the literary circles was, "Here is an unknown poet, greater even than Pope." And it is recorded in the "Gentleman's Magazine" of that year, p. 260, that it "got to the second edition in the course of a week."

One of the warmest patrons of this poem on its first appearance was General Oglethorpe, whose "strong benevolence of soul" 7 was unabated during the course of a very long life; though it is painful to think, that he had but too much reason to become cold and callous, and discontented with the world, from the neglect which he experienced of his public and private worth, by those in whose power it was to gratify so gallant a veteran with marks of distinction. 8 This extraordinary person was as

1 Samuel Derrick, a native of Ireland, was born in 1724. He was apprenticed to a linen-draper, but abandoned that calling, first, for the stage, where he soon failed, and then for the literary world, in which he was highly esteemed. It is said, that he had "a great kindness" for him, and he was Boswell's "first tutor in the ways of London." In 1761, he succeeded Beau Nash in the management of the Theatre at Bath, but his extraneous character, gave him a bad name, and he was driven to abandon the stage.

2 Robert Dodsley was born in 1703. He had been a livingservant, but wrote some poems and plays, and became an eminent bookseller and publisher. He died in 1764.

3 Dr. Anderson imagined that the club alluded to in the text was "the Beef Steak Club, held in Covent Garden Theatre, and consisting of an heterogeneous mixture of peers, poets, and players," — he might have added, princes. But this jocose club, which still exists, by no means deserves the character given in the text, and there can be no doubt that Boswell meant a disolute and blasphemous association which called itself the "Monks of Medmenham Abbey," of which Lord Le Despencer, Wilkes, and this Paul Whitehead were leading members. Whitehead died in 1744, bequeathing his heart to his patron, Lord Le Despencer, who deposited it in a mausoleum in his garden, at High Wycombe.

4 In the printed and MS. catalogues of the British Museum "Manners" is strangely attributed to William Whitehead.

5 Johnson's "London," was published in May, 1738, and Savage did not set out for Wales till July, 1738. However well Johnson could defend the credibility of second sight, [post, 24 May, 1775, he did not perceive that he himself was possessed of that faculties.] Boswell. Notwithstanding these proofs, the identity of Savage and Thales has been repeated by all the biographers, and has obtained general vogue. It is therefore worth while to add the decisive fact, that if Thales had been Savage, Johnson could never have admitted into his poem two lines that point so forcibly at the drunken friar, in which Savage stabbed a Mr. Sinclair, for which he was convicted of murder:—

Provokes a brawl, and stabs you in a jest."

Mr. Murphy endeavours to reconcile the difficulties by supposing that Savage's retirement was in contemplation eighteen months before it was carried into effect; but even if this were true (which is very improbable), it would not alter the facts — that London was written before Johnson knew Savage; and that the one of the strokes in the satire touched Savage's sorest point.

6 Dr. John Douglas was a Scotchman by birth, but educated at St. Mary Hall and Balliol College, Oxford, (M.A. 1743, D.D. 1748,) and owed his first promotions to Lord Bath (to whose son he had been tutor), and his literary reputation to his detection of Landier. He was made Bishop of Carlisle in 1738, and translated to Salisbury in 1740, in which see he died in 1767.

7 James Edward Oglethorpe, born in 1698, was admitted of C. C. C. Oxford in 1714; but he soon after entered the army, and served under Prince Eugene of Savoy, and after life used to affect to talk skilfully of the great Duke of Marlborough. His activity in settling the colony of Georgia rendered him the immortal gratitude of Pope's celebrated panegyric:—

"One, driven by strong benevolence of soul,
remarkable for his learning and taste, as for his other eminent qualities; and no man was more prompt, active, and generous, in encouraging merit. I have heard Johnson gratefully acknowledge, in his presence, the kind and effectual support which he gave to his "London," though unacquainted with its author.

Pope, who then filled the poetical throne without a rival, it may reasonably be presumed, must have been particularly struck by the sudden appearance of such a poet; and to his credit let it be remembered, that his feelings and conduct on the occasion were candid and liberal. He requested Mr. Richardson, son of the painter, to endeavour to find out who this new author was. Mr. Richardson, after some enquiry, having informed him that he had discovered only that his name was Johnson, and that he was some obscure man, Pope said, "He will soon be déterré." We shall presently see, from a note written by Pope, that he was himself afterwards more successful in his enquiries than his friend.

That in this justly celebrated poem may be found a few rhymes which the critical precision of English prosody at this day would disallow cannot be denied; but with this small imperfection, which in the general blaze of its excellence is not perceived, till the mind has subsided into cool attention, it is, undoubtedly, one of the noblest productions in our language, both for sentiment and expression. The nation was then in that ferment against the court and the ministry, which some years after ended in the downfall of Sir Robert Walpole; and it has been said, that Tories are Whigs when out of place, and Whigs Tories when in place; so, as a Whig administration ruled with what force it could, a Tory opposition had all the animation and all the elocution of resistance to power, aided by the common topics of patriotism, liberty, and independence! Accordingly, we find in Johnson's "London" the most spirited invectives against tyranny and oppression, the warmest predilection for his own country, and the purest love of virtue; interspersed with traits of his own particular character and situation, not omitting his prejudices as a "true-born Englishman," not only against foreign countries, but against Ireland and Scotland. On some of these topics I shall quote a few passages:

"The cheated nation's happy fav'rites see;
Mark whom the great cares, who frown on me.

"Has heaven reserv'd, in pity to the poor,
No pathless waste, or undiscover'd shore?
No secret island in the boundless main?
No peaceful desert yet unclaim'd by Spain?
Quick let us rise, the happy seats explore,
And bear Oppression's insolence no more."

"How, when competitors like these contend, Can surly Virtue hope to find a friend?"

"This mournful truth is every where confess'd, Slow rises worth, by poverty depress'd!"

We may easily conceive with what feeling a great mind like his, cramped and galleyed by narrow circumstances, uttered this last line, which he marked by capitals. The whole of the poem is eminently excellent, and there are in it such proofs of a knowledge of the world, and of a mature acquaintance with life, as cannot be contemplated without wonder, when we consider that he was then only in his twenty-ninth year, and had yet been so little in the "busy haunts of men." Yet while we admire the poetical excellence of this poem, candour obliges us to allow, that the flame of patriotism and zeal for popular resistance with which it is fraught had no just cause. There was, in truth, no "oppression;" the "nation" was not "cheated." Sir Robert Walpole was a wise and a benevolent minister, who thought that the happiness and prosperity of a commercial country like ours would be best promoted by peace, which he accordingly maintained with cretil, during a very long period. Johnson himself afterwards [Oct. 21. 1773] honestly acknowledged the merit of Walpole, whom he called "a fixed star;" while he

In 1745 he was promoted to the rank of Major-General, and had a command during the Scotch rebellion, in the course of which he was, to say the best of it, unfortunate. Though acquitted by a court of enquiry, he never was afterwards employed. He sat in five or six parliaments, and was there considered as a high Tory; if not a Jacobite; to this may, perhaps, be referred most of the particulars of his history—his dislike of the Duke of Marlborough—the praises of Pope—his partiality towards Johnson's political poetry—the suspicion of not having done his best against the rebels—and the "neglect" of the court. He died 30th June, 1785. C. 1813. I find in Mr. Knox's "Extra-official State Papers" the following passage on Oglethorpe's military character: "Nothing is more easy than for a military commander at a distance from home to acquire a high reputation for skill and value, if he happens to be connected with an Opposition who never fail to puff off his exploits, while the ministers, for their own sake, are silent on his misconduct—so it fared with Oglethorpe." [Vol. ii. p. 15.] — Croker, 1846.

There were three Richardsons known at this period in the literary world; Sir Jonathan the elder, usually called the Painter, though he was an author as well as a painter; he died in 1746, aged 80: Sir Jonathan the younger, who is the person mentioned in the text, who also painted, though not as a profession, and who published several works; he died in 1771, aged 77: Sir Samuel, the author of the celebrated novels. He was by trade a printer, and had the good sense to continue, during the height of his fame, his attention to his business. He died in 1761, aged 72. — Croker.

3 It is, however, remarkable, that he uses the epithets which undoubtedly, since the union between England and Scotland, ought to denominate the natives of both parts of our island:

"Was early taught a Briton's right to prize."— Boswell.

4 What follows will show that Boswell himself was of opinion that "London" was dictated rather by youthful feeling, somewhat inflamed by the political frenzy of the times, than by any "knowledge of the world," or any "mature acquaintance with life." It is remarkable that Johnson, who was, in all his latter age, the most constant and enthusiastic admirer of London, should have begun life with this bitter and yet, on some topics, common-place invective against it. The truth is, he cared comparatively little about the real merits or defects of the minister or the metropolis, and only thought how best to make his poem sell. — Croker.
characterised his opponent, Pitt, as "a meteor." But Johnson's juvenile poem was naturally impregnated with the fire of opposition, and upon every account was universally admired.

Though thus elevated into fame, and conscious of uncommon powers, he had not that bustling confidence, or, I may rather say, that animated ambition, which one might have supposed would have urged him to endeavour at rising in life. But such was his inflexible dignity of character, that he could not stoop to court the great; without which, hardly any man has made his way to a high station. He could not expect to produce many such works as his "London," and he felt the hardships of writing for bread; he was therefore willing to resume the office of a schoolmaster, so as to have a sure, though moderate, income for his life; and an offer being made to him of the mastership of a school, provided he could obtain the degree of Master of Arts, Dr. Adams was applied to, by a common friend, to know whether that could be granted him as a favour from the University of Oxford. But though he had made such a figure in the literary world, it was then thought too great a favour to be asked.

Pope, without any knowledge of him but from his "London," recommended him to Earl Gower, who endeavoured to procure for him a degree at Dublin, by the following letter to a friend of Dean Swift:

"LORD GOWER TO

Trentham, Aug. 1, 1739.

Sir, Mr. Samuel Johnson (author of Lon-box's, and some other poetical pieces); is a native of this county, and such a wit, as golden gentlemen in his neighbourhood, who are trustees of a charity-school now vacant; the certain salary is sixty pounds a year, of which they are desirous to make him master; but, unfortunately, he is not capable of receiving their bounty, which would make him happy for life, by not being a master of arts; which, by the statutes of this school, the master of it must be.

Now these gentlemen do me the honour to think that I have interest enough in you, to pre-empt them to write to Dean Swift, to persuade the University of Dublin to give the honour of constituting this poor man master of arts in their University. They highly extol the man's learning, and prosely; and will not be persuaded, that the University will make any difficulty of conferring such a favour upon a stranger, if he is recommended by the Dean. They say, he is not afraid of the strictest examination, though he is of so long a journey; and will venture it, if the Dean thinks discover whether the school in question might not be fit for the employment of a gentleman so capable and noble as Mr. Johnson; that, finding the salary there insufficient, though very sufficient for the necessaries of life, he might, on the most moderate allowance for himself and his family, live, and support his genius, and produce such works as will be respectable to his city of London, and his country."

A bill written by Mr. Pope in the following year, this school is said to have been in Shropshire; but as it appeared to me, that Lord Gower, and Gower's Governor, were "some worthy gentlemen in his neighbourhood, I in my first edition suggested that Pope must have, by mistake, written Shropshire, instead of Staffordshire. But I have since been obliged to Mr. Spearing, attorney-at-law, for the following information:--"William Adams, formerly citizen and haberdasher of London, founded a school at Newport, in the county of Salop, by deed dated 27th of November, 1656, by which he granted the "yearly sum of sixty pounds to such able and learned schoolmaster, from time to time, being of godly life and conversation, who should have been educated at one of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, and had taken the degree of Master of Arts; and was well read in the Greek and Latin tongues, as also able to teach grammar, music, and to be" part of the same University, during his life, and after the decease of the said William Adams by the governors (namely, the Master and Warden of Gower's School, the City of London) and their successors. The manor and lands out of which the revenues for the maintenance of the school were paid, were at Knighton, in the county of Stafford. From the foregoing account of this foundation, particularly the circumstances of the salary being six pounds a year, the State of the State of the school, and the requisite qualification in the teacher, it seemed probable that this was the school in contemplation; and that Lord Gower endeavoured to procure for him a degree at Staffordshire and banished, out of which the revenues issued, were trustees of the charity."

The letter was the probable conjecture. But in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for May, 1733, there is a letter from Mr. H. Adams to Mr. Gower, respecting the estate of the Gower School, in Leicester, in which he writes as follows:

"I compared time and circumstance together, in order to
It was, perhaps, no small disappointment to Johnson that this respectable application had not the desired effect; yet how much reason has there been, both for himself and his country, to rejoice that it did not succeed, as he might probably have wasted in obscurity those hours in which he afterwards produced his incomparable works.

About this time he made one other effort to emancipate himself from the drudgery of authorship. He applied to Dr. Adams, to consult Dr. Smallbroke 1 of the Commons, whether a person might be permitted to practise as an advocate there, without a doctor's degree in civil law. "I am," said he, "a total stranger to these studies; but whatever is a profession, and maintains numbers, must be within the reach of common abilities, and some degree of industry." Dr. Adams was much pleased with Johnson's design to employ his talents in that manner, being confident he would have attained to great eminence. And, indeed, I cannot conceive a man better qualified to make a distinguished figure as a lawyer; for he would have brought to his profession a rich store of various knowledge, an uncommon acuteness, and a command of language, in which few could have equalled, and none have surpassed him. He who could display eloquence and wit in defence of the decision of the House of Commons upon Mr. Wilkes's election for Middlesex, and of the unconstitutional taxation of our fellow-subjects in America, must have been a powerful advocate in any cause. But here also, the want of a degree was an insurmountable bar.

He was, therefore, under the necessity of persevering in that course, into which he had been forced; and we find that his proposal from Greenwich to Mr. Cave, for a translation of Father Paul Sarpi's History, was accepted. 2

Some sheets of this translation were printed off, but the design was dropped; for it happened oddly enough, that another person of the name of Samuel Johnson, librarian of St. Martin's in the Fields, and curate of that parish, engaged in the same undertaking, and was patronised by the clergy, particularly by Dr. Pearee, afterwards Bishop of Rochester. Several light skirmishes passed between the rival translators, in the newspapers of the day; and the consequence was that they destroyed each other, for neither of them went on with the work. It is much to be regretted, that the able performance of that celebrated genius Fra Paolo, lost the advantage of being incorporated into British literature by the masterly hand of Johnson.

I have in my possession, by the favour of Mr. John Nichols, a paper in Johnson's handwriting, entitled "Account between Mr. Edward Cave and Samuel Johnson, in relation to a version of Father Paul, &c., begun August the 2d, 1738;" by which it appears, that from that day to the 21st of April, 1739, Johnson received for this work 491 l. 7s. in sums of one, two, three, and sometimes four guineas at a time, most frequently two. And it is curious to observe the minute and scrupulous accuracy with which Johnson had pasted upon it a slip of paper, which he has entitled "Small account," and which contains one article, "Sept. 9th, Mr. Cave laid down 2s. 6d." There is subjoined to this account, a list of some subscribers to the work, partly in Johnson's handwriting, partly in that of another person; and there follows a leaf or two on which are written a number of characters which have the appearance of a short-hand, which, perhaps, Johnson was then trying to learn.

3 In the Weekly Miscellany, Oct. 21, 1738, there appeared the following advertisement:

"Just published, Proposals for printing the History of the Council of Trent, translated from the Italian of Father Paul Sarpi; with the Author's Life, and Notes theological, historical, and critical, from the French edition of Dr. Le Courrier; to which are added, Observations on the History, and Notes and Illustrations from various Authors, both printed and manuscript. By S. Johnson. 1. The work will consist of two hundred sheets, and be two volumes in quarto, printed on good paper and letter. 2. The price will be 15s. each volume, to be paid, half a guinea at the delivery of the first volume, and the rest at the delivery of the second volume in sheets. Two-pence to be abated for every sheet less than two hundred. It may be had on a large paper, in three volumes, at the price of three guineas; one to be paid at the time of subscribing, another at the delivery of the first, and the rest at the delivery of the other volumes. The work is now in the press, and will be diligently prosecuted. Subscriptions are taken in by Mr. Dodley in Pall Mall, Mr. Ri-vington in St. Paul's Church Yard, by E. Cave at St. John's gate, and the Translator, at No. 6, in Castle Street, by Covent- dish Square."—Boswell.
pears to be, less need of alteration. The verses to Lady Firebrace 1 may be had when you please, for you know that such a subject neither deserves much thought nor requires it.

2 The Chinese Stories 2 may be had folded down when you please to send, in which I do not recollect that you desired any alterations to be made.

"An answer to another query I am very willing to write, and had consulted with you about it last night, if there had been time; for I think it the most proper way of inviting such a correspondence as may be an advantage to the paper, not a load upon it.

"As to the Prize Verses, a backwardness to determine their degrees of merit is not peculiar to me. You may, if you please, still have what I can say; but I shall engage with little spirit in an affair, which I shall hardly end to my own satisfaction, and certainly not to the satisfaction of the parties concerned."

"As to Father Paul, I have not yet been just to my proposal, but have met with impediments, which, I hope, are now at an end; and if you find the progress hereafter not such as you have a right to expect, you can easily stimulate a negligent translator.

"If any or all of these have contributed to your disinclination, I will entreat to remove it; and desire you to propose the question to which you wish for an answer. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

JOHNSON TO CAVE.

[Sept. 1738.]

"Sir,—I am pretty much of your opinion, that the Commentary cannot be prosecuted with any appearance of success; for as the names of the authors concerned are of more weight in the performance than its own intrinsic merit, the public will be soon satisfied with it. And I think the Examen should be pushed forward with the utmost expedition. Thus, 'This day, &c. an Examen of Mr. Pope's Essay, &c.; containing a succinct Account of the Philosophy of Mr. Leibnitz on the System of the Fatalists, with a Conutation of their Opinions, and an Illustration of the Doctrine of Free Will' (with what else you think proper).

"It will, above all, be necessary to take notice, that it is a thing distinct from the Commentary,

"I was so far from imagining they stood still, 1 that I conceived them to have a good deal beforehand, and therefore was less anxious in providing them more. But if ever they stand still on my account, it must, doubtless, be charged to me; and whatever else shall be reasonable, I shall not oppose; but beg a suspense of judgment till morning, when I must entreat you to send me a dozen proposals 3, and you shall then have copy to spare. I am, Sir, yours, imprimus, Sam. Johnson."

"Pray muster up the proposals if you can, or let the boy recall them from the booksellers.

But although he corresponded with Mr. Cave concerning a translation of Crousaz's Examen of Pope's "Essay on Man," and gave advice as one anxious for its success, I was long ago convinced by a perusal of the Preface, that this translation was erroneously ascribed to him; and I have found this point ascertained, beyond all doubt, by the following article in Dr. Birch's manuscripts in the British Museum:—

Indeed, Mrs. Carter has lately acknowledged to Mr. Seward, that she was the translator of the "Examen."

It is remarkable, that Johnson's last quoted letter to Mr. Cave concludes with a fair confession that he had not a dinner; and it is no less remarkable that, though in this state of want himself, his benevolent heart was not insensible to the necessities of an humble labourer in literature, as appears from the very next letter:

JOHNSON TO CAVE.

[No date.]

"Dear Sir,—You may remember I have formerly talked with you about a military Dictionary. The eldest Mr. Macbean 4, who was with Mr. Chambers, has very good materials for such a work, which I have seen, and will do it at a very low rate. 5 I think the terms of war and navigation might be comprised, with good explanations, in one 8vo. paper, which he is willing to do for twelve shillings a sheet, to be made up a guinea at the

It seems quite unintelligible how these six silly lines should be the production of Johnson; the last of them is—"Thou seem'st at once, bright Nymph, a Muse and Grace!"

This "Nymph, Muse, and Grace" was a widow Favers, who, in the preceding November, had, at the age of 38, re-married Sir Cordell Firebrace. She subsequently married Mr. Campbell, uncle to the Duke of Argyll, and died in 1735. The Peerage, into which her alliance with Mr. Campbell has introduced her, quotes Dr. Johnson as evidence of her beauty. Johnson, I suppose, never saw her; the lines (if his at all were) we see, to order, and probably paid for.—Croker.

2 Du Halde's Description of China was then publishing by Mr. Cave, in weekly numbers, whence Johnson was to select pieces for the embellishment of the Magazine.—Nichols.

3 The premium of forty pounds proposed for the best poem on the Divine Attributes is here alluded to.—Nichols.

The compositors in the printing-office, who waited for copy.—Nichols.

4 As Johnson seems to ask for these proposals, as affording him a pecuniary resource, they must have been the proposals for the large paper of the translation of Father Paul, for which, as we have just seen, one guinea was payable at the time of subscription. (Sept. 1738.)

5 Birch MSS. Brit. Mus. 4323. —Boswell. There is no doubt that Miss Carter was the translator of the Examen, but Johnson seems to have been busy with another work of the same author on the same subject,—a distinct thing,—as he calls it—viz. Crousaz's Commentary on the Abbé Rencard's translation of the Essay on Man. 6 an anonymous translation of which was published in 1741, and quoted in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1742.—Croker.

In 1739, beside the assistance which he gave to the Parliamentary Debates, his writings in the "Gentleman's Magazine" were the "Life of Boerhaave,"* in which it is to be observed, that he discovers that love of chemistry which never forsook him; "An Appeal to the Public in Behalf of the Editor;" † "An Address to the Reader;" ‡ "An Epigram both in Greek and Latin to Eliza" (§), and also English Verses to her (¶); and "A Greek Epigram to Dr. Birch." * It has been erroneously supposed that an essay published in that Magazine this year, entitled "The Apotheosis of Milton," was written by Johnson; and on that supposition it has been improperly inserted in the edition of his works by the booksellers, after his decease. Were there no positive testimony as to this point, the style of the performance, and the name of Shakspeare not being mentioned in an Essay professedly reviewing the principal English poets, would ascertain it not to be the production of Johnson. But there is here no occasion to resort to internal evidence; for my Lord Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. Douglas) has assured me, that it was written by Guthrie. His separate publications were, "A Complete Vindication of the Licensers of the Stage, from the malicious and scandalous Aspersions of Mr. Brooke," Author of Gustavus Vasa," being an ironical attack upon them for their suppression of that Tragedy; and "Marmor Norfolciense;" or, an Essay on an ancient prophetical Inscription, in monkish Rhyne, lately discovered near Lynn, in Norfolk, by Probus Britannicus."

In this performance, he, in a forged inscription, supposed to have been found in Norfolk, the county of Sir Robert Walpole, then the obnoxious prime minister of this country, inveighs against the Brunswick succession, and the measures of government consequent upon it. To this supposed prophecy he added a Commentary, making each expression apply to the times, with warm anti-Hanoverian zeal. This anonymous pamphlet, I believe, did not

1 Mr. Boswell is glad to record that Johnson's national prejudices did not prevent his employing and recommending a Scotchman; but I suspect Johnson's prejudice against the Scotch was of a later date. See post, p. 52, n. 1. — Croker.

2 Mr. Boswell here confounds the years 1738 and 1739. The Greek and Latin epigrams to Eliza (Miss Carter) were in the Magazine for April 1738; and another in July to the same lady, on gathering laurels in Pope's garden, is no doubt his.

3 "Elysios Popio dum huita lara per horros, Anga lauros carat Edisa manu, Nil opus est furto. Lauros tibi, dulcis Eliza, Si neget optatas Pupos, Apollo dabit."

4 Mr. Boswell observes Scenes Eliza roves, And spoils with greedy hands his laurel groves; A needless theft — a laurel wreath to thee Should Pope deny, Apollo would decrease. — C.

5 Johnson may have accompanied his young friend to Twickenham, and witnessed the incident. The same year's Magazine also contains the celebrated Latin epigram (see post, p. 631).

6 "To a Lady (Miss Martia Ashton) who spoke in Defence of Liberty," the nearest of Johnson's couplets.

7 "In Bircam."

10 This is a version of his Greek epigram in the preceding Magazine, and he had followed his Greek epigram on Eliza with a Latin paraphrase in the same style as this. — Croker.

11 Henry Brooke, the author of the celebrated novel The Fool of Quality, was a native of Ireland. In 1738, his tragedy of Gustavus Vasa was rejected by the Lord Chamberlain; but it was supposed to satirize Sir Robert Walpole, an order came from the Lord Chamberlain to prohibit its appearance. This, however, did Brooke no injury, as he was encouraged to publish the play by a subscription, which amounted to 800l. He died in 1783. — Croker.

12 The mention of this pamphlet in Pope's undated note (p. 41.) makes it worth while to notice that it seems to have been printed in May, 1739. — Croker.
make so much noise as was expected, and, therefore, had not a very extensive circulation. Sir John Hawkins relates, that “warrants were issued, and messengers employed to apprehend the author; who, though he had forborne to subscribe his name to the pamphlet, the vigilance of those in pursuit of him had discovered;” and we are informed, that he lay concealed in Lambeth-marsh till the scent after him grew cold. This, however, is altogether without foundation; for Mr. Steele, one of the Secretaries of the Treasury, who, amidst a variety of important business, politely obliged me with his attention to my enquiry, informed me, that he directed every possible search to be made in the records of the Treasury and Secretary of State's Office, but could find no trace whatever of any warrant having been issued to appre-prehend the author of this pamphlet.”

“Marmor Norfolciense” became exceedingly scarce, so that I, for many years, endeavoured in vain to procure a copy of it. At last I was indebted to the malice of one of Johnson's numerous petty adversaries, who, in 1775, published a new edition of it, “with Notes and a Dedication to Samuel Johnson, LL.D., by Trib-unus;” in which some puny scribbler inju-diously attempted to found upon it a charge of inconsistence against its author, because he had accepted of a pension from his present Majesty, and had written in support of the meaures of government. As a mortification to such impotent malice, of which there are so many instances towards men of eminence, I am happy to relate, that this tehnum imbelle did not reach its exalted object, till about a year after it thus appeared, when I mentioned it to him, supposing that he knew of the republication. To my surprise, he had not yet heard of it. He requested me to go directly and get it for him, which I did. He looked at it and laughed, and seemed to be much diverted with the feeble efforts of his unknown adversary, who, I hope, is alive to read this account.

1 The inscription and the translation of it are preserved in the London Magazine for the year 1739, p. 244. — Boswell.
2 Of these two satirical pamphlets, Hawkins observes that “the display neither learning nor wit, nor, indeed, any ray of their author's genius; and were prompted by the principle which Johnson frequently declared to be the only true ge-dnate motive to writing, namely, pecuniary profit. He was never greedy of money, but without money could not be stimulated to write. Yet was he not so indifferent to the subjects that he was requested to write on, as at any time to abandon either his religious or political principles. He would no more have put his name to an Arioc or Socinian tract than to the defence of Atheism. At the time when Faction Detected came out, a pamphlet of which the late Lord Egmont is now generally understood to have been the author, the bookseller, held out to him a strong temptation to answer it, which he refused, being convinced, as he assured me, that the clause contained in it was false. It was not, indeed, an adequate defence against the innumerable attacks that were ground thereon was unanswerable. The truth is, that Johnson's political prejudices were a mist that the eye of his judgment, he could see nothing right; nor could he be convinced, in his invectives against a standing army, as the Jacob-bins and the French had been, that the people were not an adequate defence against an invasion of it by an armed force. He almost asserted in terms, that the succession to the crown had been illegally interrupted, and that from whose polities none of the benefits of government could be expected. From hence it appears, and to his honour be it said, his

“Now,” said he, “here is somebody who thinks he has vexed me sadly; yet, if it had not been for you, you rogue, I should probably never have seen it.”

As Mr. Pope's note concerning Johnson, allowed to in a former page, refers both to his “London,” and his “Marmor Norfolciense,” I have deferred inserting it till now. I am indebted for it to Dr. Percy, the bishop of Dro-more, who permitted me to copy it from the original in his possession. It was presented to his lordship by Sir Joshua Reynolds, to whom it was given by the son of Mr. Richardson the painter, the person to whom it is addressed. I have transcribed it with minute exactness, that the peculiar mode of writing, and imperfect spelling of that celebrated poet, may be exhibted to the curious in literature. It justifies Swift's epitaph on “pope:” for it is written on a slip no larger than a common message-card, and was sent to Mr. Richardson, along with the imitation of Juvenal.

“... This is imitated by one Johnson who put in for a Public-school in Shropshire, but was disappointed. He has an infirmity of the convulsive kind, that attacks him sometimes, so as to make Him a sad Spectacle. Mr. P. from the merit of This Work which was all the knowledge he had of Him, endeavoured to serve Him without his own application; & wrote to my L.A. bore, but he did not succeed. Mr. Johnson published after all another Poem in Latin with Notes the whole very Humerous call'd the Norfolk Prophecy. P.”

Johnson had been told of this note; and Sir Joshua Reynolds informed him of the compliment which it contained, but, from delicacy, avoided showing him the paper itself. When Sir Joshua observed to Johnson that he seemed very desirous to see Pope's note, he answered, “Who would not be proud to have such a man as Pope so solicitous in inquiring about him?”

The infirmity to which Mr. Pope alludes, ap-ppeared to me also, as will be hereafter observed,

3 “Get all your verses printed fair,
Then let them well be dried;
And Cull must have a special care
To leave the margin wide.
Lend these to paper-sparing Pope;
And when he sits to write,
No letter with an envelope
Could give him more delight.”

Advice to Grub-Streets Writers.

The original MS. of Pope's Homer (preserved in the British Museum) is almost entirely written on the covers of letters, and sometimes between the lines of the letters themselves. — Nichols.

4 It is clear that, as Johnson advanced in life, these convul-sive infirmities, part and parcel of his hereditary disease, though never entirely absent, were so far subdued, that he could not be called a sad spectacle. We have seen that he was respected by the schools on account of these distortions, which in his latter years were certainly not violent enough to excite disgust. — Choker.

5 This is hardly consistent with the story (ante, p. 13, n. 7) of Pope's high approbation of Johnson's translation of his Messiah. — Choker.
to be of the convulsive kind, and of the nature of that distemper called St. Vitus’s dance; and in this opinion I am confirmed by the description which Sydenham gives of that disease.

"This disorder is a kind of convolution. It manifests itself by halting or unsteadiness of one of the legs, which the patient draws after him like a tail, which he either cannot raise, or else he applies to the breast, or any other part of the body, he cannot keep it a moment in the same posture, but it will be drawn into a different one by a convolution, notwithstanding all his efforts to the contrary." Sir Joshua Reynolds, however, was of a different opinion, and favoured me with the following Paper.

"Those motions or tricks of Dr. Johnson are improperly called convulsions. He could sit motionless, when he was told so to do, as well as any other man. My opinion is, that it proceeded from a habit 1 which he had indulged himself in, of accompanying his thoughts with certain untoward actions; and those actions always appeared to me as if they were meant to repulse some part of past conduct. Whenever he was not engaged in conversation, such thoughts were sure to rush into his mind; and, for this reason, any company, any employment whatever, he preferred to being alone. The great business of his life (he said) was to escape from himself. This disposition he considered as the disease of his mind, which nothing cured but company.

"One instance of his absence and particularity, as it is characteristic of the man, may be worth relating. When he and I took a journey together into the West, we visited the late Mr. Bankes, of Dorsetshire; 2 the conversation turning upon pictures, which Johnson could not well see, he retired to a corner of the room, stretching out his right leg as far as he could reach before him, then bringing up his left leg, and stretching his right still further on. The old gentleman, observing him, went up to him, and in a very courteous manner assured him, though it was not a new house, the flooring was perfectly safe. The Doctor started from his reverie, like a person waked out of his sleep, but spoke not a word." 3

While we are on this subject, my readers may not be displeased with another anecdote, communicated to me by the same friend, from the relation of Mr. Hogarth.

Johnson used to be a pretty frequent visitor at the house of Mr. Richardson, author of Clarissa, and other novels of extensive reputation. One summer day in the month of July, Richardson, soon after the execution of Dr. Cameron for having taken arms for the house of Stuart in 1745-6; and being a warm partisan of George the Second, he observed to Richardson, that certainly there must have been some very unfavourable circumstances lately discovered in this particular case, which had induced the King to approve of an execution for rebellion so long after the time when it was committed, as this had the appearance of putting a man to death in cold blood, 4 and was very unlike his Majesty’s usual clemency. While he was talking, he perceived a person standing at a window in the room, shaking his head, and rolling himself about in a strange ridiculous manner. He concluded that he was an idiot, whom his relations had put under the care of Mr. Richardson, as a very good man. To his great surprise, however, this figure stalked forwards to where he and Mr. Richardson were sitting, and all at once took up the argument, and burst out into an invective against George the Second, as one who, upon all occasions, was unrelenting and barbarous; mentioning many instances; particularly, that when an officer of high rank had been acquitted by a court martial, George the Second had, with his own hand, struck his name off the list. 5 In short, he displayed such a power of eloquence, that Hogarth looked at him with astonishment, and actually imagined that this idiot had been at the moment inspired. Neither Hogarth nor Johnson were made known to each other at this interview. 6

1 Sir Joshua Reynolds’s notion on this subject is confirmed by what Johnson himself said to a young lady, the niece of his friend Christopher Smart. See a note by Mr. Boswell on some particulars communicated by Reynolds, under March 30, 1783.— Malone.

3 See post, under April 22, 1764, and March 27, 1774, and in Miss Reynolds’s Recollections, in the Appendix, notices of some strange antics which he used to perform on various occasions.— Croker.

4 Impartial posterity may, perhaps, be a little inclined as Dr. Johnson was, to justify the uncommon ruse exercised in the case of Dr. Archibald Cameron. He was an amiable and truly honest man; and his latter years were devoted to a pious, though mistaken, principle of duty. Being obliged, after 1746, to give up his profession as a physician, and to go into foreign parts, he was honoured with the rank of Colonel, both in the French and Spanish service. He was a son of the ancient and respectable family of Cameron of Lochiel; and his brother, Sir John, was in the construction of the church and town of Oban, cultivating his properties and distinguishing himself by moderation and humanity, while the Highland army marched victorious through Scotland. It is remarkable of that family, though he had adequately manifested against the attempt as hopeless, he was of too heroic a spirit not to venture his life and fortune in the cause, which personally asked by him whom he thought his prince.— Boswell.

Sir Walter Scott states, in his Introduction to Redgauntlet (Waverley Novels, vol. xxxv. p. vii. &c.), that the govern-ment of George II. were in possession of sufficient evidence that Dr. Cameron had returned to the Highlands, not as he alleged on his trial, for family affairs merely, but as the secret agent of the Pretender in a new scheme of rebellion; the ministers, however, preferred trying this indefatigable partisan on the ground of his undeniable share in the insurrection of 1745, rather than rescuing themselves and their master from the charge of harshness, at the expense of making it universally known, that a fresh rebellion had been in agitation so late as 1752.— Lockhart.

Dr. Cameron was executed on the 8th of June, 1753. No instance can be traced in the War or Admiralty Office, of any officer of high rank being struck out of the list about this period, who had been acquitted by a court martial. It may be surmised that Mr. Hogarth’s statement, or Sir Joshua’s report of it, was not quite accurate in details, and that Johnson might have alluded to the case of his friend General Ogilverho, who, after acquitted by a court-martial, was (to use a vulgar but expressive phrase) put upon the shelf.— See p. 35. t. 6, and post p. 106, n. 3.

5 Mrs. Piozzi says, "Mr. Hogarth, among the variety of kindnesses shown to me, was used to be very earnest that I should obtain the acquittal of Colonel Cameron. Was the ship of Dr. Johnson, whose conversation was (he said) to the talk of other men, like Titian’s painting compared to Hudson’s, when my father and Hogarth were talking together about him one day. ‘That man,’ said the latter, ‘is not contented with believing the Bible, but he fairly reasoneth, I think, to believe nothing but the Bible."

6 Mr. Boyd quotes Mr. O’Shaughnessy to the effect that Dr. Johnson used to walk with dog and pen indoors, and to say that he was engaged in writing, and that he frequently said that the very dog and pen were better than a court or a Senate. — Malone.
Boswell's Life of Johnson.

In 1740, Dr. Johnson wrote for the Gentleman's Magazine the "Preface,"† the "Life of Admiral Blake," and the first parts of those of "Sir Francis Drake,"* and "Philip Barret,"* both of which he finished the following year. He also wrote an "Essay on Epitaphs,"* and an "Epitaph on Philips, a Musician,"* which was afterwards published, with some other pieces of his, in Mrs. Williams's Miscellanies. This Epitaph is so exquisitely beautiful, that I remember even Lord Kames', strangely prejudiced as he was against Dr. Johnson, was compelled to allow it very high praise. It has been ascribed to Mr. Garrick, from its appearing at first with the signature G.; but I have heard Mr. Garrick declare, that it was written by Dr. Johnson, and give the following account of the manner in which it was composed. Johnson and he were sitting together; when, amongst other things, Garrick repeated an Epitaph upon this Phillips by a Dr. Wilkes, in these words:

"Exalted soul! whose harmony could please
The lowly virgin, and the gouty case;
Could jarring discord, like Amphion's bow
To beautious order and harmonious love;
Rest here in peace, till angels bid thee rise,
And meet thy blessed Saviour in the skies."

Johnson shook his head at these commonplace funeral lines, and said to Garrick, "I think, Davey, I can make it better." Then, stirring about his tea for a little while, in a state of meditation, he almost extemporaneously produced the following verses:

Phelps, whose touch harmonious could remove
The pangs of guilty power or hapless love;
Rest here, distress'd by poverty no more,
Here find that calm thou gav'st so oft before;

Johnson (added he), though so wise a fellow, is more like King David than King Solomon; for he says, in his haste, that all men are liars; Dr. Johnson made four lines on the death of Hume,* which were equally true and pleasing: -

The hand of him here told lies,
That drew the essential form of grace;
Here closed in death the attentive eye,
That saw the manners in the face..."*†

"I know not," adds Mrs. Piozzi, "why Garrick were preferred to them." See this question answered, and the lines correctly given, post, in December 12, 1771. — Croker.

This preface is nothing but a few lines, no doubt by Johnson, introducing a learned essay on the "Acta Diurna of the old Romans," by some other hands. — Croker.

His attention was probably drawn to Barretier by Miss Carter, with whom that young man, who is represented as having been from his infancy a prodigy of learning, corresponded. Johnson seems to have been somewhat, and yet not sufficiently, incredulous as to the almost miraculous extent of his acquirements; and it is strange that he should not have recurred to those materials but those furnished by Barretier's father; and certainly what has been preserved of his correspondence in the Life of Mrs. Carter (79-94.), does not justify the extraordinary accounts which we read of his reading and genius. He died in 1740, ag. 19. — Croker.

This was the Duke of Queensberry, who expiated his munificence by his imprudence, and it is a proof of the "courage of Johnson," that after the experience of both kinds of fortune, died in 1733. — Croker.

Mr. Garrick appears not to have rectified the verses correctly, the original being as follows. One of the various readings is remarkable, as it is the germ of Johnson's concluding line:

"Exalted soul, thy various sounds could please
The love-sick virgin, and the gouty case;
Consenting crowds, like old Amphion's bow
To beautious order and harmonious love;
Rest here in peace, till angels bid thee rise,
And meet thy Saviour's consort in the skies."

"St. John's Gate, January 31st, 1740—41.

"Sirs,—Dr. James presses me with great warmth to remind you of your promise, that you would exert your interest with Mr. Warren to bring their affairs to a speedy conclusion; this you know, Sir, I have some right to insist upon, as Mr. Cave was, in some degree, diverted from attending to the arbitration by my assiduity in expediting the agreement, which, had you been pleased to have imagined many arguments necessary to prevail upon Mr. Warren to do what seems to be no less desired by him than the Doctor. If he entertains any suspicion that I shall endeavour to enforce the Doctor's arguments, I am willing, and more than barely willing, to forbear all mention of the question. He that desires only to do right, can oblige nobody by acting, and must offend every man that expects favours. It is perhaps for this reason that Mr. Cave seems very much inclined to resign the office of umpire; and since I know not whom to propose in his place equally qualified and disinterested, and am yet desired to propose somebody, I believe the most eligible method of determining this vexatious affair will be, that each

By consent, in the above lines, I suppose consent is meant; but still I do not see the germ of Johnson's thought. — Croker.

"This is the first of a dozen letters or notes of Johnson (communicated to me by Mr. Peter Cunningham) addressed in 1741, and the last in 1750, to a Mr. Lewis Paul, of Birmingham and subsequently of Brook Green, Hammer smith. They relate to some question of business between Paul, Warren the Birmingham bookseller, Dr. James, and Cave, Johnson acting as a common friend of all the parties. The case seems to have been that Paul had invented what Cave calls "a machine for making the new spindles for spinning wool and cotton." Towards trying this, Warren and James appear to have advanced money and to have made a contract between them, Cave, at Johnson's request, consented to be an umpire. Cave, however, who, as Johnson says in his Life, "had himself some pecuniary interest in the concern," and the several objects of the machine were worked; and in 1746, Johnson was again mediating between Paul and Cave's representatives. The whole affair is very obscure, and the letters, though marked with Johnson's usual caustic and mercurial insertions; yet I am willing to preserve them as additional proofs of his kindness to his friends, and as affording glimpses of his life at periods of which Boswell knew nothing. The originals are in the possession of Mr. Lewis Pocock. — Croker, 1845."
party should draw up in a narrow compass his own state of the case, and his demand upon the other; and each abate somewhat, of which himself or his friends may think due to him by the laws of rigid just being disappointed of a tedious method, but will, I hope, be shortened by the desire, so often expressed on each side, of a speedy determination. If either party can make use of me in this transaction, in which there is no opportunity for malevolence or prejudice to exert themselves, I shall be well satisfied with the employment.

Mr. Cave, who knows to whom I am writing, desires me to mention his interest, of which I need not remind you that it is complicated with yours; and therefore cannot be neglected by you without opposition to motives, far stronger than the persuasions of, Sir, your humble servant,

JOHNSON TO PAUL,
In Birmingham.

"At the Black Boy, over against Durham Yard, Strand, March 31st, 1741.

"Sir,—The hurry of removing and some other hindrances, have kept me from writing to you since you left us, nor should I have allowed myself the pleasure of doing it now, but that the Doctor [James] has pressed me to offer you a proposal, which I know not why he does not rather make himself; but his request, whatever be the reason of it, is too small to be denied. He proposes,—1. To pay you immediately, or give you satisfactory security for the speedy payment of £100. 2. To exchange general releases with Mr. Warren. These proposals he makes upon the conditions formerly offered, that the bargain for spindles shall be vacated. The securities for Mr. Warren's debts released, and the debt of £65 remitted with the addition of this new article, that Mr. Warren shall give him the books bought for the carrying on of their joint undertaking. What difference this new demand may make, I cannot tell, nor do I intend to be understood in these proposals to express any of my own sentiments, but merely to write after a dictation. I believe I have expressed the Doctor's meaning, but being disappointed of an interview with him, cannot shew him this, and he generally hints his intentions somewhat obscurely.

He is very impatient for an answer, and desires me to importune you for one by the return of the post. I am not willing, in this affair, to request anything on my own account; for you know already, that an agreement can only be made by a communication of your thoughts, and a speedy agreement only by an expeditious communication.

I hope to write soon on some more agreeable subject; for though, perhaps, a man cannot easily find more pleasing employment than of reconciling variances, he may certainly amuse himself better by any other business, than of interposing in controversies which grow every day more distant from accommodation, which has been hitherto my fate; but I hope my endeavours will be, hereafter, more successful. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

"SAM. JOHNSON."]

In 1744, he wrote for the Gentleman's Magazine the "Preface;" 1 "Conclusion of his Lives of Drake and Barretier;" 2 "A Free Translation of the Jests of Hierocles, with an Introduction;" 3 and, I think, the following pieces: "Debate on the Proposal of Parliament to Cromwell, to assume the Title of King, abridged, modified, and digested," 4 "Translation of Abbé Guyon's Dissertation on the Amazons;" 5 "Translation of Fontenelle's Panegyric on Dr. Morin." 6 Two notes upon this appear to me undoubtedly his. He this year, and the two following, wrote the Parliamentary Debates. He told me himself, that he was the sole composer of them for those three years only. He was not, however, precisely exact in his statement, which he mentioned from hasty recollection; for it is sufficiently evident, that his composition of them began November 1740, and ended February 1742—3. 7

It appears from some of Cave's letters to Dr. Birch, that Cave had better assistance for that branch of his Magazine, than has been generally supposed; and that he was indefatigable in getting it made as perfect as he could. Thus, 21st July, 1735,

"I trouble you with the inclosed, because you said you could easily correct what is here given for Lord Chesterfield's speech. I beg you will do so as soon as you can for me, because the month is far advanced."

And 15th July, 1737,

"As you remember the debates so far as to perceive the speeches already printed are not exact, I beg the favour that you will peruse the inclosed, and, in the best manner your memory will serve, correct the mistaken passages, or add any thing that is omitted. I should be very glad to have something of the Duke of Newcastle's speech, which would be particularly of service. A gentleman has Lord Bathurst's speech to add something to."

And July 3, 1744,

"You will see what stupid, low, abominable stuff is put 8 upon your noble and learned friend's 9 in 1738. I, however, see abundant reason to believe that he wrote them from the time (June 1738) that he assumed the Lilliputian title, and even the "Introduction" to this new form is evidently his; and when Mr. Boswell limits Johnson's share to the 53d of Feb. 1743, he refers to the date of the debate itself, and not to that of the report, for the debates on the Gin Act (certainly reported by Johnson), which took place in Feb. 1743, were not concluded in the Magazine till February, 1744; so that instead of two years and nine months, according to Mr. Boswell's reckoning, we have, if we take Johnson's own evidence, that he was employed in this way for near six years — from 1738 to 1744. — Chorner, I suppose, in another compilation of the same kind. — Boswell.

This year I find that his tragedy of Irene had been for some time ready for the stage, and that his necessities made him desirous of getting as much as he could for it without delay; for there is the following letter from Mr. Cave to Dr. Birch, in the same volume of manuscripts.

The company was struck with astonishment. After staring at each other in silent amaze, Dr. Francis asked how that speech could be written by him? "Sir," said Johnson, "I have written it, as you see, in the gallows of the House of Commons but once. Cave had interest with the door-keepers. He, and the persons employed under him, took it away from me, and it was returned to me together with notes of the arguments advanced in the course of the debate. The whole was afterwards communicated to me, and I composed the speeches in the form which they now have in the Parliamentary Debates." To this discovery Dr. Francis made answer: —"Then, sir, you have exceeded Demosthenes himself, for to say that you have exceeded Demosthenes, would be saying nothing." The rest of the company bestowed lavish encomiums on Johnson: one, in particular, praised his impertinacy; observing, that he dealt out reason and eloquence with an equal hand to both parties. "That is not quite true," said Johnson; "I saved appearances tolerably well, but I took care that the Whig boys should not have the best of it." —Murphy.

The speech of Mr. Pitt's referred to was, no doubt, the celebrated reply to old Horace Walpole, beginning "The atrocious crime of being a young man," March 10, 1741; but there is in the statement a slight inaccuracy, arising, perhaps, from a slip of Johnson's memory, who, by Mr. Boswell's list of Johnson's residences, appears not to have resided in Exeter Street after his return to London in 1737. But he may have had considerations of a more private kind; or, after the lapse of so many years, have forgotten the exact place. There can be no doubt that Murphy's report was accurate.

It is very remarkable that Dr. Matz, who wrote the Life and edited the Works of Lord Chesterfield, with the use of his Lordship's papers, under the eye of his surviving friends, and published them, should have published, as "specimens of his Lordship's eloquence, in the strong nervous style of Demosthenes, as well as in the witty ironical manner of Tully," three speeches, which are certainly Johnson's composition. See Chesterfield's Works, vol. ii. p. 319, and post, May 13. 1775. —Croker.
in the British Museum, from which I copied those above quoted. They were most obligingly pointed out to me by Sir William Musgrave, one of the curators [trustees] of that noble repository.

" Sept. 9, 1741.

"I have put Mr. Johnson's play into Mr. Gray's hands, in order to sell it to him, if he is inclined to buy it; but I doubt whether he will or not. He would dispose of the copy, and whatever advantage may be made by acting it. Would your society, or any gentleman, or body of men that you know, take such a bargain? He and I are very unfit to deal with theatrical persons. Fleetwood was to have acted it last season, but Johnson's diffidence or prevented it."

I have already mentioned that "Irene" was not brought into public notice till Garrick was manager of Drury-lane Theatre.

In 1742 he wrote for the Gentleman's Magazine, the "Preface," the "Parliamentary Debates," "Essay on the Account of the Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough," then the popular topic of conversation. This Essay is a short but masterly performance. We find him, in No. 13, of his Rambler, censuring a profligate sentiment in that "Account," and again (10th Sept. 1773) insisting upon it strenuously in conversation, "An Account of the Life of Peter Burman," * I believe chiefly taken from a foreign publication; as, indeed, he could not himself know much about Burman; "Additions to his Life of Barretier," "The Life of Sydenham," afterwards prefixed to Dr. Swain's edition of his works; Proposals for printing Bibliotheca Harleiana, or a Catalogue of the Library of the Earl of Oxford,* his Account of that celebrated collection of books, in which he displays the importance to literature, of what the French call a catalogue raisonné, when the subjects of it are extensive and various, and it is executed with ability, cannot fail to impress all his readers with admiration of his philologically attainments. It was afterwards prefixed to the first volume of the Catalogue, in which the Latin accounts of books were written by him. He was employed in this business by Mr. Thomas Osborne, the bookseller, who purchased the library for 13,000£, a sum which Mr. Oldys says, in one of his manuscripts, was not more than the binding of the books had cost; yet, as Dr. Johnson assured me, the slowness of the sale was such, that there was not much gained by it. It has been sufficiently related, with many em-bellishments, that Johnson one day knocked Osborne down in his shop with a foilo, and put his foot upon his neck. The simple truth I had from Johnson himself. "Sir, he was impertinent to me, and I beat him. But it was not in his shop: it was in my own chamber."

A very diligent observer may trace him where we should not easily suppose him to be found. I have no doubt that he wrote the little abridgment entitled "Foreign History," in the Magazine for December. To prove it, I shall quote the Introduction:

"As this is that season of the year in which Nature may be said to command a suspension of hostilities, and which seems intended, by putting a short stop to violence and slaughter, to afford time for malice to dry, and animosity to subside; we can scarce expect any other account than of plans, negotiations, and treaties, of proposals for peace, and preparations for war."

As also this passage:

"Let those who despise the capacity of the Swiss, tell us by what wonderful policy, or by what happy conciliation of interests, it is brought to pass, that in a body made up of different communities and different religions, there should be no civil commotions, though the people are so warlike, that to nominate and raise an army is the same."

I am obliged to Mr. Astle for his ready permission to copy the two following letters, of which the originals are in his possession. Their contents show that they were written about this time, and that Johnson was now engaged in preparing an historical account of the British Parliament.

JOHNSON TO CAVE.

[Aug. 1743.]

"Sir, — I believe I am going to write a long letter, and have therefore taken a whole sheet of paper. The first thing to be written about is our historical design.

"You mentioned the proposal of printing in 1 John Gray was a bookseller, at the Cross Keys in the Poultry, the shop formerly kept by Dr. Samuel Chaudler. Like his predecessor, he became a dissenting minister; but he afterwards took orders in the church, and held a living at Ripon in Yorkshire. — Wright.

2 Not the Royal Society [as Boswell in his two first editions had strangely stated]; but the "Society for the Encouragement of Learning," of which Dr. Birch was a leading member. Their object was, to assist authors in printing expensive works. It existed from about 1735 to 1746, when, having incurred a considerable debt, it was dissolved. — Boswell.
3 There is no erasure here, but a mere blank; to fill up which may be an exercise for ingenious conjecture. — Boswell. Probably something equivalent to the reverse of difficulty.
4 From one of his letters to a friend, written in June, 1742. It should seem that he then purposed to write a play on the subject of Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, and to have it ready for the ensuing winter. The passage alluded to, however, is somewhat ambiguous; and the work which he then

5 A late female minister of state has been shameless enough to inform the world, that she used, when she wanted to extract any thing from her sovereign, to remind her of Montaigne's reason; who has determined, that to tell a secret to a friend is no breach of fidelity, because the number of persons trusted is not multiplied,—a man and his friend being virtually the same." Rambler, No. 13. — Wright.
6 The same who is introduced into the Dunciad under disgusting circumstances, which disgrace Pope rather than Osborne, of whom Johnson says in his Life of the poet, that his "impassible phrases" would not feel the satire. He died in 1767. — Chorley.
8 Thomas Astle, Esq., many years Keeper of the Records in the Tower, one of the Keepers of the Paper Office, and Trustee of the British Museum. He contributed many articles to the Archaeologia; but his principal work was the "Origin and Progress of Writing, as well Hieroglyphic as Elementary." He died Dec. 1803. — Wright.
numbers as an alteration in the scheme, but I believe you mistook, some way or other, my meaning; I had no other view than that you might rather print too many of five sheets, than of five and thirty.

"With regard to what I shall say on the manner of proceeding, I would have it understood as wholly is different from, and my opinion only, not my resolution. Euphoris sit eligere.

"I think the insertion of the exact dates of the most important events in the margin, or of so many events as may enable the reader to regulate the order of facts with sufficient exactness, the proper medium between a journal, which has regard only to time, and a history, which ranges facts according to their dependence on each other, and postpones or anticipates according to the convenience of narration. I think the work ought to partake of the spirit of history, which, contrary to minute exactness, and of the style of a journal, which is inconsistent with spirit. For this reason, I neither admit numbers or dates, nor reject them.

"I am of your opinion with regard to placing the resolutions, &c. in the margin, and think we shall give the most complete account of parliamentary proceedings that can be contrived. The naked papers, without an historical treatise interwoven, require some other book to make them understood. I will date the succeeding facts with some exactness, but I think in the margin.

"You told me on Saturday that I had received money on your order, and found set down 13l. 2s. gd. reckoning the half guinea of last Saturday. As you hinted to me that you had many calls for money, I would not press you too hard, and therefore shall desire only, as I send it in, two guineas for a sheet of copy; the rest you may pay me when it may be more convenient; and even by this sheet payment I shall, for some time, be very expensive.

"The Life of Savage I am ready to go upon; and in great primer and pica notes, I reckon on sending in half a sheet a day; but the money for that shall likewise lie by in your hands till it is done. With the 10l. or 12l. debt, do I have business enough if I had but good pens?

"Towards Mr. Savage's Life what more have you got? I would willingly have his trial, &c.,

1 "The Plain Dealer" was published in 1724, and contained some account of Savage. — Boswell.
2 Perhaps the Eunic Inscription, Gent. Mag. vol. xii.
3 Malone.
4 Certainly not.—that was published in March, 1742, at least seventeen months before this letter was written; nor does there appear in the Magazine any inscription to which this can refer. It seemed at first sight probable that it might allude to the translation of Pope's Inscription on his Grotto, which appeared (with an apology for haste) in the next Magazine; but the expression "I could think of nothing till to-day," negatives that supposition. The inscription, then, was I suppose one which Cave requested Johnson to devise, and for which, when Johnson after a long delay produced it, Cave surprised him by paying. — Croker.
I have not discovered what this was. — Boswell.
5 Mr. Hector was present when this Epigram was made complimentary to the present Mr. D. James, and Johnson was called upon by the company to finish it, which he instantly did. — Boswell.
6 Anglica inter pulcherrima Laura puellae, Adsit, Laura, tibi faculis Lucina delicati, Neve tibi nocent praeminuisse Deae.
7 Laura, of British girls the loveliest flower,
Soon to lay down the burden of thy womb;
O may Lucina help thy painful hour,
Nor harm thee, envious of thy brighter bloom.

and know whether his defence be at Bristol, and would have his collection of Poems, on account of the preface; — "The Plain Dealer" — all the Magazines that have any thing of his or relating to him.

"I thought my letter would be long, but it is now ended; and I am, Sir, yours, &c.

"SAM. JOHNSON." "The boy found me writing this almost in the dark, when I could not quite easily read yours. "I have read the Italian: — nothing in it is well.

"I had no notion of having any thing for the Inscription.8 I hope you don't think I kept it to extort a price. I could think of nothing till to-day. If you could spare me another guinea for the history, I should take it very kindly, tonight; but if you do not I shall not think it an injury. I am almost well again."

JOHNSON TO CAVE.

"Sir,—You did not tell me your determination about the Soldier's Letter, which I am confident was never printed. I think it will not do by itself, or in any other place, so well as the Mag. Extraordinary. If you will have it all, I believe you do not think I set it high; and I will be glad if what you give you will give quickly.

"You need not be in care about something to print, for I have got the State Trials, and shall extract Layer, Atterbury, and Macclesfield from them, and shall bring them to you in a fortnight; after which I will try to get the South Sea Report."

I would also ascribe to him an "Essay on the Description of China, from the French of Du Halde."†

His writings in the Gentleman's Magazine in 1743, are, the Preface †, the Parliamentary Debates †, "Considerations on the Dispute between Crousaz and Warburton, on Pope's Essay on Man;" † in which, while he defends Crousaz, he shows an admirable metaphysical acuteness and temperance in controversy: "Ad Lauram paritum Epigramma." † and, "A

This version is, I am conscious, awkward enough, but not more so. I hope, than the original, which indeed, seems hardly worth the distinction of being specially quoted. If the first line was proposed as a thesis, we cannot much admire the style in which it was followed up; the designation, surely, of the lady as pulcilla, would lead us to expect any thing rather than the turn which the epigram takes. Is not the second line gross and awkward; the third pedantic; and the conceit of the fourth not even classical — for Lucina was never famed for her beauty; and does not the whole seem a very strange subject for poetical complaint? — Croker, 1831.

An article in the Edinburgh Review, Nov. 107, p. 9., since republished in Mr. Macready's Essays, contains the following note; and, somewhat superfluously, reminds us, that Horace talks of laborantes utero puellae. I never said or supposed that a person in that condition might not be still called "puella," but I thought and say that, if, as Boswell states, the first line was given as a thesis for the poet to pursue after librarum praefatio of "the prettiest girl in England," one never would have expected the turn the compliment takes, of telling her, in very severe terms, that she is about to be brought to bed, and that by way of couplet, she is handsomer than the widow: for this learned critic has further discovered that "Lucina was one of the names of Diana, and the Graces; and Diana is extolled by all the most orthodox doctors of ancient mythology." By this style of metonymy Hecate also might be made a participle of Diana's beauty. See Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine for Nov. 1831. — Croker, 1846.

Mr. Malone states, that an elegant Latin Ode "Ad orna-
Latin Translation of Pope's Verses on his Grotto:* and, as he could employ his pen with equal success upon a small matter as a great, I suppose him to be the author of an advertisement for Osborne, concerning the great Harleian Catalogue.

But I should think myself much wanting, both to my illustrious friend and my readers, did I not introduce here, with more than ordinary respect, an exquisitely beautiful Ode, which has not been inserted in any of the collections of Johnson's poetry, written by him at a very early period, as Mr. Hector informs me, and inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine of this year.

FRIENDSHIP, AN ODE.

"Friendship, peculiar boon of Heaven,
The noble mind's delight and pride,
To men and angels only given,
To all the lower world denied.

"While love, unknown among the blest,
Parent of thousand wild desires,
The savage and the human breast
Torments alike with raging fires;

"With bright, but oft destructive, gleam,
Alike o'er all his lightnings fly;
Thy lambent glories only beam Around the favourites of the sky.

"Thy gentle flows of guiltless joys
On gods and villains ne'er descend;
In vain for thee the tyrant sighs,
And hugs a flatterer for a friend.

"Directress of the brave and just,
O guide us through life's darksome way!
Let all the tortures of mistrust
On selfish bosoms only prey.

"Nor shall thine ardent cease to glow,
When souls to blissful climes remove:
What rais'd our virtue here below,
Shall aid our happiness above."

Johnson had now an opportunity of obliging his schoolfellow Dr. James, of whom he once observed, "No man brings more mind to his profession." James published this year his "Medicinal Dictionary," in three volumes folio. Johnson, as I understood from him, had written, or assisted in writing, the proposals for this work; and being very fond of the study of physic, in which James was his master, he furnished some of the articles. He, however, certainly wrote for it the Dedication to Dr. Mead †, which is conceived with great address, to conciliate the patronage of that very eminent man.1

It has been circulated,2 I know not with what authenticity, that Johnson considered Dr. Birch as a dull writer, and said of him, "Tom Birch is as brisk as a bee in conversation; but no sooner does he take a pen in his hand, than it becomes a torpedo to him, and benums all his faculties." That the literature of this country is much indebted to Birch's activity and diligence, must certainly be acknowledged. We have seen that Johnson honoured3 him with a Greek Epigram; and his correspondence with him, during many years, proves that he had no mean opinion of him.

JOHNSON TO BIRCH.

"Thursday, Sept. 29, 1743.

"Sir,—I hope you will excuse me for troubling you on an occasion on which I know not whom else I can apply to: I am at a loss for the lives and characters of Earl Stanhope, the two Craggs, and the minister Sunderland; and beg that you will inform [me] where I may find them, and send any pamphlets, &c. relating to them to Mr. Cave, to be perused for a few days, by, Sir, your most humble servant,

Sam. Johnson.

"His circumstances were at this time embarrassed; yet his affection for his mother was so warm, and so liberal, that he took upon himself a debt of hers, which, though small in itself, was then considerable to him.4 This appears from the following letter which he wrote to Mr. Levett, of Lichfield, the original of which lies now before me.

JOHNSON TO MR. LEVETT.

In Lichfield.

December 1, 1743.

"Sir,—I am extremely sorry that we have encroached so much upon your forbearance with respect to the interest, which a great perplexity of affairs hindered me from thinking of with that attention that I ought, and which I am not immediately able to remit to you, but will pay it (I

1 This appears to be a reference to the dedications of the Gentleman's Magazine, which was edited by James Wright.
2 By Hawkins. Life, p. 296. There seems no reason to doubt that Dr. Birch's conversation exceeded his writings in vivacity, but the phrase itself is, as Mr. P. Cunningham observes, borrowed from Beau Nash, who said of himself that "his pen was a torpedo, which, when he grasped it, benumbed all his faculties." Goldsmith's Life of Nash. — Croker.
3 No doubt, as the case has turned out, Birch is honoured by Johnson's compliment; but at the time when it was written, Birch was of eminence in the literary world, and (what affected Johnson more nearly) high in the estimation of Cave; and Johnson's learned flatteries of him, Miss Carter, and Mr. Urban, were all probably prompted by a desire to propitiate Cave. — Croker.
4 Dr. Johnson was no doubt an affectionate son, and even to indifferent persons the most charitable of men; but the praises which Boswell lavishes on this particular affair are unfeigned, for, as the debt was hardly so much Johnson's mother's as his own. It has already appeared that he had something of his father's property to expect after his mother's death (p. 19); this was the house in Lichfield, think twelve pounds) in two months. I look upon this, and on the future interest of that mortgage, as my own debt; and beg that you will be pleased to give me directions how to pay it, and not to mention it to my dear mother. If it be necessary to pay this in less time, I believe I can do it; but I take two months for certainty, and beg an answer when the time is to be had. I think myself very much obliged to your forbearance, and shall esteem it a great happiness to be able to serve you. I have great opportunities of dispensing any thing that you may think it proper to make public. I will give a note for the money, payable at the time mentioned, to any one here that you shall appoint. I am, Sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant,

"At Mr. Osborne's, bookseller, in Gray's Inn."

It does not appear that he wrote any thing in 1744 for the Gentleman's Magazine, but the Preface.† His life of Barretter was now republished in a pamphlet by itself. But he produced one work this year, fully sufficient to maintain the high reputation which he had acquired. This was "The Life of Richard Savage," a man, of whom it is difficult to speak impartially, without wondering that he was for some time the intimate companion of Johnson; for his character was marked by profligacy, insolence, and ingratitude: yet, as he undoubtedly had a warm and vigorous, though unregulated mind, had seen life in all which was, it seems, mortgaged to Mr. Levett; by the non-payment of the interest Levett would have been entitled to get possession of the property; and in that case Johnson would have lost his revision, so that he very justly says, that "he looks upon this and the future interest on the mortgage as his own debt."—Croker.

† In this and the two next years, Mr. Boswell has not assigned to Johnson any contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine; yet there seems little doubt that from his connection with that work he derived, for some years, the chief and almost the only income of substantial substance which he had, perhaps he may have acted as general editor with an annual allowance, and he no doubt employed himself on more literary work than he could have done if he had been entirely out of the public loss is, perhaps, not great. What he was unwilling to avow, we need not be very solicitous to discover. Indeed, his personal ascendency over this wretched, this paltry, this profligate, this pest, is to be feared, in the obscurity of indifference—if there was not also some political motive for concealment. (See post, p. 54, n. 2) —Croker.

‡ As a specimen of Savage's temper, I insert the following letter from him to a noble Lord (Tyrconnel), to whom he was under great obligations, but who, on account of his bad conduct, was obliged to discard him. The original was in the hands of the late Francis Cockayne Cust, Esq., one of his Majesty's council learned in the law—"Right Honourable Barrie and Boony,—I find you want (as Mr. —is pleased to hint) to swear away my life, that is, the life of your creditor, because he asks you for a debt. The public shall soon be acquainted with this, to judge whether you are not fitter to be an Irish evidence, than to be an Irish devouring you. I am, your determined adversary, R. S."—Boswell.

§ Sir John Hawkins gives the world to understand, that Johnson,"being an admirer of gentle manners, was captivated by the appearance and manner of such a luminous and illustrious personage, from his stating the following circumstance as presumptive evidence that Savage was a good swordsman—"That he understood the exercise of a gentlemanly weapon may be inferred from the use made of it in that rash encounter related in his Life." The dexterity here alluded to was, that Savage, in his usual fit of drunkenness, drew his sword, a two-handed sword, and killed him; for which he was tried at the Old Bailey, and found guilty of murder; but, as he was tried at the Old Bailey, and found guilty of murder; but, as he was in a state of intoxication, was acquitted. Johnson, indeed, describes him as having "a grave and manly deportment, a solemn dignity of mien; but which, its varieties, and been much in the company of the statesmen and wits of his time, he could communicate to Johnson an abundant supply of such materials as his philosophical curiosity most eagerly desired; and as Savage's misfortunes and misconduct had reduced him to the lowest state of wretchedness as a writer for bread, his visits to St. John's Gate naturally brought Johnson and him together.† It is melancholy to reflect, that Johnson and Savage were sometimes in such extreme indigence, that they could not pay for a lodging; so that they have wandered together whole nights in the street. Yet in these almost incredible scenes of distress, we may suppose that Savage mentioned many of the anecdotes with which Johnson afterwards enriched the life of his unhappy companion, and those of other poets.

He told Sir Joshua Reynolds, that one night in particular, when Savage and he walked round St. James's Square for want of a lodging, they were not at all depressed by their situation; but, in high spirits and brimful of patriotism, traversed the square for several hours, inveighed against the minister, and "resolved they would stand by their country." I am afraid, however, that by associating with Savage, who was habituated to the dissipation and licentiousness of the town, Johnson, upon a nearer acquaintance, softened into an engaging easiness of manners. How highly Johnson admired him for that knowledge which he himself so much cultivated, and what kindness he entertained for him, appears from the following lines in the Gentleman's Magazine for April, 1738, which I am assured were written by Johnson:—"Ad Ricardum Savage. Humanum studium genus cui pecore ferre\nOvid iuvenum to forelegue genum."—Boswell.

"Thou, whose warm heart for all mankind is a beat. In all mankind should friends and favourites meet. —C.

Boswell should have stated his authority for attributing this poor and obscure couplet to Johnson; and he should not have suppressed the absurd original title—"Ad Ricardum Savage, Arm., Humani generis amatorum."

"To Richard Savage, Esq., the lover of the Human race." I am reluctant to believe that Johnson wrote this sad stuff, which was certainly written shortly before Johnson became personally acquainted with Savage; and if it be Johnson's, was probably intended to propitiate Care, in whose favour Johnson supposed Savage to stand high. The exact date of the commencement of this acquaintance is nowhere given; but it was not earlier than April, 1738. This is of some importance; because Johnson has been reproached with an early infatuation, and with a profligate and unhappy marriage. In the Gentleman's Magazine, Vol. 37, p. 476, he is said to have written Savage's defence at his trial, and is called "an apostle for murder;" and another writer (p. 673) takes some pains to extenuate that culpable fact. Now the trial was in 1727-8, ten years before Johnson ever saw Savage.

The following striking proof of Johnson's extreme indignation, when he published the Life of Savage, was communicated to Mr. Boswell, by Mr. Richard Stowe, of Apyle, in Bedfordshire. It is rendered more curious by the fact, that Walter Harte, author of the Life of Gustavus Adolphus:—"Soon after Savage's Life was published, Mr. Harte dined with Edward Cave, and after dinner, Johnson, who was present, told a story that a plate of victuals was sent behind a screen, which was to Johnson, dressed so smartly, that he did not appear to accept; but, on hearing the conversation, he was highly delighted with the encomiums on his book."—Malone.
though his good principles remained steady, did not entirely preserve that conduct, for which, in days of greater simplicity, he was remarked by his friend Mr. Hector; but was imperceptibly led into some indulgences which occasioned much distress to his virtuous mind. 1

That Johnson was anxious that an authentic and favourable account of his extraordinary friend should first get possession of the public attention, is evident from a letter which he wrote in the Gentleman's Magazine for August of the year preceding its publication.

TO MR. URBAN.

"As your collections show how often you have owed the ornaments of your poetical pages to the correspondence of the unfortunate and ingenious Mr. Savage, I doubt not but you have so much regard to his memory as to encourage any design that may have a tendency to the preservation of it from insults or calumnies; and therefore, with some degree of assurance, I treat you to inform the public, that his Life will speedily be published by a person who was favoured with his confidence, and received from himself an account of most of the transactions which he proposes to delineate, to the time of his retirement to Swansea in Wales.

"From that period, to his death in the prison of Bristol, the account will be continued from materials still less liable to objection; his own letters, and those of his friends, some of which will be inserted in the work, and abstracts of others subjoined in the margin.

"It may be reasonably imagined, that others may have the same design; but as it is not credible that they can obtain the same materials, it must be expected they will supply from invention the want of intelligence; and that, under the title of 'The Life of Savage' they will publish only a novel, filled with romantic adventures and imaginary amours. You may, therefore, perhaps, gratify the lovers of truth and wit, by giving me leave to inform them in your Magazine, that my account will be published in 8vo. by Mr. Roberts, in Warwick Lane."

In February, 1744, it accordingly came forth from the shop of Roberts, between whom and Johnson I have not traced any connection, except the casual one of this publication.2 In Johnson's "Life of Savage," although it must be allowed that its moral is the reverse of— "Resipere exemplar vita morumque jubebo," a very useful lesson is inculcated, to guard men of warm passions from a too free indulgence of them; and the various incidents are related in so clear and animated a manner, and illuminated throughout with so much philosophy, that it is one of the most interesting narratives in the English language.3 Sir Joshua Reynolds told me, that upon his return from Italy he met with it in Devonshire, knowing nothing of its author, and began to read it while he was standing with his arm leaning against a chimney-piece. It seized his attention so strongly, that, not being able to lay down the book till he had finished it, when he attempted to move, he found his arm totally benumbed. The rapidity with which this work was composed is a wonderful circumstance. Johnson has been heard to say [Aug. 11, 1773], "I wrote forty-eight of the printed octavo pages of the Life of Savage at a sitting; but then I sat up all night."

He exhibits the genius of Savage to the best advantage, in the specimens of his poetry which he has selected, some of which are of uncommon merit. We, indeed, occasionally find such vigour and such point, as might make us suppose that the generous aid of Johnson had been imparted to his friend. Mr. Thomas Warton made this remark to me; and, in support of it, quoted from the poem entitled "The Bastard," a line in which the fancied superiority of one "stamped in Nature's mint with exarsity," is contrasted with a regular lawful descendant of some great and ancient family:

"No tenth transmitter of a foolish face."

But the fact is, that this poem was published some years before Johnson and Savage were acquainted.4

It is remarkable, that in this biographical disquisition there appears a very strong symp-

1 I find no trace of any peculiar distress of mind connected with this period. There is none in his Prayers and Meditations; I am convinced by many circumstances that he was at this time "night-walking," and all the other supposed consequences of his very short acquaintance with Savage (little more than a year) have been much exaggerated even by Boswell. Hawkins very uncharitably attributes to the influence of Savage a separation which took place (as he alone asserts) between Johnson and his wife about this time. The whole course of Johnson's life and conduct warrants us in supposing that such temporary separation (if Hawkins be so far correct) must have been produced by pecuniary distress, and not by an interruption of affection. He would be naturally solicitous that his wife should find in her own family a temporary relief, which, as he was struggling but on the other hand, we shall see presently (p. 75) an accusation against Mrs. Johnson, that she indulged herself with company to which, he was struggling, but which he was struggling to resist. While his husband was starving in London. All these stories contradict one another; and, indeed, even the sour Hawkins allows, that Johnson was too strict in his morals to have afforded his wife any reasonable cause for jealousies. Life, 316. - Croker.

2 I find that J. Roberts printed in April, 1744, "The Life of Barretier," probably a reprint from the Gentleman's Magazine; but I have not seen it. Cave sometimes permitted the name of another printer to appear on the title-pages of books of which he was, in fact, the publisher, as Miss Carter's "Examen" was printed under the name of Dodd. In this case the fact is certain; as it appears from the letter to Cave, August, 1743, that Johnson sold the work to him even before it was written. - Croker.

3 Cave was the purchaser of the copyright, and the following is a copy of Johnson's receipt for the money. - "The 14th day of December, received of Mr. Ed. Cave the sum of fifteen guineas, in full, for compiling and writing 'The Life of Richard Savage, Esq.' deceased; and in full for all materials thereto applied, and not found by the said Edward Cave. I say, received by me, SAM. JOHNSON. Dec. 14. 1743." - Wharton.

4 It gives, like Raphael's Lazarus or Murillo's Beggar, pleasure as a work of art, while the original could only excite disgust. Johnson has spread over Savage's character the veil of stately diction and extenuating phrases, but cannot prevent the observant reader from seeing that the subject of this work was a simple charlatan. A word or two calls him "an ungrateful and insolent profitor;" and so little do his works show the reverence due for what he had celebrated, that, if it were not for Johnson's embalming partiality, his works would probably be now as unheard of as they are by the public. - Croker.

His "Life of Savage" was no sooner published, than the following liberal praise was given to it, in "The Champion," a periodical paper:

"This pamphlet is, without flattering to its author, as just and well-written a piece of its kind as I ever saw; so that at the same time that it highly deserves, it certainly stands very little in need of this recommendation. As to the history of the unfortunate person, whose memoirs compose this work, it is certainly penned with equal accuracy and spirit, of which I am so much the better judge, as I know many of the facts mentioned to be strictly true, and very fairly related. Besides, it is not only the story of Mr. Savage, but innumerable incidents relating to other persons, and other affairs, which renders this a very amusing, and, withal, a very instructive and valuable performance. The author's observations are short, significant, and just, as his narrative is remarkably smooth and well disposed. His reflections open to all the recesses of the human heart; and, in a word, a more just or pleasant, a more engaging or a more improving treatise, on all the excellencies and defects of human nature, is scarce to be found in our own, or, perhaps, any other language." 3

Johnson's partiality for Savage made him entertain no doubt of his story, however extraordinary and improbable. It never occurred to him to question his being the son of the Countess of Macclesfield,4 of whose unrelenting barbarity lie so loudly complained, and the particulars of which are related in so strong and affecting a manner in Johnson's Life of him. Johnson was certainly well warranted in publishing his narrative, however offensive it might be to the lady and her relations; because her alleged unnatural and cruel conduct to her son, and shameful avowal of guilt, were stated in a Life of Savage now lying before me, which came out so early as 1727, and no attempt had been made to confute it, or to punish the author or printer as a libeller: but for the honour of human nature, we should be glad to find the shocking tale not true; and from a respectable gentleman 5 connected with the lady's family, I have received such information and remarks, as, joined to my own inquiries, will, I think, render it at least somewhat doubtful, especially when we consider that it must have originated from the person himself who went by the name of Richard Savage.

2 I suspect Dr. Taylor was inaccurate in this statement. The emphasis should be equally upon shall and not, as both concur to form the negative injunction; and false witness, like the other acts prohibited in the Decalogue, should not be marked by any peculiar emphasis, but only be distinctly enunciated. — Boswell. A moderate emphasis should be placed on false. — Keenrey. Sheridan, in his "Lectures on the Art of Reading," (p. 258.) places the emphasis wholly on false. — Markland. Here, on those six words, Thou shalt not bear false witness, we have six authorities — Drs. Johnson, Taylor, and Kearney, and Messrs. Giffard, Sheridan, Boswell — with each a different emphasis. This diversity seems to arise from the fact, that in these awful and con-

3 This character of the "Life of Savage" was not written by Fielding, as has been supposed, but most probably by Ralph, who, as appears from the minutes of the partners of "The Champion," in the possession of Mr. Reed, of Staple Inn, succeeded Fielding in his share of the paper, before the date of that colophon. — Boswell.

If the maxim, falsum in uno, falsum in omnibus, were to be received without qualification, the credit of Savage's narrative, as conveyed to us, would be annihilated; for it contains some assertions which, beyond a question, are not true.

In order to induce a belief that the Earl Rivers—on account of a criminal connection with whom, Lady Macclesfield is said to have been divorced from her husband, by act of parliament [1697]—had a peculiar anxiety about the child which she bore to him, it is alleged, that his Lordship gave him his own name, and had it duly recorded in the register of St. Andrew's, Holborn. I have carefully inspected that register, but no such entry is to be found.

2. It is stated, that “Lady Macclesfield, having lived for some time upon very uneasy terms with her husband, thought a public confession of adultery the most obvious and expeditious method of obtaining her liberty;” and Johnson, assuming this to be true, stigmatises her with indignation, as “the wretch who, without scruple, proclaimed herself an adulteress.” But I have perused the Journals of both houses of Parliament at the period of her divorce, and there find it authentically ascertained, that so far from voluntarily submitting to the ignominious charge of adultery, she made a strenuous defence by her Counsel; the bill having been first moved the 15th of January, 1697-8, in the House of Lords, and proceeded on (with various applications for time to bring up witnesses at a distance, &c.) at intervals, till the 3d of March, when it passed. It was brought to the Commons, by a message from the Lords, the 6th of March, proceeded on the 7th, 10th, 11th, 14th, and 15th, on which day, after a full examination of witnesses on both sides, and hearing of Counsel, it was reported without amendments, passed, and carried to the Lords.

That Lady Macclesfield was convicted of the crime of which she was accused, cannot be denied; but the question now is, whether the person calling himself Richard Savage was her son.

It has been said, that when Earl Rivers was dying, and anxious to provide for all his natural children, he was informed by Lady Macclesfield, that her son by him was dead. Whether, then, shall we believe that this was a malignant lie, invented by a mother to prevent her own child from receiving the bounty of his father, which was accordingly the consequence, if the person whose life Johnson wrote was her son; or shall we not rather believe that the person who then assumed the name of Richard Savage was an impostor, being in reality the son of the shoemaker, under whose wife’s care Lady Macclesfield’s child was placed; that after the death of the real Richard Savage, he attempted to personate him; and that the fraud being known to Lady Macclesfield, he was therefore repulsed by her with just resentment?

There is a strong circumstance in support of the last supposition; though it has been mentioned as an aggravation of Lady Macclesfield’s unnatural conduct, and that is, her having prevented him from obtaining the benefit of a legacy left to him by Mrs. Lloyd, his godmother. For if there was such a legacy left, his not being able to obtain payment of it must be imputed to his consciousness that he was not the real person. The just inference should be, that by the death of Lady Macclesfield’s child before its godmother, the legacy became lapsed, and therefore that Johnson’s Richard Savage was an impostor.

If he had a title to the legacy, he could not.

Conformable to this statement is the entry in the register of St. Andrew’s, Holborn, which is as follows, and which unquestionably records the baptism of Richard Savage, to whom Lord Rivers gave his own Christian name, prefixed to the assumed surname of his mother:—“Jan. 1696-7, Richard, son of John Smith and Mary, in Fox Court, in Gray’s Inn Lane, baptized the 18th.”—BIBL.—

Mr. Cust and Mr. Boswell’s share of the argument and assertions in the text not being distinguished, it is not possible to say which of them hazarded the erroneous statement relative to the parish register of St. Andrew’s, which certainly does contain what the text asserts is not to be found in it. If the maxims, therefore, falsum in uno, falsum in omnibus, were to be applied to them, all their observations must be rejected. On the other hand, Mr. Bindley’s researches seem only to prove what has been generally admitted, that Lady Macclesfield had a child, by Lord Rivers, baptized by the name of Richard; but it does not disprove the assertion, that this child died in its infancy, and that Savage, when between seventeen and eighteen, assumed its name. Savage, in a letter which he despatched to his godmother that he did pass under the name till he was seventeen years of age, but not the name of any person he lived with.—Life of Mrs. Carter, vol. 1, p. 59. (The Danish author.)

2 No divorce can be obtained in the courts on mere confession of the party. There must be proofs. —KIRNLEY.

3 But it seems that his Life of Savage was written in 1749, and that this being his apprentice, was not the husband of his nurse. See Johnson’s Life of Savage.—J. BOSWELL.
have found any difficulty in recovering it; for had the executors resisted his claim, the whole costs, as well as the legacy, must have been paid by them, if he had been the child to whom it was given.

The talents of Savage, and the mingled fire, rudeness, pride, meanness, and ferocity of his character, 2 concur in making it credible that he was fit to plan and carry on an ambitious and daring scheme of imposture, similar instances of which have not been wanting in higher spheres, in the history of different countries, and have had a considerable degree of success. Yet, on the other hand, to the companion of Johnson (who, through whatever medium he was conveyed into this world, be it ever so doubtful, "to whom related, or by whom begot," was, unquestionably, a man of no common endowments,) we must allow the weight of general repute as to his status or parentage, though illicit; and, supposing him to be an impostor, it seems strange that Lord Tyrconnel, the nephew of Lady Macclesfield, should patronise him, and even admit him as a guest in his family. 3 Lastly, it must ever appear very suspicious, that three different accounts of the Life of Richard Savage,—one published in "The Plain Dealer," in 1724, another in 1727, and another by the powerful pen of Johnson, in 1744,—and all of them while Lady Macclesfield was alive 4 should, notwithstanding the severe attacks upon her, have been suffered to pass without any public and effectual contradiction. 5

I have thus endeavoured to sum up the evidence upon the case, as fairly as I can; and the result seems to be, that the world must vibrate in a state of uncertainty as to the truth.

This digression, I trust, will not be censured, as it relates to a matter exceedingly curious, and very intimately connected with Johnson, both as a man and an author.

He this year wrote the "Preface to the Harleian Miscellany." 6 The selection of the pamphlets of which it was composed was made by Mr. Oldys, a man of eager curiosity, and indefatigable diligence, which brought out that spirit of inquiry into the literature of the old English writers, by which the works of our great dramatic poet have of late been so signaliy illustrated. 6

1745—1749.

In 1745, he published a pamphlet entitled "Miscellaneous Observations on the Tragedy

1 This is decisive. If Savage was what he represented himself to be, no thing could have prevented his recovering his legacy. — CROKER.

2 Johnson's companion appears to have persuaded that lofty, illiberal, and unenlightened writer to regard a Nobody as his pride; for Johnson, after painting in strong colours the quarrel between Lord Tyrconnel and Savage, asserts that "the story of Mr. Savage, indeed, never suffered him to solicit a reconciliation; he returned reproach for reproach, and insult for insult." But the respectable gentleman to whom I have alluded, has in his possession a letter from Savage, after Lord Tyrconnel had discarded him, addressed to the Rev. Mr. Gilbert, his Lordship's chaplain, in which he requests him, in the humblest manner, to represent his case to the Viscount. — BOSWELL.

3 Trusting to Savage's information, Johnson represents this unhappy man's being received as a companion by Lord Tyrconnel, and pensioned by his Lordship, as posterior to Savage's capacity and ambition. But I am assured, that Savage had received the voluntary bounty of Lord Tyrconnel, and had been dismissed by him long before the murder was committed, and that his Lordship was very instrumental in procuring Savage's pardon, by his interference with the Queen, through Lady Hertford. If, therefore, he had been declared a real impostor and a rascal, he would have left him to his fate. Indeed, I must observe, that although Johnson mentions that Lord Tyrconnel's patronage of Savage's "upon his promise to lay aside his designs of exposing the cruelty of his mother," the great biographer has forgotten that he himself has mentioned, that Savage's story had been told several years before in "The Plain Dealer;" from which he quotes this strong saying of the generous Sir Richard Steele, that the "inhumanity of his mother has given right to find every good man his father." At the same time it must be acknowledged, that Lady Macclesfield and her relations might still wish that her son should not be brought into more conspicuous notice by the satirical pen of Savage. — BOSWELL.

clesfield by divorce, was married to Colonel Brett, and, it is said, was well known in all the polite circles. Colley Cibber, I am informed, had so high an opinion of her taste and judgment as to gentylc life and manners, that he submitted every scene of his "Careless Husband" to Mrs. Brett's revision and correction. Colonel Brett was reported to be free in his gallantry with her lady's maid. Mrs. Brett came into a room one day in her own house, and found the Colonel and her maid both fast asleep in two chairs. She tied a white handkerchief round her husband's neck, which was a sufficient proof that she had discovered his intrigue; but she never at any time took notice of it to him. This incident, as I am told, gave occasion to the well-wrought scene of Sir Charles and Lady Easy, and Edging. — BOSWELL.

Lady Macclesfield died 1735, aged above 85. Her eldest daughter, by Col. Brett, was, for the last three months of her life, the mistress of George I. (See Walpole's Reminis-cences.) Her marriage ten years after her royal lover's death is thus announced in the Gent. Mag, 1757: — "Sept. 17, Sir W. Leman, of Northall, Bart., to Miss Brett of Bond Street, an heiress;" and again next month — "Oct. 8, Sir William Leman, of Northall, Bart., to Miss Brett, half sister to Mr. Savage, son to the late Earl Rivers;" for the difference of date I know not how to account; but the second insertion was, no doubt, made by Savage to counteract his own pretensions — CROKER.

5 It should, however, as Boswell himself suggests, be recollected, before we draw any conclusion from Lady Macc-clesfield's forbearance to prosecute a libeller, that however innocent she might be as to Savage, she was undeniably and personally engaged in the pamphleteers' respects, and would have been naturally reluctant to drag her frailties again before the public. — CROKER.

6 Wolfe was born in 1686. In 1737 he published "The British Librarian; an Abstract of our most scarce, useful, and valuable Books;" and, in 1738, "A Life of Sir Walter Raleigh." He also contributed several articles to the General Dictionary, and the Biographia Britannica. He died in 1791. — WRIGHT.
of Macbeth, with Remarks on Sir T. H.'s (Sir Thomas Hamner's) Edition of Shakspeare." 1

To which he affixed, Proposals for a new edition of that poet.

As we do not trace any thing else published by him during the course of this year, we may conjecture that he was occupied entirely with that work. But the little encouragement which was given by the public to his anonymous proposals for the execution of a task which Warburton was known to have undertaken, probably damped his ardour. His pamphlet, however, was highly esteemed, and was fortunate enough to obtain the approbation even of the supercilious Warburton himself, who, in the Preface to his Shakspeare, published two years afterwards, thus mentioned it:—"As to all those things which have been published under the titles of Essays, Remarks, Observations, &c, on Shakspeare, if you except some Critical Notes on Macbeth, given as a specimen of a projected edition, and written, as appears, by a man of parts and genius, the rest are absolutely below a serious notice."

Of this flattering distinction shown to him by Warburton, a very grateful remembrance was ever entertained by Johnson, who said, "He praised me at a time when praise was of value to me."

In 1746, it is probable that he was still employed upon his Shakspeare, which perhaps he laid aside for a time, upon account of the high expectations which were formed of Warburton's edition of that great poet. It is somewhat curious, that his literary career appears to have been almost totally suspended in the years 1745 and 1746, those years which were marked by a civil war in Great Britain, when a rash attempt was made to restore the House of Stuart to the throne. That he had a tenderness for that unfortunate House, is well known; and some may fancifully imagine, that a sympathetic anxiety impeded the exertion of his intellectual powers; but I am inclined to think, that he was, during this time, sketching the outlines of his great philological work.

None of his letters during those years are extant, so far as I can discover. This is much to be regretted. It might afford some entertainment to see how he then expressed himself to his private friends concerning state affairs. Dr. Adams informs me, that "at this time a favourite object which he had in contemplation was 'The Life of Alfred,' in which, from the warmth with which he spoke about it, he would, I believe, had he been master of his own will, have engaged himself, rather than on any other subject."

In 1747, it is supposed that the Gentleman's Magazine for May was enriched by him with five short poetical pieces distinguished by three asterisks. The first is a translation, or rather a paraphrase, of a Latin Epitaph on Sir Thomas Hamner. Whether the Latin was his, or not, I have never heard, though I should think it probably was, if it be certain that he wrote the English; as to which my only cause of doubt is, that his slighting character of Hamner as an editor, in his "Observations on Macbeth," is very different from that in the Epitaph. It may be said, that there is the same contrariety between the character in the Observations, and that in his own Preface to Shakspeare; but a considerable time elapsed between the one publication and the other, whereas, the Observations and the Epitaph came close together. The others are, "To Miss—on her giving the Author's gold silk net--a Purse of her own weaving;"

"Stella in Mourning;" "The Winter's Walk;"

"An Ode;" and, "To Lyee, an elderly Lady." I am not positive that all these were his productions; but as "The Winter's Walk" has never been controverted to be his, and of all

2 In the Garrick Correspondence, there is a letter from Gilbert Walsamsey, dated Nov. 3, 1746, containing this passage:—"When you see Mr. Johnson, pray give my compliments, and tell him I esteem him as a great genius — quite last, both to himself and the world." Upon which the Editor observes, "Between the years 1745 and 1746, Johnson literally wrote no work that was then raging perhaps inspired him with the hopes that attached to his political principles. He loved the House of Stuart, and in the success of the Pretender, he rejoiced in his own way, and his own manner. It would be, I readily admit, too fanciful to believe that his literary powers were suspended by the sympathetic anxiety; but it is little less than impossible to believe, that Mr. Boswell, that he had employed these two years in contemplative preparation for his future Dictionary. He must have had some means, however, of obtaining information; in the absence of all other explanation, I cannot reject as altogether fanciful the idea of the Garrick Editor, that he may have been diverted from his original purpose by the sympathetic anxiety, but by some mere personal share in the proceedings of the Jacobite party. We shall see hereafter (Aug. 1746) that he was in close correspondence with one of the Scotch Jacobites, who was hiding from justice for his share in the rebellion; he may not have been in some difficulties, which might occasion his own absence or concealment: which might not have been the period of his temporary separation from his wife, any strange occurrence ever occurred; and, finally, it is at least a curious coincidence that Johnson's disappearance from the Gentleman's Magazine, Feb. 1744, (n. p. 49 n. 1.) is exactly contemporaneous with the arrest of Col. Cecel, the Pretender's agent and the general agitation into which the country was thrown by the king's message to Parliament announcing an invasion, and that he reappears in 1747, when the rebellion and all its fatal consequences were over. I have a strong suspicion that from this period dates the rise of his amanuenses in compiling the Dictionary, may have reference to this period. See post, Dec. 1775, 27th Feb. and 19th March, 1784, and the notes about Francis Stuart in the Appendix, Dec. 1746.

3 In the "Universal Visiter," to which Johnson contributed, the mark which is affixed to some pieces unquestionably by his, is also found employed to designate which was certainly not the author. The mark, therefore, will not ascertain the poems in question to have been written by him. Some of them are probably the productions of Hawkeworth, who, it is believed, was afflicted with the gout. The verses on a Purse were inserted afterwards in Mrs. Williams's Miscellany; and the procuration by the postscript is a means of covering the inaccuracy of the poet's memory.

There is no evidence whatever that any of these were Johnson's, and every reason to suppose that they are all Hawkeworth's. The ode which Boswell adverts about on external evidence, is the ode to Spring, which, as well as those on Summer, Autumn, and Winter, have been of late published as Johnson's, and are, no doubt, as Boswell says, all by the same hand. But we see that Spring bears internal marks of not being Johnson's, and of being Hawkeworth's, Winter and Summer, Mr. Chalmers asserts to be also Hawkethem have the same mark, it is reasonable to conclude that they are all written by the same hand. Yet to the Ode, in which we find a passage very characteristic of him, being a learned description of the gout,

"Unhappy, whom to beds of pain Arthritis tyranny consigns;"

there is the following note, "The author being ill of the gout:" but Johnson was not attacked with that distemper till a very late period of his life. May not this, however, be a poetical fiction? Why may not a poet suppose himself to have the gout, as well as suppose himself to be in love, of which we have innumerable instances, and which has been admirably ridiculed by Johnson in his "Life of Cowley?" I have also some difficulty to believe that he could produce such a group of conceits as appear in the verses to Lyce, in which he claims for this ancient personage as good a right to be assimilated to heaven, as nymphs whom other poets have flattered; he therefore ironically ascribes to her the attributes of the sky, in such stanzas as this:—

"Her teeth the night with darkness dies,
She's star'd with pimples over;
Her tongue like nimble lightning plies,
And can with thunder roar."

But as, at a very advanced age, he could descend to trite in namby-pamby rhymes, to please Mrs. Thrale and her daughter, he may have, in his earlier years, composed such a piece as this.

It is remarkable, that in this first edition of "The Winter's Walk," the concluding line is much more Johnsonian than it was afterwards printed; for in subsequent editions, after praying Stella to "snatch him to her arms," he says,

"And shield me from the ills of life."

Whereas in the first edition it is

"And hide me from the sight of life."

A horror at life in general is more consonant with Johnson's habitual gloomy cast of thought. I have heard him repeat with great energy the following verses, which appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine for April this year; but I have no authority to say they were his own. Indeed, one of the best critics of our age suggests to me, that "the word indifferently being used in the sense of without concern, and being also very unpoetical, renders it improbable that they should have been his composition." 2

ON LORD LOYAT'S EXECUTION.

"Pitied by gentle minds Kilmarnock died;
The brave, Balmerino, were on thy side;
Radcliffe, unhappy in his crimes of youth,
Steady in what he still mistook for truth,
Beheld his death so decently unmoved,
The soft lamented, and the brave approved.
But Loyat's fate indifferently we view,
True to no king, to no religion true:
No fair forgets the ruin he has done;
No child laments the tyrant of his son;
No broken pities, thinking what he has;
No Whig the passions, for he left the cause;
The brave regret not, for he was not brave;
The honest mourn not, knowing him a knave!" 3

This year his old pupil and friend, David Garrick, having become joint patentee and manager of Drury Lane theatre, Johnson honoured his opening of it with a Prologue, which, for just and manly dramatic criticism on the whole range of the English stage, as well as for poetical excellence, is unrivalled. Like the celebrated Epilogue to the "Distressed Mother," it was, during the season, often called for by the audience. The most striking and brilliant passages of it have been so often repeated, and are so well recollected by all the lovers of the drama and of poetry, that it would be superfluous to point them out. In the Gentleman's Magazine for December this year, he inserted an "Ode on Winter," which is, I think, an admirable specimen of his genius for lyric poetry. 4

But the year 1747 is distinguished as the

he was retiring from the bar, he said, "Fare you well, my lords, we shall not all meet again in one place." He behaved with perfect composure at his execution, and called out, "Doles et decorum est pro patria mori."—BOSWELL.

He was a prognostic villain, and deserved death for his moral, at least, as much as for his political, offences. There is, in the Gentleman's Magazine for April, 1747, an account of the behaviour of Lord Loyat at his execution, the latter part of which, censuring pleasantry in artculo mortis, bears strong internal evidence, both in matter and manner, of having been written by Johnson. The interest which he took in this transaction may have fixed in his memory the lines on Lord Loyat, which certainly do not resemble his own style.—CROKER.

3 1712, Ambrose Philips brought upon the stage, "The Distressed Mother," almost a translation of Racine's 'Andromaque.' It was concluded with the most successful epilogue that was ever yet spoken on the English theatre. The three first nights it was received twice, and continued to be demanded through the run, as it is termed, of the play. Johnson, Life of A. Phillips.—WRIGHT. This celebrated prologue, though attributed to Boswell, was written by Addison. Its post, 26th April, 1776. —CROKER, 1840.

epoch when Johnson’s arduous and important work, his Dictionary of the English Language,” was announced to the world, by the publication of its Plan or Prospectus.

How long this immense undertaking had been the object of his contemplation, I do not know. I once asked him by what means he had attained to that astonishing knowledge of our language, by which he was enabled to realise a design of such extent and accumulated difficulty. He told me, that “it was not the effect of particular study; but that it had grown up in his mind insensibly.” I have been informed by Mr. James Dodsley, that several years before this period, when Johnson was one day sitting in his brother Robert’s shop, he heard his brother suggest to him, that a Dictionary of the English Language would be a work that would be well received by the public; that Johnson seemed at first to catch at the proposition, but, after a pause, said, in his abrupt decisive manner, “I believe I shall not undertake it.” That he, however, had bestowed much thought upon the subject, before he published his „Plan,” is evident from the enlarged, clear, and accurate views which it exhibits; and we find him mentioning in that tract, that many of the writers whose testimonies were to be produced as authorities, were selected by Pope; which proves that he had been furnished, probably by Mr. Robert Dodsley, with whatever hints that eminent poet had contributed towards a great literary project, that had been the subject of important consideration in a former reign.

The booksellers who contracted with Johnson, single and unaided, for the execution of a work, which in other countries has not been effected but by the co-operating exertions of many, were Mr. Robert Dodsley, Mr. Charles Hitch, Mr. Andrew Millar, the two Messieurs Longman, and the two Messieurs Knapton. The price stipulated was fifteen hundred and seventy-five pounds.

The „Plan” was addressed to Philip Dormer, Earl of Chesterfield, then one of his Majesty’s Principal Secretaries of State; a nobleman who was very ambitious of literary distinction, and who, upon being informed of the design, had expressed himself in terms very favourable to its success. There is, perhaps, in every thing of any consequence, a secret history which it would be amusing to know, could we have it authentically communicated. Johnson told me (Sept. 22. 1777, going from Ashbourn to Islam), “Sir, the way in which the plan of my Dictionary came to be inscribed to Lord Chesterfield, was this: I had neglected to write it by the time appointed. Dodsley suggested a desire to have it addressed to Lord Chesterfield. I laid hold of this as a pretext for delay, that it might be better done, and let Dodsley have the more. I said to my friend, Dr. Burke, ‘Now, if any good comes of my addressing to Lord Chesterfield, it will be ascribed to deep policy, when, in fact, it was only a casual excuse for laziness.’”

It is worthy of observation, that the “Plan” has not only the substantial merit of comprehension, perspicuity, and precision, but that the language of it is unexceptionably excellent; it being altogether free from that inflation of style, and those uncommon but apt and energetic words, which, in some of his writings, have been censured, with more petulance than justice; and never was there a more dignified strain of compliment than that in which he courts the attention of one who, he had been persuaded to believe, would be a respectable patron.

“With regard to questions of purity or propriety,” says he, “I was once in doubt whether I should not attribute to myself too much in attempting to decide them, and whether my province was to extend beyond the proposition of the question, and the display of the suffrages on each side; but I have been since determined by your lordship’s opinion, to interpose my own judgment, and shall therefore endeavour to support what appears to me most consonant to grammar and reason. Ausonius thought that modesty forbade him to plead inability for a task to which Caesar had assigned him equal:

And I may hope, my lord, that since you, whose authority in our language is so generally acknowledged, have commissioned me to declare my own opinion, I shall be considered as exercising a kind of vicarious jurisdiction; and that the power which might have been denied to my own claim, will be readily allowed me as the delegate of your lordship.”

This passage proves, that Johnson’s addressing his “Plan” to Lord Chesterfield was not merely in consequence of the result of a report by means of Dodsley, that the earl favoured the design; but that there had been a particular communication with his lordship concerning it. Dr. Taylor told me, that Johnson sent his “Plan” to him in manuscript, for his perusal; and that when it was lying upon his table, Mr. William Whitehead happened to pay him a visit, and being shown it, was highly pleased with such parts of it as he had time to read, and begged to take it home with him.

1 The reader will see on the next pages, under Johnson’s own hand, that this account of the affair was inaccurate; but if it were correct, would it not invalidate Johnson’s subsequent complaint of Lord Chesterfield’s inattention and ingratitude? For even if his lordship had neglected that which had been dedicated to him only by laziness and accident, he could not justly be charged with ingratitude; a dedicatory who means no compliment, has no reason to complain if he be not rewarded; but more of this hereafter. — Croker.

2 William Whitehead (see ante, p. 9), born at Cambridge in 1715, was the fashionable poet of a day, that forged Horace’s anathema against mediocrity. He succeeded Cibber as poet laureate in 1757, and died April 14. 1785. He must not be confounded with Paul Whitehead, no better poet, and a much less estimable man. — Croker.
which he was allowed to do; that from him it got into the hands of a noble lord, who carried it to Lord Chesterfield. 1 When Taylor observed this might be an advantage, Johnson replied, "No, Sir, it would have come out with more bloom if it had not been seen before by anybody."

The opinion conceived of it by another noble author, appears from the following extract of a letter from the Earl of Orrery 2 to Dr. Birch:

"Caledon, Dec. 30. 1747."

"I have just now seen the specimen of Mr. Johnson's Dictionary, addressed to Lord Chesterfield. I am much pleased with the plan, and I think the specimen is one of the best that I have ever read. Most specimens disgust rather than prejudice us in favour of the work to follow; but the language of Mr. Johnson's is good, and the arguments are properly and modestly expressed. However, some expressions may be cavilled at, but they are trifles. I'll mention one: the barren laurel. The laurel is not barren, in any sense whatever; it bears fruits and flowers. Sed ha sunt nugas, and I have great expectations from the performance."

That he was fully aware of the arduous nature of the undertaking, he acknowledges; and shows himself perfectly sensible of it in the conclusion of his "Plan;" but he had a noble consciousness of his own abilities, which enabled him to go on with undaunted spirit.

Dr. Adams found him one day busy at his Dictionary, when the following dialogue ensued: "Adams. This is a great work, sir. How are you to get all the etymologies? Johnson. Why, sir, here is a shelf with Junius, and Skinner, and others; and there is a Welsh gentleman who has published a collection of Welsh proverbs, who will help me with the Welsh. Adams. But, sir, how can you do this in three years? Johnson. Sir, I have no doubt that I can do it in three years. Adams. But the French Academy, which consists of forty members, took forty years to compile their Dictionary. Johnson. Sir, thus it is. This is the proportion which I see; forty times forty is sixteen hundred. As three to sixteen hundred, so is the proportion of an Englishman to a Frenchman." With so much ease and pleasantry could be talk of that prodigious labour which he had undertaken to execute.

The public has had, from another pen 4, a long detail of what had been done in this country by prior Lexicographers; and no doubt Johnson was wise to avoid himself of them, so far as they went: but the learned yet judicious research of etymology, the various yet accurate display of definition, and the rich collection of authorities, were reserved for the superior mind of our great philologist. For the mechanical part he employed, as he told me, six amanuenses; and let it be remembered by the natives of North-Britain, to whom he is supposed to have been so hostile, that five of them were of that country. There were two Messieurs Macbean; Mr. Shiels, who, we shall hereafter see [April 10, 1776], partly wrote 5 the Lives of the Poets to which the name of Cibber is affixed; Mr. [Francis] Stewart 6, son of Mr. George Stewart, bookseller at Edinburgh; and a Mr. Maitland. The sixth of these humble assistants was Mr. Peyton, who, I believe, taught French, and published some elementary tracts.

To all these painful labourers, Johnson showed a never-ceasing kindness, so far as they stood in need of it. The elder Mr. Macbean had afterwards the honour of being Librarian to Archibald Duke of Argyle, for many years, but was left without a shilling; Johnson wrote for him a Preface to "A System of Ancient Geography;" and, by the favour of Lord Thurlow, got him admitted a poor brother of the Charter-house. For Shiels, who died of a consumption, he had much tenderness; and it has been thought that some choice sentences in the Lives of the Poets were supplied by him. Peyton, when reduced to penury, had frequent aid from the bounty of Johnson; who at last was at the expense of burying him and his wife.

While the Dictionary was going forward, Johnson lived part of the time in Holborn, part in Gough Square, Fleet Street; and he had an upper room fitted up like a counting-house for the purpose, in which he gave to the copyists their several tasks. The words partly taken from other dictionaries, and partly supplied by himself, having been first written down with spaces left between them, he delivered in writing their etymologies, definitions, and various significations.1 The authorities were copied from the books themselves, in which he had marked the passages with a black-lead pencil 2, the traces of which could easily be effaced. I have seen several of them, in which that trouble had not been taken; so that they were just as when used by the copyists. It is remarkable, that he was so attentive in the choice of the passages in which words were authorised, that one may read page after page of his Dictionary with improvement and pleasure; and it should not pass unobserved, that he has quoted no author whose writings had a tendency to hurt sound religion and morality.

The necessary expense of preparing a work of such magnitude for the press, must have been a considerable deduction from the price stipulated to be paid for the copyright. I understand that nothing was allowed by the booksellers on that account; and I remember his telling me, that a large portion of it having, by mistake, been written upon both sides of the paper, so as to be inconvenient for the compositor, it cost him twenty pounds to have it transcribed upon one side only.

He is now to be considered as "tugging at his oar," as engaged in a steady continued course of occupation, sufficient to employ all his time for some years; and which was the best preventive of that constitutional melan- choly which was ever lurking about him, ready to trouble his quiet. But his enlarged and lively mind could not be satisfied without more diversity of employment, and the pleasure of animated relaxation.3 He therefore not only exerted his talents in occasional composition, very different from Lexicography, but formed a club in Ivy Lane, Pater-noster Row, with a view to enjoy literary discussion, and amuse his evening hours. The members associated with him in this little society were his beloved friend Dr. Richard Bathurst, Mr. Hawkesworth, afterwards well known by his writings, Mr. John Hawkins, an attorney; and a few others of different professions.5

The persons who composed this little society were—the Rev. Dr. Salter, father of the late Master of the Charter House; Dr. Hawkesworth; Mr. Ryland, a merchant; Mr. John Payne, then a bookseller; Mr. Samuel Dyer, a learned young man intended for the dissenting ministry; Dr. William McGhie, a Scots physician; Dr. Edmund Barker, a young physician; Dr. Richard Bathurst, also a young physician; and myself. As at these meetings I had opportunities of ob- serving, not only that in conversation Johnson made it a rule to talk his best, but that on many subjects he was not uniform in his collection of facts, as the following anecdote may shew.

At one time good, at another evil, was predominant in the moral constitution of the world. Upon one occasion, he began to enlarge upon the moral tendencies of each of the countries of the world. After a time, he said, another deny that among us of the present age there is any decline of public worship. He would sometimes contradict self-evident assertions; but in such a case, after a time, he would allow it. To this country has increased with its riches; and that the practice among us is much greater than heretofore. At this versatility of temper none, however, took offence: and my- self, under and Caesar were born for conquest, so was Johnson for the office of a symposium, to preside in all conversations; and I never yet saw the man who would venture to contest his right. Let it not, however, be imagined, that the members of this club met together with the temper of flatter- ers, or that there was wanting among them a disposition to yield to each other in all diversities of opinion; and, indeed, the matter was not, as in many associations of this kind, the purpose of the meeting; nor were their conversations, like those of the Rota club, restrained to particular topics. On the contrary, he would often say, that they amused themselves in the best manner of conversation, by the many witty sayings he uttered, and the many excellent stories which his memory had treasured up, and his ingenuity employed in recomposing; and, as the reader may observe in the following extract, he did not disdain to mislead him, either from the general tendency of his writings, or that appearance of hebetude which marked his countenance, and was often used in order to determine the ideas and prints of him, that he could only reason and discuss dialect and control. In the talent of humour there hardly ever was a man who could play so variously the parts of old comedians, such as Tarleton, and a few others mentioned by Cibber. He rejoiced in the fancy of being able to give to any relation that was required it, the graces and aids of expression, and to discri- minate, with the nicest exactness, the characters of those persons vividly or in a more or less manner to the amusement and benefit of the hearer.
In the Gentleman's Magazine for May of this year he wrote a "Life of Roscommon," with Notes; which he afterwards much improved, (indenting the notes into text,) and inserted amongst his Lives of the English Poets.

Mr. Dodson this year brought out his "Freecepor," one of the most valuable books for the improvement of young minds that has appeared in any language; and to this meritorious work Johnson furnished "The Preface," containing a general sketch of the book, with a short and peremptory recommendation of each article; as also, "The Vision of Theodore, the Hermit, found in his Cell," a most beautiful allegory of human life, under the figure of ascending the mountain of Existence. The Bishop of Dromore heard Dr. Johnson say, that he thought this was the best thing he ever wrote.1

In January, 1749, he published "The Vanity of Human Wishes, being the Tenth Satire of Juvenal imitated." 2 He, I believe, composed it the preceding year.2 Mrs. Johnson, for the sake of country air, had lodgings at Hampstead, to which he resorted occasionally, and there the greatest part, if not the whole, of this Imitation was written. The fervid rapidity with which it was produced, is scarcely credible. I have heard him say, that he composed seventy lines of it in one day, without putting one of them upon paper till they were finished.3 I remember when I once regretted to him that he had not given us more of Juvenal’s Satires, he said he probably should give more, for he had them all in his head: by which I understood, that he had the originals and correspondent allusions floating in his mind, which he could, when he pleased, embody and render permanent without much labour. Some of them, however, he observed, were too gross for imitation.

The profits of a single poem, however excellent, appear to have been very small in the last reign, compared with what a publication of the same size has since been known to yield. I have mentioned, upon Johnson’s own authority, that for his "London" he had only ten guineas; and now, after his fame was established, he got for his "Vanity of Human Wishes" but five guineas more, as is proved by an authentic document in my possession.4 It will be observed, that he reserves to himself the right of printing one edition of this satire, which was his practice upon occasion of the sale of all his writings; it being his fixed intention to publish at some period, for his own profit, a complete collection of his works.

His "Vanity of Human Wishes" has less of common life, but more of a philosophic dignity, than his "London." More readers, therefore, will be delighted with the pointed spirit of "London," than with the profound reflection of "The Vanity of Human Wishes."5 Garrick, for instance, observed, in his sprightly manner, with more vivacity than regard to just discrimination, as is usual with wits, "When Johnson lived much with the Her- veys, and saw a good deal of what was passing in life, he wrote his 'London,' which is lively and easy; when he became more retired he gave us his 'Vanity of Human Wishes,' which is as hard as Greek; had he gone on to imitate another satire, it would have been as hard as Hebrew."6

But "The Vanity of Human Wishes" is, in the opinion of the best judges, as high an effort of ethic poetry as any language can show. The instances of variety of disappointment are chosen so judiciously, and painted so

1 "Thought a man of pleasantry, not a little out of countenance." (Life, p. 235.)
2 "A better judge than Sir J. Hawkins, tells us, to the same effect, that "Johnson was surprised to be told, but it was certainly true, that with all his great powers of mind, wit and humour were his most shining talents:" and Mrs. Piozzi says, that "his vein of humour was rich and apparently inexhaustible—to such a degree, that Mr. Murphy used to say he was incomparable at buffoonery." This should be borne in mind in reading Johnson’s conversations, because much of that peculiarity called humour cannot be adequately conveyed in words, and many things may appear trite, dull, or offensively rude in mere narrations, which were relished or softened by the air and style of the delivery.——Croker.
3 The Bishop told Mr. Tyers, that Johnson composed it, in one night, at finishing an evening at Holborn.—Croker.
4 "Mr. Murphy's rather than Sir J. Hawkins's general habit of composing: his defect of sight rendered writing and corrections some-what troublesome, and he therefore often exercised his memory where others would have employed pen and paper.—Croker.
5 "Nov. 25. 1749, I received of Mr. Dodder fifteen guineas, for which I assigned to him the right of copy of an Imitation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal, written by me, reserving to myself the right of printing one edition.——SAM. JOHNSON."—Bowles.
6 "Jan. 9. 1821. Read Johnson's "Vanity of Human Wishes," — all the examples and mode of giving them sub-line, as well as the latter part, with the exception of an occasional couplet. I do not so much admire the opening, as the first line, "Let observation," etc. as otherwise useless. But 'tis a grand poem—and so true!—true as the Tenth of Juvenal himself. The lapse of ages changes all things—time, language—the earth—the bounds of the sea—the stars of the sky, and every thing "about, around, and underneath" man, except man himself. The infinite variety of lives, and the infinity of wishes lead but to disappointment.—Byron, vol. v. p. 66.—Wright.

7 From Mr. Langton.—Bowles. I doubt the accuracy of Mr. Langton's report. Garrick's criticism (if it deserves the name) and his facts are both unfounded. "The Vanity of Human Wishes" is in a graver and higher tone than the "London.") "You must not here to think of understanding. On the contrary, some classical allusions, inconsistent with modern manners, obscure passages of the London: while the illustrations, sentiments, and expressions of the other are, though wonderfully noble and dignified, yet perfectly intelligible and almost familiar. Moreover, had he known that when Johnson wrote "London" he was not living the gay and fashionable life which Mr. Garrick is represented as mentioning, that he was standing in obscure lodgings an eight-pence, or perhaps even four-pence a day (see ante, p. 27, n. 6); and there is, in "London," nothing to show any intimacy with the gay or fashionable world. As to the Her veys, it must again be stated,—contrary to Mr. Bowles's (as well as Mr. Garrick's) supposition,—that he was intimate with that family previous to the publication of "London." —that the queen in that poem at "Clotho's feast," stood, in the first edition, "H—y's feast," and was no doubt aimed at Lord Hervey; that he was in such a state of satire with the opposition writers of the day.—Croker.
strongly, that, the moment they are read, they bring conviction to every thinking mind. That of the scholar must have depressed the too sanguine expectations of many an ambitious student. That of the warrior, Charles of Sweden, is, I think, as highly finished a picture as can possibly be conceived.

Were all the other excellencies of this poem annihilated, it must ever have our grateful reverence from its noble conclusion; in which we are consoled with the assurance that happiness may be attained, if we "apply our hearts" to piety:—

"Where then shall hope and fear their objects find? Shall dull suspense corrupt the stagnant mind? Must helpless man, in ignorance sedate, Roll darkling down the torrent of his fate? Shall no dislike alarm, no wishes rise, No cries attempt the mercy of the skies? Inquirer, cease! petitions yet remain, When Heaven may hear, nor deem Religion vain. Still raise for good the supplicating voice, But leave to Heaven the measure and the choice. Safe in His hand, whose eye discerns afar The secret ambush of a splendid prayer; Implore His aid, in His decisions rest, Secure, whate'er He gives, He gives the best; Yet when the sense of sacred presence fires, And strong devotion to the skies aspires, Pour forth thy fervours for a healthful mind, Obedient passions, and a will resign'd.

For love, which scarce collective man can fill; For patience, sovereign o'er transmuted ill; For faith, which panting for a happier seat, Counts death kind Nature's signal for retreat:

1 When Dr. Johnson, one day, read his own satire, in which the life of a scholar is painted, with the various obstructions thrown in his way to fortune and to fame, he burst into a passion of tears: Mr. Thrale's family and Mr. Scott only laughed: Dr. Johnson walked away: "Get your head on the back," and said, "What's all this, my dear sir? Why you, and I, and Herocles, you know, were all troubled with mechanic orders, in our youth, and made out the triumphs and marathons, and all the rest; and I suppose you must have done it, you won't deny, for the same reason, when Heaven and Hercules comically enough?— Pozzi. This was in allusion to the madness of Hercules on Mount Oeta.—George Lewis Scott, F. R. S., an amiable and learned man, formerly sub-preceptor to George the Third, and afterwards a Commissioner of Excise, whom it seems Johnson did not now reckon as one of the lowest of all human beings." See ante, p. 5. n. 3. — Croker.

"Hear Lydias life, and Galilaeo's end." The history of Lydiat being little known, the following account of him may be acceptable to many of my readers. It appeared as a note in the Supplement to the Gentleman's Magazine for 1718, in which some passages extracted from Johnson's poem were inserted, and it should have been added in the subsequent editions:—

A very learned divine and mathematician, Fellow of New College, Oxon, and Rector of Okerton, near Banbury, He wrote, among many others, a Latin treatise 'De natura caeli, &c.' in which he attacked the sentiments of Scaliger and Aristotle, not bearing to hear it urged, that some things are true in philosophia, and false in divinit. He made above 600 sermons, and as many more in writing. Being unsuccessful in publishing his works, he lay in the prison of Bocardo, at Oxford, and in the King's Bench, till Bishop Usher, Dr. South, Sir William Boisdale, and Dr. Pink, released him by paying his debts. He petitioned King Charles I to be sent to the House of Commons to procure M. W. Having spoken in favour of monarchy and bishops, he was plundered by the parliament forces, and twice carried away prisoner from his rectory; and afterwards had not a shirt to shift

These goods for man the laws of Heaven ordain. These goods He grants, who grants the power to gain.

With these celestial wisdom calms the mind, And makes the happiness she does not find."

Garrick being now vested with theatrical power by being manager of Drury Lane theatre, he kindly and generously made use of it to bring out Johnson's tragedy, which had been long kept back for want of encouragement. But in this benevolent purpose he met with no small difficulty from the temper of Johnson, which could not brook that a drama which he had formed with much study, and had been obliged to keep more than the nine years of Horace, should be revised and altered at the pleasure of an actor. Yet Garrick knew well, that without some alterations it would not be fit for the stage. A violent dispute having ensued between them, Garrick applied to the Reverend Dr. Taylor to compose. Johnson was at first very obstinate. "Sir," said he, "the fellow wants me to make Mahomet run mad, that he may have an opportunity of tossing his hands and kicking his heels." He was, however, at last, with difficulty, prevailed on to comply with Garrick's wishes, so as to allow of some changes; but still there were not enough.

Dr. Adams was present the first night of the representation of Irene, and gave me the following account:—"Before the curtain drew up, there were catcalls whispering, which alarmed Johnson's friends. The Prologue, which was written by himself in a manly strain, soothed the audience, and the play went off tolerably, him in three months, without he borrowed it, and died very poor in 1612."

In 1699 Lydiat accompanied Usher into Ireland, and obtained (probably by his interest) the office of chapel-reader in Trinity College, Dublin. After he had resided there about a quarter: he was resident there about two years: and in March, 1612, it appears that he had from the College, "2. To furnish him for his journey to England." The remembrance of Lydiat was traditionally preserved in Dublin College: and I recollect to have heard, about 1756, that, in some ancient buildings, just then removed, Lydiat had rested—evidence, either that he had left a high reputation behind him, or, more probably, that Johnson's mention of him had revived the memory of his sojourn in that university.—Croker.

In this poem, a line in which the danger attending on female beauty is mentioned, has very generally, I believe, been misunderstood:—

"Yet Vane could tell what ills from beauty spring, And Sedley cure'd the form that pleas'd a king." The lady mentioned in the first of these verses, was not the celebrated Lady Vane, whose Memoirs were given to the public by Dr. Smollett, but Ann Vane, who was mistress to Frederick, Prince of Wales, and died in 1726, not long before Johnson settled in London. Some account of this lady was published, under the title of "The Secret History of Vanella," 8vo. 1722. See also, "Vanella in the Straw," 4to. 1722. — Boswell. — See post, Aug. 17. 1728, some observations on these lines. — Croker.

4 Mahomet was in fact played by Mr. Barry, and Demo- phron by Mr. Garrick: but probably at this time the parts were not yet cast.—Boswell. Garrick originally intended to have played Mahomet, but yielded it to Barry to propagate him in the author's honour. It was first acted on Monday the 6th of February, under the title of Mahomet and Irene.—Croker.

The expression used by Dr. Adams was "soothed." I should rather think the audience was moved by the extraordinary spirit and dignity of the following lines:—

till it came to the conclusion, when Mrs. Pritchard, the heroine of the piece, was to be strangled upon the stage, and was to speak two lines with the bowstring round her neck. The audience cried out 'Murder! murder!' She several times attempted to speak; but in vain. At last she was obliged to go off the stage alive. This passage was afterwards struck out, and she was carried off to be put to death behind the scenes, as the play now has it. The Epilogue, as Johnson informed me, was written by Sir William Yonge. I know not how his play came to be thus graced by the pen of a person so then eminent in the political world. Notwithstanding all the support of such men as Garrick, Barry, Mrs. Cibber, Mrs. Pritchard, and every advantage of dress and decoration, the tragedy of Irene did not please the public. Mr. Garrick’s zeal carried it through for nine nights, so that the author had his three nights’ profit; and from a receipt signed by him, now in the hands of Mr. James Dodsley, it appears that his friend, Mr. Robert Dodsley, gave him one hundred pounds for the copy, with his usual reservation of the right of one edition.

Irene, considered as a poem, is entitled to the praise of superior excellence. Analyzed into parts, it will furnish a rich store of noble sentiments, fine imagery, and beautiful language; but it is deficient in pathos, in that delicate power of touching the human feelings, which is the principal end of the drama. Indeed, Garrick has complained to me, that Johnson not only had not the faculty of producing the impressions of tragedy, but that he had not the sensibility to perceive them. His great friend Mr. Walnesley’s prediction, that he would “turn out a fine tragedy writer,” was, therefore, ill-founded. Johnson was wise enough to be convinced that he had not the talents necessary to write successfully for the stage, and never made another attempt in that species of composition.

When asked how he felt upon the ill success of his tragedy, he replied, “Like the Monument;” meaning that he continued firm and unmove as that column. And let it be remembered, as an admonition to the genus irritabile of dramatic writers, that this great man, instead of previously complaining of the bad taste of the town, submitted to its decision without a murmur. He has indeed, upon occasions, a great deference for the general opinion: “A man,” said he, “who writes a book, thinks himself wiser or Wittier than the rest of mankind; he supposes that he can instruct or amuse them, and the public to whom he appeals must, after all, be the judges of his extensions.”

On occasion of this play being brought upon the stage, Johnson had a fancy that, as a dramatic author, his dress should be more gay than what he ordinarily wore: he therefore appeared behind the scenes, and even in one of the side boxes, in a scarlet waistcoat, with rich gold lace, and a gold-laced hat. He humorously observed to Mr. Langton, “that

1. Be this at least his praise, be this his pride, To force applause no modern arts are tried. Should partial cats all his hopes confound, He bids no trumpet quell the fatal sound: Should he but strive to relieve the woe, He rolls no thunders o’er the drowsy pit: No snares to captivate the judgment spreads, Nor optics, in its prejudice to砖ills. Unmov’d, though wittings seer and rivals rail, Studious to please, yet not asham’d to fail, He hate with mirth the dress, the fine the train, With merit needlet, and without it vain: In Reason, Nature, Truth, he dares to trust: Ye fops, be silent, and ye wits, be just! — Boswell.

2. This shows how ready modern audiences are to condemn in a new play what they have frequently endured very quietly in an old one. Rowe has made MONSES, in Tamerlane, die by the bowstring, without offence. — Malone. Daries tells us, in his "Life of Garrick," vol. i. p. 129., that the strangling Irene, contrary to Horace’s rule, carum populus, was suggested by Garrick. — Croker.

3. Dr. Anderson says in his Life, that “Mr. Boswell ascribes this epilogue to Sir W. Yonge on no good foundation:” yet Mr. Boswell, who in his first edition had simply stated the fact, adds in this, the second edition, “the author informed me,” Mr. Murphy too asserts (Life, p. 154.), that the epilogue was always supposed to be Johnson’s, and that Mr. Boswell’s account is a "new discovery, and by no means probable;" and he adds, that "it was to be wished that the epilogue could be transferred to any other writer, it being the worst part in the whole drama." Mr. John Taylor also informed me that Murphy subsequently repeated to me that Johnson was the author of the epilogue. The first edition did not absolutely deny that time, and could hardly have been written by the pen of Johnson; but the fact mentioned may be attended with so much probability that these Johnson added to or altered from the original copy. — Croker.

4. Right Honorable Sir William Yonge, Secretary at War, in Sir Robert Walpole’s administration, and a distinguished parliamentary Speaker. He was the father of Sir George Yonge, who was Secretary at War under Mr. Pitt. Johnson must, before this, have had some communication with Sir W. Yonge, who told him that great should be pronounced so as to rhyme with seat, while Lord Chesterfield thought it should rhyme to state. (See ante, p. 51. n. 1, and post, 27th March, 1772.) — Croker.

5. I know not what Sir John Hawkins means by the cold reception of Irene. I was at the first representation, and must say, it was, as I think, at night, particularly the speech on to-morrow. It ran nine hours at least. It did not, indeed, become a stock-play; but there was not the least objection during the representation, except the first night, in the last act, where Irene was to be strangling in the stage, which John [Hall] could not bear, though a dramatic catastrophe may stab or slay, the bowstring was not a Christian nor an ancient Greek or Roman truth. But this offence was removed after the first night, and Irene went off the stage to be strangled. Many stories were circulated at the time, of the author’s being observed at the representation to be dissatisfied with some of the speeches and conduct of the play, himself; and, like La Fontaine, expressing his disapprobation aloud. — Boswell. That the reception was cold is generally admitted, but by Garrick’s zeal it was played oftener than stated by Boswell or even Burney, who, however, says guardedly, “nine nights at last.” It seems to have been acted from Monday, 6th February, to Monday, 20th February, inclusive. — Gent. Mag., 1749, p. 76. Account of English Stage, vol. iv. p. 266. — Croker.

6. Mr. Murphy supposed that the amount of the three benefit nights was not very considerable, as the profit, that stimulated the motive, never invited the author to another dramatic attempt. It appears, however, by a MS. note, in Mr. Isaac Reed’s copy of Murphy’s Life, that the receipts of the third, which was on the 16th, did not exceed sixty guineas a night, for the expenses of the house, amounted to 195/. 17s.: Johnson cleared, therefore, with the copyright, very nearly 300. It is a matter of curiosity that there was a licence for this play, and that there is no intimation in Mr. Murphy’s account, that the play was performed in these nights. — Croker.

7. Aaron Hill (vol. ii. p. 355.), in a letter to Mr. Mallet, gives the first intimation of the success, which was at first an anomalous Mr. Johnson’s benefit, and found the play his proper representative; strong sense, ungraced by sweetness or decorum. — Croker.

8. Or, if the anecdote be true, perhaps more modestly, that he felt no more than the Monument could feel; but it may be presumed, from the number of nights it ran after the sum it produced, that Johnson was far from thinking that his tragedy had failed; and in truth it had not. — Croker.
when in that dress he could not treat people with the same ease as when in his usual plain clothes." Dress, indeed, we must allow, has more effect, even upon strong minds, than one should suppose, without having had the experience of it. His necessary attendance while his play was in rehearsal, and during its performance, brought him acquainted with many of the performers of both sexes, which produced a more favourable opinion of their profession, than he had hitherto expressed in his life of Savage.

With some of them he kept up an acquaintance as long as he and they lived, and was ever ready to show them acts of kindness. He, for a considerable time, used to frequent the Green-Room, and seemed to take delight in dissipating his gloom, by mixing in the sprightly chat-chat of the motley circle then to be found there. Mr. David Hume related to me from Mr. Garrick, that Johnson at last denied himself this amusement, from considerations of rigid virtue; saying, "I'll come no more behind your scenes, David; for the silk stockings and white bosoms of your actresses excite my amorous propensities."

[JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.]

"Goff Square, July 12, 1799.

"DEAR MRS. — I am extremely obliged to you for your letter, which I would have answered last post, but that illness prevented me. I have been often out of order of late, and have very much neglected my affairs. You have acted very prudently with regard to Levet's affair,[1] which will, I think, not at all embarrass me, for you may promise him, that the mortgage shall be taken up at Michaelmas, or, at least, some time between that and Christmas; and if he requires to have it done sooner, I will endeavour it. I make no doubt, by that time, of either doing it myself, or persuading some of your friends to do it for me.

"Please to acquaint him with it, and let me know if he be satisfied. When he once called on me, his name was mistaken, and therefore I did not see him; but, finding the mistake, wrote to him the same day, but never heard more of him, though I entreated him to let me know where to wait on him. You frightened me, you little gipsy, with your black wafer, for I had forgot you were in mourning, and was afraid your letter had brought me ill news of my mother, whose death is one of the few calamities on which I think with terror. I long to know how she does, and how you all do. Your poor mamma is come home, but very weak; yet I hope she will grow better, else she shall go into the country. She is now upstairs, and knows not of my writing. I am, dear Miss, your most humble servant,

In 1750 Johnson came forth in the character for which he was eminently qualified, a majestic teacher of moral and religious wisdom. The vehicle which he chose was that of a periodical paper, which he knew had been, upon former occasions, employed with great success. The Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, were the last of the kind published in England, which had stood the test of a long trial; and such an interval had now elapsed since their publication, as made him justly think that, to many of his readers, this form of instruction would, in some degree, have the advantage of novelty. A few days before the first of his Essays came out, there started another competitor for fame in the same form, under the title of "The Tatler Revived," which, I believe, was "born but to die." Johnson was, I think, not very happy in the choice of his title, — "The Rambler," which certainly is not suited to a series of grave and moral discourses; which the Italians have literally, but ludicrously, translated by Il Vagabondo; and which has been lately assumed as the denomination of a vehicle of licentious tales, "The Rambler's Magazine." He gave Sir Joshua Reynolds the following account of its getting this name: "What must be done, sir, will be done. When I was to begin publishing that paper, I was at a loss how to name it. I sat down at night upon my bedside, and resolved that I would not go to sleep till I had fixed its title. The Rambler seemed the best that occurred, and I took it."

With what devout and conscientious sentiments this paper was undertaken, is evidenced by the following prayer, which he composed and offered up on the occasion: —

"An Almighty God, the governor of all good things,

Robert Dodsley's with the late Mr. Moore, and several of his friends, considering what should be the name of the periodical paper which Moore had undertaken. Garrick proposed the Salad, which, by a curious coincidence, was afterwards applied to himself by Goldsmid: —

"Our Garrick's a salad, for in him we see Oil, vinegar, sugar, and saltness agree!"

At last, the company having separated, without any thing of which they approved having been offered, Dodsley himself thought of The World. — Boswell.
The first paper of the Rambler was published on Tuesday the 20th of March, 1749-50; and its author was enabled to continue it, without interruption, every Tuesday and Saturday, till Saturday the 17th of March, 1752, on which day it closed. This is a strong confirmation of the truth of a remark of his, which I have had occasion to quote elsewhere [Aug. 16. 1775], that "a man may write at any time, if he will set himself doggedly to it;" for, notwithstanding his constitutional indolence, his depression of spirits, and his labour in carrying on his Dictionary, he answered the stated calls of the press twice a week from the stores of his mind during all that time; having received no assistance, except for billlets in No. 10, by Miss Mulock, and Mrs. Chatterton, No. 38, by Mrs. Catherine Talbot, No. 97, by Mr. Samm. Richardson, whom he describes in an introductory note, as "an author who has enlarged the knowledge of human nature, and taught the passions to move at the command of virtue;" and Numbers 44. and 100., by Mrs. Elizabeth Carter.3

Poterity will be astonished when they are told, upon the authority of Johnson himself, that many of these discourses, which we should suppose had been laboured with all the slow attention of literary leisure, were written in haste as the moment pressed, without even being read over by him before they were printed. It can be accounted for only in this way; that, by reading and mediation, and a very close inspection of life, he had accumulated a great fund of miscellaneous knowledge, which, by a peculiar promptitude of mind, was ever ready at his call, and which he had constantly accustomed himself to clothe in the most apt and energetic expression. Sir Joshua Reynolds once asked him, by what means he had attained his extraordinary accuracy and flow of language. He told him, that he had early laid it down as a fixed rule to do his best on every occasion, and in every company: to impart whatever he knew in the most forcible language he could put it in; and that by constant practice, and never suffering any careless expression to escape him, or attempting to deliver his thoughts without arranging them in the clearest manner, it became habitual to him.4 Yet, he was not altogether unprepared as a periodical writer: for I have in my possession a small duodecimo volume, in which he has written, in the form of Mr. Locke’s Common Place Book, a variety of hints for essays on different subjects. He has marked upon the first blank leaf of it, "To the 128th page, collections for the Rambler;" and in another place, "In fifty-two there were seventeen provided; in 97–21; in 190–25." At a subsequent period (probably after the work was finished) he added, "In all, taken of provided materials, 30."5

Sir John Hawkins, who is unlucky upon all occasions, tells us, that "this method of accumulating intelligence had been practised by Mr. Addison, and is humorously described in one of the Spectators [No. 46.], wherein he feigns to have dropped his paper of notanda, consisting of a diverting medley of broken sentences and loose hints, which tells us he had collected, and meant to make use of. Much of the same kind is Johnson’s Adversariia."6 But the truth is, that there is no resemblance at all between them. Addison’s note was a fiction, in which unconnected fragments of his incubrations were purposely jumbled together, in as odd a manner as he could, in order to produce a laughable effect: whereas, Johnson’s abbreviations are all distinct, and applicable to each subject of which the head is mentioned.

1 This was a mistake on the original paper. Saturday was the 18th March, the real date of the last Rambler. This circumstance, though at first sight of very little importance, is worth notice, for Mrs. Johnson died on the 17th [Old Style, i.e. 26th, N. S.]—Malone.

2 Lady Bradshagh, one of Mr. Richardson’s female sympaths, thus addresses him on the subject of this letter—"A few days ago I was pleased with hearing a very sensible lady greatness acquainted with the Rambler, No. 97. She opened it to be in town when it was published; and I asked if she knew who was the author? She said, it was supposed to be one who was concerned in the Spectators; it being much better written than any of the Rambler’s. I wanted to say who was the really author, but durst not without your permission.—Richardson’s answer was (it is a matter of some authority that Mr. Payne told Mr. Chalmers [Brit. Enc. vol. xix. p. 14.], that No. 97. was the only paper which had a prosperous sale, and was popular.) The letters which Richardson’s orietrie lavished on him and all his works were quite extravagant: the paper is rather a poor one. —Croker.

3 Mrs. Piozzi says, "the papers contributed by Mrs. Carter had much of Johnson’s esteem, though he always glided through them as a yew signed Chatlessa (No. 100.) to the allegory (No. 45.) where religion and superstition are, indeed, most masterly delineated." She adds that "the fine Rambler on Procrastination [No. 134.] was hastily composed in Sir Joshua Reynolds’s parlour, while the boy waited to carry it to the press, and numberless are the instances of his writing under the immediate pressure of importance or distress." But this must be a mistake; Johnson and Reynolds were not acquainted till after the conclusion of the Rambler. (See post. p. 70. n. 2.) It may have been some paper in the Idler. —Croker.

4 The rule which Mr. Johnson observed is sanctioned by the authority of two great writers of antiquity: "Ne id quidem taceamus est, quod eadem Ciceroni placebat, nullum nostrum usquam negligentem esse sermonem, quippe audacem, ubiecumur, sibi pro sua secta, potissimum perfectum." Quintet. x. 7. —Malone. We know that Johnson most elaborately revised and extensively corrected the Rambler when he collected them into volumes; but this does not disprove Mr. Boswell’s opinion, of topics drolly selected and arranged; but he infers, rationally enough, that Johnson had taken the idea from his own real practice of collecting notanda; and he is quite justified in adding, "much of the same kind are Johnson’s Adversariia." —Croker.

5 This, no doubt, means that of the first 52 Rambler’s, he had only been provided with the first 30. In the case of the whole 50 numbers, he found that only 30 had been formed of materials previously provided. —Croker.

6 In this instance Mr. Boswell is more unlucky than Hawkins, whose account is by no means incorrect. He knew very well, and distinctly states, that Addison’s published "notanda" was not collected at the request of the whole 50 numbers, but that only 30 had been formed of materials previously provided. —Croker.

BOSWELL’S LIFE OF JOHNSON.

63
For instance, there is the following specimen:

Youth's Entry, &c.

"Baxter's account of things in which he had changed his mind as he grew up. Voluminous.—No wonder. —If every man had to tell, or mark, on how many subjects he has changed, it would make vols, but the changes not always observed by man's self. —From pleasure to bus. [business] to quiet; from thoughtfulness to reflect. to piety; from dissipation to domestic. by impercept. gradat. but the change is certain. Dial non progreòd. progress. esse conspicuus. Look back, consider what was thought at some dist. period.

"Hope predom. in youth. Mind not willingly indulges unsparing thoughts. The world lies all enamelled before him, as a distant prospect:—inequalities only found by coming to it. Love is to be all joy—children excellent—Fame to be constant—caresses of the great—applauses of the learned—smiles of Beauty."

"Fear of disgrace—Bush'dness—Finds things of less importance. Miscarriages forgot like excellencies; —if remembered, of no import. Danger of sinking into negligence of reputation; —lest the fear of disgrace destroy activity.

"Confident of others—unsuspecting as unexperienced—imagining himself secure against neglect, never imagines they will venture to treat him ill. Ready to trust; expecting to be trusted. Convinced by time of the selfishness, the meanness, the cowardice, the treachery of men.

"Youth ambitious, as thinking honours easy to be laid."

"Different kinds of praise pursued at different periods. Of the gay in youth. —daug. hurt, &c. despised.

"Of the fancy in manhood. Ambit. —stocks—bargains. —Of the wise and sober in old age—seriousness—formality—maxims, but general—only of the rich, otherwise age is happy—but at last every thing referred to riches—no having fame, honour, influence, without subjection to caprice.

"Horace.

"Hard it would be if men entered life with the same views with which they leave it, or left as they enter it. —No hope—no undertaking—no regard to benevolence—no fear of disgrace, &c.

"Youth to be taught the piety of age—age to retain the honour of youth."

This, it will be observed, is the sketch of Number 196. of the Rambler. I shall gratify my readers with another specimen:

"Confederacies difficult; why.

"Common danger unites by crushing other passions—but they return. Equality hinders compliance. Superiority produces insolence and envy. Too much regard in each to private interest; —too little.

"The mischiefs of private and exclusive societies—The fitness of social attraction diffused through the whole. The mischiefs of too partial love of our country. Contraction of moral duties. —O! fill us, ov fillos.

"Every man moves upon his own centre, and therefore repels others from too near a contact, though he may comply with some general laws.

"Of confederacy with superiors every one knows the inconvenience. With equals, no authority;—every man his own opinion—his own interest.

"Man and wife hardly united;—spearce ever without children. Computation, if two to one against two, how many against five? If confederacies were easy—useless;—many oppresses many. —If possible'only to some, dangerous. Principum amicitias."

Here we see the embryo of Number 45. of the Adventurer; and it is a confirmation of what I shall presently have occasion to mention, that the papers in that collection marked T. were written by Johnson.

This scanty preparation of materials will not, however, much diminish our wonder at the extraordinary fertility of his mind; for the proportion which they bear to the number of essays which he wrote, is very small; and it is remarkable, that those for which he had made no preparation, are as rich and as highly finished, as those for which the hints were lying by him. It is also to be observed, that the papers formed from his hints are worked up with such strength and elegance, that we almost lose sight of the hints, which become like "drops in the bucket." Indeed, in several instances, he has made a very slender use of them, so that many of them remain still unapplied."

2 Lib. xii. 96. "In Tuccari seminum omnium suorum studiorum." —Malone.

3 Sir John Hawkins has selected from this little collection of materials, what he calls the " Rudiments of two of the papers of the Rambler." But he has not been able to read the manuscript distinctly. Thus he writes, p. 299, "Sailor's fate any mansion; " whereas the original is, "Sailor's life my aversion." He has also transcribed the unappropriated hints on Writers for bread, in which he deciphers these notable passages, one in Latin, fami non famae; instead of fami non famae; Johnson having in his mind what Thamus says of the learned German antiquary and descendant, Xylander, who, he tells us, lived in such poverty, that he was supposed fami non famae scribent; and another in French, Dei est fama et affamé d'argent, instead of Dégoûté de fame (an old word for renoncée), et affamé d'argent. The manuscript, being written in an exceedingly small hand, is, indeed, very hard
As the Rambler was entirely the work of one man, there was, of course, such a uniformity in its texture, as very much to exclude the charm of variety; and the grave and often solemn cast of thinking, which distinguished it from other periodical papers, made it, for some time, not generally liked. So slowly did this excellent work, of which twelve editions have now issued from the press, gain upon the world at large, that even in the closing number the author says, "I have never been much a favourite of the public."

Yet, very soon after its commencement, there were who felt and acknowledged its uncommon excellence. Verses in its praise appeared in the newspapers; and the editor of the Gentleman's Magazine mentions, in October, his having received several letters to the same purpose from the learned. "The Student, or Oxford and Cambridge Monthly Miscellany," in which Mr. Bonnel Thornton and others, from among the principal writers, describes it as "a work that requires any thing of the kind ever published in this kingdom, some of the Spectators excepted,—if indeed they may be excepted." And afterwards, "May the public favours crown his merits, and may not the English, under the auspicious reign of George the Second, neglect a man, who, had he lived in the first century, would have been one of the greatest favourites of Augustus." This flattery of the monarch had no effect. It is too well known, that the second George never was an Augustus to learning or genius.3

Johnson told me, with an amiable fondness, a little pleasing circumstance relative to this work. Mrs. Johnson, in whose judgment and taste he had great confidence, said to him, after a few numbers of the Rambler had come out, "I thought very well of you before; but I did not imagine you could have written anything equal to this. Distant praise, from whatever quarter, is not so delightful as that of a wife whom a man loves and esteems. Her approbation may be said to "come home to his bosom" and, being so near, its effect is most sensible and permanent.

Mr. James Elphinston, 4 who has since published various works, and who was ever esteemed by Johnson as a worthy man, happened to be in Scotland while the Rambler was coming out in single papers at London. With a valuable zeal at once for the improvement of his countrymen, and the reputation of his friend, he suggested, and took the charge of an edition of those Essays at Edinburgh, which followed progressively the London publication.5

1 The Rambler, certainly, were little noticed at first. Smart, the poet, first mentioned them to me as excellent papers, before I had heard any one else speak of them. When I went into Norfolk, in the autumn of 1754, I found but one person (the Rev. Mr. Squires, a man of learning, and a general purchaser of new books) who knew any thing of them. Before I left Norfolk, in the year 1759, the Ramblers were not as well known in general and among men of taste. Others there were, devoid of both, who said that the hard words in the Rambler were used by the author to render his epistles more genteel, to be read by young women.

2 I doubt if Colman wrote in this work. Smart was the principal contributor, and T. Watson a very considerable one.

3 Richardson, the author of Clarissa, to whom Cave had sent the first five numbers of the Rambler, became, as they proceeded, "so inexpressibly pleased with them," that he wrote to Cave in strong commendation, and intimated his conviction (the name of the author being still a secret), that Johnson was the only man who could write them. Cave, in his answer, dated "St. John's Gate, August 23, 1750," says: —

"Excuse this ramble from the purpose of your letter. I return to answer, that Mr. Johnson is the Great Rambler, being, as you observe, the only man who can furnish such papers in a week, besides his other great business, and has not been assisted with above three. I may discover to you, that the world is not so kind to itself as you wish it. The great feature in the Rambler is the good taste, and this put in proportion to the high character given to the work by the judicious, not to say the raptures expressed by the few that do read it; but being of low degree, who can, in this age, must go off, as it is a fine paper, and, considering the late hour of having the copy, tolerably printed, I have not the least doubt that others are in the same manner."

4 See, 1752, 1754, 1756, Dr. Johnson's letters (private, which was the first scheme), two gentlemen, belonging to the Prince's court, came to him, while he was with them, and also brought a list of seven gentlemen to be served with the Rambler. As I was not at liberty, an inference was drawn, I was a dupe. This was written by Dr. Johnson, the Rambler writer. Soon after Mr. Doddington (afterwards Lord Melcombe) sent a letter directed to the Rambler, inviting him to his house, when he should be disposed to enlarge his acquaintance. In a subsequent number a kind of excuse was made, with a hint that a good writer might not appear to advance the public, and that time several circumstances, and Mr. Garrick and others, who knew the author's powers and style from the first, unadvisedly ascertaining their (but) suspicious, overturned the scheme of secrecy. (About which there is also one paper.)

5 I have bad letters of approbation from Dr. Young, Dr. Hartley, Dr. Sharp, Miss Carter, &c., &c., most of them, like you, setting them in a rank equal, and some superior, to the Spectators (of which I have not read many, for the reasons which you assign): but, notwithstanding such recommendation, whether the price of tropes, or the unfavourable season of their first publication, hinders the demand, no boat can be made of the success, and that of the other is to be attributed to the want of sense and judgment of the people. The great man (the Spectator's editor, and the author of the paper, &c.) is obliged to you for contributing your essays; and so is, for several marks of your friendship, good sir, your admirer, and servant.

The two Ramblers alluded to are probably Nos. 14. and 13. Richardson said, in his letter to Cave, "I remember not any thing in those Spectators that I read, for I never found time to read them all, that half so much struck me." It seems very strange these two very curious essays, so well written, as Richard- son and Cave, should have read the Spectator so improperly. It is the stronger, with regard to Richardson, for his only paper in the Rambler (No. 27.) is written in the character of a professor of divinity of the Spectator. — Croker.

Mr. James Elphinston was born in Edinburgh, in 1721. He, when very young, was a private tutor in two or three eminent families: but about 1752 set up a boarding-school at Kensington, where Dr. Johnson sometimes visited him. He died at Hammersmith in 1809. His works are forgotten, or remembered for their absurdity. He translated Martial, of which Dr. Beattie says, "It is truly an unique — the specter of Dryden's muse, which did very well to laugh at; but a whole quarto of nonsense and gibberish is too much. It is strange that a man not wholly illiterate should have lived so long, and that, if Johnson was not in the right, that it was, no doubt, of this strange work that Mrs. Piozzi relates (p. 47.), that "of a modern Martial, when it came out, ... it is the work of Elphinston; here, in the folly for madness, I think, and too much madness for folly."

Croker.

6 It was executed in the printing-office of Sands, Murray, and Cochran, with uncommon elegance, upon writing paper, from a design by Dr. Johnson, with which Mr. Elphinston enriched it with translations of the mottoes. When completed, it made eight handsome volumes. It is, unquestionably, the most accurate and beautiful edition of this work; and there being but a small impression, it is now scarce, and sells at a very high price. — Boswell. No one, with respect to the correctness of the editor's notes, probably derived his information from some other person, and appears to have been misinformed; for it was not accu-though not dated, will show how much pleased Johnson was with this publication, and what kindness and regard he had for Mr. Elphinston.

TO MR. JAMES ELPHINSTON.

"Dear Sir,—I cannot but confess the failures of my correspondence; but hope the same regard which you express for me on every other occasion, will incline you to forgive me. I am often, very often, ill; and, when I am well, am obliged to work; and, indeed, have never much used myself to punctuality. You are, however, not to make unkind inferences, when I forbear to reply to your kindness; for, as assured, I never receive a letter from you without great pleasure, and a very warm sense of your generosity and friendship, which I heartily blame myself for not cultivating with more care. In this, as in many other cases, I go wrong, in opposition to conviction; for I think scarce any temporal good equally to be desired with the regard and familiarity of worthy men. I hope we shall be some time nearer to each other, and have a more ready way of pouring out our hearts.

"I am glad you still find encouragement to proceed in your publication; and shall beg the favour of six more volumes to add to my former six, when you can, with any convenience, send them me. Please to present a set, in my name, to Mr. Ruddiman *, of whom, I hear, that his learning is not his highest excellence. I have transcribed the mottos, and returned them, I hope not too late, of which I think many very happily performed. Mr. Cave has put the last in the Magazine, in which I think he did well. I beg of you to write soon, and to write often, and to write long letters, which I hope in time to repay you; but you must be a patient creditor. I have, however, this of gratitude, that I think of you with regard, when I

well. Here is a slight misunderstanding. Elphinston's edition was correctly printed after the original folio numbers as being taken before they were determined. Or myself, because it had not the various corrections subsequently made by Johnson when he republished the Rambler in volumes. —Croker.

1 This letter, written, at soonest, in Oct. 1750, should have followed that of the 29th September. Mr. Boswell may have copied them from the Memoirs, where they happen to be misplaced. I have added these, from the same volume, two other letters to Mr. Elphinston, of which, the second, at least, deserves to be rescued from oblivion. —Croker, 1846.

TO MR. ELPHINSTON.

"20th April, 1749.

"Sir,—I have, for a long time, intended to answer the letter which you were pleased to send me, and know not why I have delayed it so long, but that I had nothing particular either of enquiry or information to send you; and the same reason might still have the same consequence, but I find, in my recusl kind of life, that I am not likely to have much more to say at one time than at another, and that, therefore, I may endanger, by an appearance of neglect long continued, the loss of such an acquaintance as I know not where to supply. I, therefore, write now to assure you how sensible I am of the kindness you have always expressed to me, and how much I desire the cultivation of that benevolence which perhaps nothing but the distance between us has hindered from ripening. The frequent interruption of my pursuits have very little to say, and of any body else less; let me, however, be allowed one thing, and that in my own favour, that I am, dear Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

do not, perhaps, give the proofs which I ought, of being, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant.

SAM. JOHNSON."

This year he wrote to the same gentleman another letter upon a mournful occasion.

"September 9th, 1750.

"Dear Sir,—You have, as I find by every kind of evidence, lost a excellent mother; and I hope you will not think me incapable of partaking of your grief. I have a mother, now eighty-two years of age, whom, therefore, I must soon lose, unless it please God that she should rather mourn for me. I read the letters in which you relate your mother's death to Mrs. Strahan 2, and think I do myself honour, when I tell you that I read them with tears; but tears are neither to you nor to me necessary. I may, however, represent to you, that you may increase her happiness by obeying her precepts; and that she may, in her present state, look with pleasure upon every act of virtue to which her instructions or example have contributed. Whether this be more than a pleasing dream, or a just opinion of separate spirits, is, indeed, of no great importance to us, when we con- sider ourselves as acting under the eye of God; yet, surely, there is something pleasing in the belief, that our separation from those whom we love is

"25th July, 1778.

"Sirs—Having myself suffered what you are now suffering, I well know the weight of your distress, how much need you have of comfort, and how little comfort is given. A loss, such as yours, lacerates the mind, and breaks the whole system of purposes and hopes. It leaves a dismal vacancy in life, which affords nothing on which the affections can fix, or to which endeavour may be directed. All this I have known, and it is now, in the vicissitude of things, your turn to know it.

"But in the condition of mortal beings, one must lose another. What would be the wretchedness of life, if there was not something always in view, some hurt of nature and unharming, to whose mercy man may have recourse. 'Tis

For the rest. The Greatest Being is the most benevolent. We must not grieve for the dead as men without hope, because we know that they are in his hands. We have indeed not leisure to grieve long, because we are hasten- ing to follow them. Your race and mine have been interrupted by many obstacles, but we must humbly hope for an happy end. I am, Sir, your most humble servant, merely corporeal; and it may be a great incitement to virtuous friendship, if it can be made probable, that that union that has received the divine approbation shall continue to eternity.

"There is one expedient by which you may, in some degree, continue her presence. If you write down minutely what you remember of her from your earliest years, you will find it with great pleasure, and receive from it many hints of soothing recollection, when time shall remove her yet farther from you, and your grief shall be matured to veneration. To this, however painful for the present, I cannot but advise you, as to a source of comfort and satisfaction in the time to come; for all comfort and all satisfaction is sincerely wished you by, dear Sir, your most obliged, most obedient, and most humble servant, "Sam. Johnson."

The Rambler has increased in fame as in age. Soon after its first folio edition was concluded, it was published in six duodecimo volumes; and its author lived to see ten numerous editions of it in London, besides those of Ireland and Scotland.

I profess myself to have ever entertained a profound veneration for the astonishing force and vivacity of mind, which the Rambler exhibits. That Johnson had penetration enough to see, and seeing, would not disgrace, the general misery of man in this state of being, may have given rise to the superficial notion of his being too stern a philosopher. But men of reflection will be sensible that he has given a true representation of human existence, and that he has, at the same time, with a generous benevolence, displayed every consolation which our state affords us; not only those arising from the hopes of futurity, but such as may be attained in the immediate progress through life. He has not depressed the soul to despondency and indiffercence. He has everywhere inculcated study, labour, and exertion. Nay, he has shewn in a very odious light, a man, whose practice is to go about darkening the views of others, by perpetual complaints of evil, and awakening those considerations of danger and distress, which are, for the most part, lulled into a quiet oblivion. This he has done very strongly in his character of Sulpicius (No. 55.), from which Goldsmith took that of Croaker, in his comedy of "The Good-natured Man," as Johnson told me he acknowledged to him, and which is, indeed, very obvious.

To point out the numerous subjects which the Rambler treats, with a dignity and perspicuity which are there united in a manner which we shall in vain look for anywhere else, would take up too large a portion of my book, and would, I trust, be superfluous, considering how universally those volumes are now disseminated. Even the most condensed and brilliant sentences which they contain, and which have very properly been selected under the name of "Beauties" are of considerable bulk. But I may shortly observe, that the Rambler furnishes such an assemblage of discourses on practical religion and moral duty, of critical investigations, and allegorical and oriental tales, that no mind can be thought very deficient that has, by constant study and meditation, assimilated to itself all that may be found there. No. 7., written in Passion-week, on abstraction and self-examination, and No. 110., on penitence and the placability of the Divine Nature, cannot be too often read. No. 54., on the effect which the death of a friend should have upon us, though rather too dispiriting, may be occasionally very medicinal to the mind. Every one must suppose the writer to have been deeply impressed by a real scene; but he told me that was not the case: which shows how well his fancy could conduct him to the "house of mourning." Some of these more solemn papers, I doubt not, particularly attracted the notice of Dr. Young, the author of "The Night Thoughts," of whom my estimation is such, as to reckon his applause an honour even to Johnson. I have seen volumes of Dr. Young's copy of the Rambler, in which he has marked the passages which he thought particularly excellent, by folding down the corner of the page: and such as he rated in a super- eminent degree, are marked by double folds. I am sorry that some of the volumes are lost. Johnson was pleased when told of the minute attention with which Young had signified his approbation of his essays.

I will venture to say, that in no writings whatever can be found more bark and steel for the mind, if I may use the expression; more that can brace and invigorate every manly and noble sentiment. No. 32., on patience, even under extreme misery, is wonderfully lofty, and as much above the rant of stoicism, as the sun of Revelation is brighter than the twilight of Pagan philosophy. I never read the following sentence without feeling my frame thrill:-"It think there is some reason for questioning whether the body and mind are not so proportioned, that the one can bear all which can be inflicted on the other; whether virtue cannot stand its ground as long as life,

1 This is not quite accurate. In the Gent. Mag. for Nov. 1791, while the work yet proceeded, is an advertisement, announcing that four volumes of the Rambler would speedily be published; and it is believed that they were published the next month. The fifth and sixth volumes, with tables of contents and translations of the mottoes, were published in July, 1792, by Payne (the original publisher), three months after the close of the work. When the Rambler was collected into volumes, Johnson revised and corrected it throughout. The original octavo edition not having fallen into Mr. Boswell's hands, he was not aware of this circumstance, which has lately been pointed out by Mr. Alexander Chalmers in his edition of the British Essayists.-Malone.

2 Dr. Johnson was gratified by seeing this selection, and wrote to Mr. Kearsley, bookseller in Fleet Street, the following note:-"Mr. Johnson sends compliments to Mr. Kearsley, and begs the favour of seeing him as soon as he can. Mr. Kearsley is desired to bring with him the last edition of what he has honoured with the name of Beauties. May 30. 1782."-Boswell.
and whether a soul well principled will not be sooner separated than subdued."

Though instruction be the predominant purpose of the Rambler, yet it is enlivened with a considerable portion of amusement. Nothing can be more erroneous than the notion some persons have entertained, that Johnson was then a retired author, ignorant of the world; and, of consequence, that he wrote only from his imagination, when he described characters and manners. He said to me that, before he wrote that work, he had been "running about the world," as he expressed it, more than almost any body; and I have heard him relate, with much satisfaction, that several of the characters in the Rambler were drawn so naturally, that when it first circulated in numbers, a club in one of the towns in Essex imagined themselves to be severely exhibited in it, and were much incensed against a person who, they suspected, had thus made them objects of public notice; nor were they quieted till authentic assurance was given them, that the Rambler was written by a person who had never heard of any one of them. Some of the characters are believed to have been actually drawn from the life, particularly that of Prospero [No. 200.], from Garrick 4, who never entirely forgave its pointed satire.

For instances of fertility of fancy, and accurate description of real life, I appeal to No. 19., a man who wanders from one profession to another, with most plausible reasons for every change: No. 34., female fastidiousness and timorous refinement: No. 82., a Virtuoso who has collected curiosities: No. 88., petty modes of entertaining a company, and conciliating kindness: No. 182., fortune-hunting: No. 194, 195., a tutor's account of the follies of his pupil: No. 197, 198s., legacy-hunting. He has given a specimen of his observation of the more external appearances of life, in the following passage in No. 179., against affectation, that frequent and most disgusting quality:—

"He that stands to contemplate the crowds that fill the streets of a populous city, will see many passengers, whose air and motions it will be difficult to behold without contempt and laughter; but if he examine what are the appearances that thus powerfully excite his visibility, he will find among them neither poverty nor disease, nor any involuntary or painful defect. The disposition to derision and insult is awakened by the softness of folly, the swell of insolence, the liveliness of levity, or the solemnity of grandeur; by the sprightly trip, the stately stalk, the formal strut, and the lofty mien; by gestures intended to catch the eye, and by looks elaborately formed as evidences of importance."

Every page of the Rambler shows a mind teeming with classical allusion and poetical imagery: illustrations from other writers are, upon all occasions, so ready, and mingled so easily in his periods, that the whole appears of one uniform vivid texture.

The style of this work has been censured by some shallow critics as involved and turgid, and abounding with antiquated and hard words. So ill-founded is the first part of this objection, that I will challenge all who may honour this book with a perusal, to point out any English writer whose language conveys its meaning with equal force and perspicuity. It must, indeed, be allowed, that this structure of his sentences is expanded, and often has somewhat of the inversion of Latin; and that he delighted to express familiar thoughts in philosophical language, being in this the reverse of Socrates, who, it is said, reduced philosophy to the simplicity of common life. But let us attend to what he himself says in his concluding paper:

4 Mrs. Piozzi says, "Sophrone was likewise a picture drawn from reality. The man immortalized for purring like a cat was, as he told me, one Bussy, a proctor in the Commons. He who barked so ingeniously, and then called the drawer to drive away the dog, was father to Dr. Salter, of the Charter-house. He who sang a song, and, by correspondent motions of his arm, chalked out a plant on the wall, was one Richardson, an attorney."—"All these are characters alluded to in the conclusion of the Rambler, but so slightly that it seems hardly worth while to inquire whether the hints were furnished by observation or invention. As to the anecdote told of the old Dr. Salter, it could have only been, as Mr. Chalmers observed, the repetition of some story of his youthful days; for he was 70 years of age before he became a member of the I. V. Lane Club."—Croker.

Mrs. Piozzi states that "of the allegorical papers in the Rambler, Labour and Rest (No. 35.) was Johnson's favour with Drury Lane; and Seratus (No. 163.), the man who returned late in life to receive honours in his native country, and meets with mortification instead of respect, was considered by him as a masterpiece in the science of life and manners."—Croker.

6 Yet his style did not, escape the harmless shafts of pleasure at his ingenuity, though with a spirit whose personal feelings, rendered him peculiarly sensitive to such attacks. (See Life, p. 421.) And in truth the picture of Johnson's resemblance to Garrick, which he so cordially observed, and without any notice of displaying Johnson's faults or frailties, does not, even then seeing his conduct towards Garrick, allude to this offence. (See Life, p. 421.) And in the right the picture of Johnson's with no distinctive resemblance to Garrick; I am therefore inclined to hope and believe that the biographers have been as much mistaken in their attribution of the character of Prospero, as they certainly were as to those of Enphues and Gelotius.
"When common words were less pleasing to the ear, or less distinct in their signification, I have familiarised the terms of philosophy, by applying them to popular ideas." And, as to the second part of this objection, up to a late care and examination of the work. I am well convinced, say, that it is amazing how few of those words, for which it has been unjustly characterised, are actually to be found in it; I am sure, not the proportion of one to each paper.

This idle charge has been echoed from one babbler to another, who have confounded Johnson's Essays with Johnson's Dictionary; and because he thought it right in a lexicon of our language to collect many words which had fallen into disuse, but were supported by great authorities, it has been imagined that all of these have been interwoven into his own compositions. That some of them have been adopted by him unnecessarily, may, perhaps, be allowed: but, in general, they are evidently an advantage; for without them his stately ideas would be confined and cramped. "He that thinks with more extent than another, will want words of larger meaning." [Idler, No. 70.] He once told me, that he had formed his style upon that of Sir William Temple, and upon Chambers' Proposal for his Dictionary. He certainly was mistaken; or if he imagined at first that he was imitating Temple, he was very successful; for nothing can be more unlike the simplicity of Temple, and the richness of Johnson. Their styles differ as plain cloth and brocade. Temple, indeed, seems equally erroneous in supposing that he himself had formed his style upon Shakespeare's view of the State of Religion in the Western Parts of the World.

The style of Johnson is, undoubtedly, much formed upon that of the great writers in the last century, Hooker, Bacon, Sanderson, Hakewill, and others; those "giants," as they were well characterised by a great personage whose authority, were I to name him, would stamp a reverence on the opinion.

We may, with the utmost propriety, apply to his learned style that passage of Horace, a part of which he has taken as the motto to his Dictionary:

"Cuma tabulis animum censoris sumet honesti;
Audibilis acceperunt carrionem virorum habentum,
Et sine pandere erut, et honore radiique terturant,
Verba movere loco, quamvis invita recitant,
Et versentur adule intra penetralia Vesta.
Obscurata dis populo bonus erut, atque
Proferret in hcecn speciosae vocabula rerum, Quae priscis memorata Catonibus atque Cethegis,

3 Mr. Boswell's zeal carries him too far: Johnson's style, especially in the Rambler, is frequently turgid, even to ridiculc; but he has been sometimes censured with a malicious flippancy, and even graver critics have treated him with inconsiderate injustice; for instance, The Rev. Dr. Burrowes (Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and afterwards Dean of Cork.), in an Essay on the Style of Dr. Johnson, published in the first volume of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy (1772), observes:—

"Johnson says, that he has rarely admitted any word not authorised by former writers; but where are we to seek authorities for 'resuscitation, arbgy, notice, falsity, diversitate, asinus, narctico, vulgurum, compenisnaticum, pallisascus,' and innumerable others of the same stamp, which abound in his works. Are we to look for 'sensory, or panoply,' all occurring in the short compass of a single essay in the Rambler?—or for 'ercavation, hortilucetia, sandiacus, honosia,' etc., in his Life of Browne? They may be found, perhaps, in the works of former writers, but they make no part of the English language. They are the illegitimate offspring of learning by vanity." It is wonderful that, instead of asking where these words were to be found, Dr. Burrowes did not think of referring to Johnson's own Dictionary. He would have found good authorities for almost every one of them; for instance, for resurrection, Milton and Bacon; for volunat, Milton and Phillips; for falsity, Arbuthnot; for asinus, Milton; for narcotic and vulgurum, Browne; for germination, Bacon, and so on. But although these authorities, which Dr. Burrowes might have found in the Dictionary, are a sufficient answer to his question, let it be also observed, that many of the words which had been introduced by authors than Johnson chose to quote, and that the majority of them are now become familiar—which is a sufficient proof that the English language has not considered them as illegitimate.

1 This is a truism in the disguise of a sophism. "He that thinks with more extent will," no doubt, "want words of a larger meaning, volantia, voluntas, diversitate, diffinitas, simple; the number of syllables, and oro-rotundity (if one may venture to use the expression) of the sound of a word can never add much, and may, in some cases, do injury to the meaning. What words were ever written of a larger meaning than the following, which, however, are the most simple and familiar: 'to do': would one say, 'to do be light, and there was light'?" If we were to convert the proposition in the Idler, and say, that "he who thinks feebly, needs more words;" he might be nearer the truth. But it must be admitted (as Mr. Boswell soon after observes) that Johnson (though he, in some of his works, pushed his peculiarities to an absurd extent) has, on the whole, a beneficent and elevating influence on our language; he has introduced more dignity into our style, more regularity into our grammar, and given a graver and more sonorous sound to the march of our sentences and the cadence of our periods. See his own claims on this point stated with a kind of modest pride, in the last Rambler. — Croker.

3 Chambers' Proposal for a second edition of his Dictionary, was probably in circulation when Johnson first came to London. — Maloney.

4 See under April 9, 1778; where, in a conversation at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, Johnson himself mentions the particular improvements which Temple made in the English style. — Maloney.

5 Here is an instance of the difficulty of explaining, after a lapse of time, circumstances once of great notoriety. My learned and excellent friend Bishop Elrington desired me to state the period of the turn of the tide in his reputation under George III. Every one knows it now, but who will know it fifty years hence? There is no doubt of the fact, that on some occasion the great divines of the eighteenth century were mentioned in the king's presence, his majesty said, "Yes there were Giants in those days."—in allusion to Genesis, vi. 4. But all my inquiries (and some of his majorly illustrious family have concurred to permit these inquiries to extend even to them) have failed to ascertain to what person or on what occasion that happy expression was used. Boswell, in his first edition, attributed this anecdote to "one whose authority, i.e." in his subsequent editions he changed "one" into "A great personage."—Crook.

6 Hawkins says, "Hooker he admired for his logical precision more, than for his acuteness, and Taylor for his amazing erudition; Sir Thomas Browne for his penetration, and Cowley for the ease and unaffected structure of his periods. The timed of Sanderson disgusted him, and he could but just endure the smooth verbosity of Tillotson, Hammond and Barrow he thought involved; and of the latter, that he was apt to be very politics. I have thought it right to repeat the foregoing, as the evidence of an eye-witness to Johnson's course of reading: though it is not a very scientific investigation, yet the Hawkins has preserved exactly the characteristic qualities which he attributed to these illustrious men. It is not easy to conceive how the erudition of Barrow for the penetration of Browne could have improved Johnson's style; nor is it likely that Johnson would have celebrated the eloquent and subtle Taylor for the same qualities, and learned Hooker for mere penetration. Johnson's friend, Mr. Fitzherbert, said (see post, April 8, 1779), that he was not every man who could quote his works, nor was it necessarily Hawkins was not a man likely to convey adequately Dr. Johnson's critical opinion of Jeremy Taylor. — Croker.
and, from the influence which he has had upon our composition, scarcely any thing is written now that is not better expressed than was usual before he appeared to lend the fashion.

This circumstance, the truth of which must strike every critical reader, has been so happily enforced by Mr. Courtenay, in his "Moral and Literary Character of Dr. Johnson," that I cannot prevail on myself to withhold it, notwithstanding his, perhaps, too great partiality for one of his friends:

"By nature's gifts ordain'd mankind to rule,
He, like a Titan, form'd his brilliant school;
And taught congenial spirits to excel,
While from his lips impressive wisdom fell.
Our boasted Goldsmith felt the sovereign sway:
From him derived the sweet, yet nervous lay.
To Fame's proud clift he bade our Raffles rise:
Hence Reynolds' pen with Reynolds' pencil vies.
With Johnson's flame melodious Burney glows,
While the grand strain in smoother cadence flows.
And you, Malone, to critic learning dear,
Correct and elegant, refined though clear,
By studying him, acquired that classic taste,
Which high in Shakespeare's face thy statue placed.
Near Johnson Steele's stands on scenic ground,
Acute, laborious, fertile, and profound.
Ingenious HAWSERWORTH to this school we owe,
And scarce the pupil from the tutor know.
Here early parts accomplish'd Jones sublimes,
And science blends with Asia's lofty rhymes:
Harmonious Jones! who in his splendid strains
Sings Camdeo's sports, on Agra's flowery plains,
In Hindu fictions while we fondly trace
Love and the Muses, deck'd with Attic grace.
Amid these names can Boswell be forgot,
Searce by North Britons now esteem'd a Scot?
Who, to the sage devoted from his youth,
Imbib'd from him the spirit of truth;
The keen search, the exercise of mind.
And that best art, the art to know mankind.
Nor was his energy confined alone
To friends around his philosophic throne;

In Varian or in Virgil, what he likes
In Plautus or Cicellus? Why should I
Be envel for the little I invent,
When Ennius and Cato's copious style
Have so enrich'd and so adorn'd our tongue?
Men ever had, and ever will have, leave
To coin new words well suited to the age,"

Pope.

1 ["But how severely with themselves proceed
The men, who wrote such verse as we can read!
Their own strict judges, not a word they spare
That wants or force, or light, or weight, or care,
Howe'er unwillingly it quits its place;
Nay, though at court (perhaps) it may find grace —
Such they'll degrade; and sometimes, in its stead,
In downright charity revive the dead;
Mark where a bold expressive phrase appears,
Bred through the rubbish of some hundred years;
Command old words that long have slept to wake,
Words that wise Bacon or brave Raleigh spoke;
Or bid the new be English, ages hence.
(For Use will father what's begot by Sense.)
Pour the full tide of eloquence along,
Serenity, and yet divinity strong,
Rich with the treasures of each foreign tongue."]

2 ["Words must be chosen and be placed with skill:
To inculc what things abstract or new,
Of good connection, an unusual word
Is made at first familiar to the ear:
But if you write of things abstract or new,
Some of your own invention may be used,
Yet not so seldom as excessively done.
But he that hopes to have new words allow'd,
Must so derive them from the Grecian spring,
As they may seem to flow without constraint.
Can an impartial reader commend

Pope.

3 The observation of his having imitated Sir Thomas Browne has been made by many people; and lately it has been insisted on, and illustrated by a variety of quotations from Browne, in one of the popular Essays (called "Winter's Evenings") written by the Rev. Mr. Knox, master of Tunbridge's; but I have set down in my list as one of those who have sometimes not successfully imitated Dr. Johnson's style. — Boswell.

4 The following observation in Mr. Boswell's "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides" may sufficiently account for that gentleman's being "now scarce esteemed a Scot" by many of his countrymen: — If he (Dr. Johnson) was particularly prejudiced against the Scots, it was because they were more in his way; because he thought their success in England rather exceeded the due proportion of their real merit; and because he could not but see in them that nationality which, I believe, no liberal-minded Scotchant will deny. Mr. Boswell, indeed, is so free from national prejudices, that he might with equal propriety be described as —

"Searce by South Britons now esteem'd a Scot."

— Courtenay
Its influence well improved our letter'd isle,
And lucid vigour mark'd the general style:
As Nile's proud waves, swoln from their oozy bed,
First of all to the neighbouring meads majestic spread;

Till, gathering force, they more and more expand,
And with new virtue fertilise the land.

Johnson's language, however, must be allowed to be too masculine for the delicate gentleness of female writing. His ladies, therefore, seem strangely formal, even to ridicule; and are well denominated by the names which he has given them, as Misella, Zozima, Properantia, Rhodocia.

It has of late been the fashion to compare the style of Addison and Johnson, and to depreciate

I think very unjustly, the style of Addison as nervous and feeble, because it has not the strength and energy of that of Johnson.

Their prose may be balanced like the poetry of Dryden and Pope. Both are excellent, though in different ways. Addison writes with the ease of a gentleman. His readers fancy that a wise and accomplished companion is talking to them; so that he animates his sentences and tastes into their minds by an imperceptible influence. Johnson writes like a teacher. He dictates to his readers as if from an academical chair. They attend with awe and admiration; and his precepts are impressed upon them by his commanding eloquence. Addison's style, like a light wine, pleases every body from the first. Johnson's, like a liquor of more body, seems too strong at first, but, by degrees, is highly relished; and such is the melody of his periods, so much do they captivate the ear, and seize upon the attention, that there is scarcely any writer, however inaccessible, who does not aim, in some degree, at the same species of excellence. But let us not ungratefully undervalue that beautiful style, which has pleasingly conveyed to us much instruction and entertainment.

Though comparatively weak, opposed to Johnson's Herculean vigour, let us not call it positively feeble. Let us remember the character of his style, as given by Johnson himself:

"What he attempted, he performed;

he is never feeble, and he did not wish to be energetic; he is never rapid, and he never stagnates. His sentences have neither studied amplitude, nor affected brevity: his periods, though not diligenately rounded, are voluble and easy.

Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar, but not coarse, and elegant, but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison."

Though the Rambler was not concluded till the year 1752, I shall, under this year, say all that I have to observe upon it. Some of the translations of the mottons by himself, are admirably done. He acknowledges to have received "elegant translations" of many of them from Mr. James Elphinston; and some are very happily translated by a Mr. F. Lewis, of whom I never heard more, except that Johnson thus described him to Mr. Malone:

"Sir, he lived in London, and hung loose upon society."

The concluding paper of his Rambler is at once dignified and pathetic. I cannot, however, but wish, that he had not ended it with an unnecessary Greek verse, translated also into an English couplet.

[Avòròv eik pàxarón aítròs eiv òyìwòth].

"Celestial powers! that pity regard,
From you my labours wait their last reward.]"

It is too much like the conceit of those dramatic poets, who used to conclude each act with a rhyme; and the expression in the first

1 Mr. Burke said pleasantly, that "his ladles were all Johnstons in petticoats." Mr. Murphy (Life, p. 356) speaks somewhat of the same censure on the letter in the 12th Rambler, from a young woman that wants a place: yet—

Surely the unpractised critic exhibits it is the paper quoted by Mr. Chalmers, as an example of such ease and familiarity of style, which made him almost doubt whether it was Johnson's. Brit. Ex., vol. xix. p. 41.—Croker.

2 Where did Mr. Boswell discover this, except in Sir J. Hawkins, who says (p. 270.), with more than usual absurdity and bad taste, "I find an opinion gaining ground, not much to the advantage of Mr. Addison's style, the characteristics of which are feebleness and inanity—I speak of that alone, for his sentiments are excellent and his humour exquisite."

What the worthy knight meant by inanity, as applied to Addison's style, the writer inquires, Croker.

3 Gibbon says, "By the judicious advice of Mr. Mallet, I was directed to the writings of Swift and Addison: wit and simplicity, I believe, are common to both, but the style of Swift is supported by many original vigour; that of Addison is adorned by the female graces of elegance and mildness." Yet his own over-ornate and complicated style is the very reverse of what he praises in Swift and Addison.—Croker.

4 When Johnson showed me a proof sheet of the character of Addison's style to me, I was very much struck, Croker. My then venturing to ask him, whether the difference did not consist in this, that Addison's style was full of idioms, colloquial phrases, and proverbs; and yet at the same time very much improved and polished, phrasing and modes of speech as can never be literally translated or understood by foreigners, I got the discredited to the letter. Let any one who doubts it, try to translate one of Addison's Spectators into Latin, French, or Italian; and though so easy, familiar, and elegant, to an Englishman, as to give the intellect no trouble; yet he would find the transclusion into another language extremely difficult, if not impossible. But a Rambler, Advertiser, or Idler of Johnson, would fall into any classical or European language, as easily as if it had been originally conceived in it.

BURNEY.

5 I shall probably, in another work, maintain the merit of Addison's poetry, which has been very unjustly depreciated.

—BOSWELL. Mr. Boswell never, that I know of, executed this intention.—Croker.

6 In the Gentleman's Magazine for October, 1752, p. 468, he is styled "the Rev. Francis Lewis, of Chiswick." The late Lord Macartney, while he resided at Chiswick, at my request, made some inquiry concerning him at that place, but no intelligence was obtained. The translations ascribed by Mr. Elphinston to the first thirty numbers of the Rambler were published in the Gentleman's Magazine for September, 1752. Mr. Elphinston's name was in the next twenty-seven numbers, marked with the initials of the translators, to be found in the same magazine for October, 1752, with two admirable improvements by Johnson himself of the former translation of the mottons to Nos. 7, and 12., the first of which is already quoted, ante, p. 39. As to Mr. Francis Lewis, I am afraid that he did "hang his head down society." A person of those names, and I have no doubt the same, was born in Hereford in 1715, graduated at Ch., Ch. Oxford in 1740, and was soon after, admitted to the Committee of the Cathedral and College of Hereford. Here his conduct was very irregular, and in 1751, being bursar of the College, he ascended with a large balance of the funds belonging to the College to London; and then, no doubt, came to live by his wits in London.—Croker, 1846.

line of his couplet, "Celestial powers," though proper in Pagan poetry, is ill suited to Christianity, with "a conformity" to which he consoled himself. How much better it would have been to have ended with the prose sentence, "I shall never envy the honours which wit and learning obtain in any other cause if I can be numbered among the writers who have given ar dreud to virtue, and confidence to truth."

His friend, Dr. Birch, being now engaged in preparing an edition of Raleigh's smaller pieces, Dr. Johnson wrote the following letter to that gentleman:

TO DR. BIRCH.

"Gough Square, May 12. 1750.

Sir,—Knowing that you are now preparing to favour the public with a new edition of Raleigh's miscellaneous pieces, I have taken the liberty to send you a manuscript, which fell by chance within my examination of it; and the owner tells me, that, as he has heard, the hand writing is Sir Walter's. If you should find reason to conclude it genuine, it will be a kindness to the owner, a blind person, to recommend it to the booksellers. I am, sir, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

His just abhorrence of Milton's political notions was ever strong. But this did not prevent his warm admiration of Milton's great poetical merit, to which he has done illustrious justice, beyond all who have written upon the subject. And this year he not only wrote a Prologue, which was spoken by Mr. Garrick before the acting of Comus at Drury Lane Theatre, for the benefit of Milton's granddaughter, but took a very zealous interest in the success of the charity. On the day preceding the performance, he published the following letter in the "General Advertiser," addressed to the printer of that paper:

"Sir,—That a certain degree of reputation is acquired merely by approving the works of genius, and testifying a regard to the memory of authors, is a truth too evident to be denied; and therefore to ensure a participation of fame with a celebrated poet, many, who would, perhaps, have contributed to starve him when alive, have heaped expensive pageants upon his grave.

"It must, indeed, be confessed, that this method of becoming known to posterity with honour, is peculiar to the great, or at least to the wealthy: but an opportunity now offers for almost every individual to secure the praise of paying a just regard to the illustrious dead, united with the pleasure of doing good to the living. To assist industrious indigence, struggling with distress and debilitated by age, is a display of virtue, and an acquisition of happiness and honour.

"Whoever, then, would be thought capable of pleasure in reading the works of our incomparable Milton, and not so destitute of gratitude as to refuse to lay out a trifle in rational and elegant entertainment, for the benefit of his living remains, for the exercise of their own virtue, the increase of their reputation, and the pleasing consciousness of doing good, should appear at Drury Lane theatre to-morrow, April 5, when Conus will be performed for the benefit of Mrs. Elizabeth Foster, grand-daughter to the author, and the only surviving branch of his family.

"N.B. There will be a new prologue on the occasion, written by the author of Irene, and spoken by Mr. Garrick; and, by particular desire, there will be added to the Masque a dramatic satire, called Lethe, in which Mr. Garrick will perform."*

In 1751 we are to consider him as carrying on both his Dictionary and Rambler. But he also wrote "The Life of Cheyne," in the miscellany called "The Student;" and the Rev. Dr. Douglas having with uncommon acuteness clearly detected a gross forgery and imposition upon the public by William Lauder, a Scotch schoolmaster, who, with equal impi- dence and ingenuity, represented Milton as a plaguary from certain modern Latin poets, Johnson, who had been so far imposed upon as to furnish a Preface and Postscript to his work, now dictated a letter for Lauder, addressed to Dr. Douglas, acknowledging his fraud in terms of suitable contrition.3

1 Mrs. Williams is probably the person meant. — Boswell.

2 Mr. Auditor Benson, in 1737, erected a monument to Milton in Westminster Abbey, and did not omit to inscribe his own name on it, — an extant which Pope satirizes. See Ducdul., b. iii. 325, and iv. 110. — Croker.

3 She survived this benefit but three years, and died childless, 9th May, 1744. It is remarkable that none of her great, and few even of our second-rate poets, have left posterity — Shakespeare, Jonson, Otway, Milton, Dryden, Rowe, Addison, Pope, Swift, Gay, Johnson, Goldsmith, Cowper, have left no inheritors of their names. — Croker.

4 For the honour of letters, the dignity of sacred poetry, the spirit of the English nation, and the glory of human nature, it is to be regretted that we do not find a more liberal assistance. Tonson, the bookseller, whose family had been enriched by the sale of the poet's writings, gave twenty pounds, and Bishop Newton, his biographer, brought a large contribution; but all their efforts, joined to the allurements of Johnson's pen and Garrick's performance, procured only 1300. — Anderson. — Wright.

5 Love there should be any person, at any future period, absurd enough to suspect that Johnson was a partaker in Lauder's fraud, or had any knowledge of it, when he assisted him in a sufferer's hour, he goes on to quote words of Dr. Douglas, now Bishop of Salisbury, at the time when he detected the imposition. "It is to be hoped, may it is expected, that the elegant and nervous writer, whose diculous sentiments and inimitable style point out the author of Lauder's Preface and Postscript, will no longer allow one to pine away himself with his feathers, who appears so little to deserve assistance: an assistance which I am persuaded would never have been communicated, had there been the least suspicion of those facts which I have been the instrument of conveying to the worldly in these sheets." Milton no Plagiary, 3d edit. p. 78. And his Lordship has been pleased now to authorise me to say, in the strongest manner, that there is no fact, however for any unfavourable reflection against Dr. Johnson, who expressed the strongest indignation against Lauder. — Boswell. See narr., p. 50. I cannot find, however, that Johnson publicly responded to Dr. Douglas's call, — which surely he ought to have done. — Croker, 1846.

Lauder afterwards went to Barbadoes, where he some time taught school. His behaviour there was mean and despicable, and he passed the remainder of his life in universal contempt. He died about the year 1771. — Nichols.

In the Gentleman's Magazine for 1754, is a short account of a renewed attack by Lauder on Milton's character, in a specimen entitled "The Grand Imposter detected, or Milton convicted of Forgery against King Charles I." Mr. Chalmers thinks this view was probably written by John- son; but it is, on every account, very unlikely. The article is trivial, and seems to be written neither in the style nor sentiments of Johnson. — Croker.
This extraordinary attempt of Lauder was no sudden effort. He had brooded over it for many years; and to this hour it is uncertain what his principal motive was, unless it were a vain notion of his superiority, in being able, by whatever means, to deceive mankind. To effect this, he produced certain passages from Grotius, Masenius, and others, which had a faint resemblance to some parts of the "Paradise Lost." In these he interpolated some fragments of Hog's Latin translation of that poem, alleging that the mass thus fabricated was the archetype from which Milton copied. These fabrications he published from time to time in the Gentleman's Magazine; and, exulting in his fancied success, he in 1750 ventured to collect them into a pamphlet, entitled "An Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost." To this pamphlet Johnson wrote a Preface, in full persuasion of Lauder's honesty, and a Postscript recommending in the most persuasive terms a subscription for the relief of a grand-daughter of Milton, of whom he thus speaks:—

"It is yet in the power of a great people to reward the poet whose name they boast, and from their alliance to whose genius they claim some kind of superiority to every other nation of the earth; that poet, whose works may possibly be read when every other monument of British greatness shall be obliterated; to reward him, not with pictures or with medals, which, if he sees, he sees with contempt, but with tokens of gratitude, which he, perhaps, may even now consider as not unworthy the regard of an immortal spirit."

Surely this is inconsistent with "emnity towards Milton," which Sir John Hawkins imputes to Johnson upon this occasion, adding, "I could all along observe that Johnson seemed to approve not only of the design, but of the argument; and seemed to exult in a persuasion, that the reputation of Milton was likely to suffer by this discovery. That he was not privy to the imposture, I am well persuaded; that he wished well to the argument, may be inferred from the Preface, which indisputably was written by Johnson."

Is it possible for any man of clear judgment to suppose that Johnson, who so nobly praised the poetical excellence of Milton in a Postscript to this very "discovery," as he then supposed it, could, at the same time, exult in a persuasion that the great poet's reputation was likely to suffer by it? This is an inconsistency of which Johnson was incapable; nor can anything more be fairly inferred from the Preface, than that Johnson, who was alike distinguished for ardent curiosity and love of truth, was pleased with an investigation by which both were gratified. That he was actuated by these motives, and certainly by no unworthy desire to deprecate our great epic poet, is evident from his own words; for, after mentioning the general zeal of men of genius and literature, "to advance the honour, and distinguish the beauties of Paradise Lost," he says, "Among the inquiries to which this ardour of criticism has naturally given occasion, none is more obscure in itself, or more worthy of rational curiosity, than a retrospect of the progress of this mighty genius in the construction of his work; a view of the fabric, gradually rising, perhaps, from small beginnings, till its foundation rests in the centre, and its turrets sparkle in the skies; to trace back the structure through all its varieties to the simplicity of its first plan; to find what was first projected, whence the scheme was taken, how it was improved or lost, what assistance it was executed, and from what store the materials were collected, whether its founder dug them from the quarries of Nature, or demolished other buildings to embellish his own." Is this the language of one who wished to blast the laurels of Milton?

JOHNSON TO RICHARDSON.

"Dear Sir,—Though Clarissa wants no help from external splendour, I was glad to see her improved in her appearance, but more glad to find that she was now got above all fears of prolixity, and confident enough of success to supply whatever had been hitherto suppressed. I never indeed found a hint of any such defacement, but I regretted it; for though the story is long, every letter is short.

"I wish you would add an index rerum, that when the reader recollects any incident, he may easily find it, which at present he cannot do, unless he knows in which volume it is told; for Clarissa is not a performance to be read with eagerness, and laid aside for ever; but will be occasionally consulted by the busy, the aged, and the studious; and therefore I beg that this edition, by which I suppose posterity is to abide, may want nothing that can facilitate its use. I am, sir, yours, &c."

—Rich. Cor.

"Sam. Johnson."

Though Johnson's circumstances were at this appear extraordinary, but Johnson was at this time very anxious to cultivate the favour of Richardson, who lived in an atmosphere of elegance, and Johnson found it necessary to fall into the fashion of the society. Mr. Northcote relates, that Johnson introduced Sir Joshua Reynolds and his sister to Richardson, but hinted to them, at the same time, that if they wished to see the latter in good humour, they must exultate on the excellences of Clarissa; and Mrs. Poggi tells us, that when talking of Richardson, he used to say, "You think I love Battery—and so I do; but a little too much always disgusts me; that fellow, Richardson, on the contrary, could not be contented to sit quietly down the stream of reputation without longing to taste the froth from every stroke of the oar." — Chorley.
time far from being easy, his humane and charitable disposition was constantly exerting itself. Mrs. Anna Williams, daughter of a very ingenious Welsh physician, and a woman of more than ordinary talents and literature, having come to London in hopes of being cured of a cataract in both her eyes, which afterwards ended in total blindness, was kindly received as a constant visitor at his house while Mrs. Johnson lived; and, after her death, having come under his roof in order to have an operation upon her eyes performed with more comfort to her than in lodgings, she had an apartment from him during the rest of her life, at all times when he had a house.

1 Mr. Prior, who, in preparing his Life of Goldsmith, had access to the papers of Newbery, the bookseller, found several notes of Johnson's, at this period, soliciting small loans, of one and two guineas. In 1759 and 1760 Johnson passed 9 months of hand labour in the public offices, to some for advances on account of the "Idler." Mr. Prior found also the original statement of the account between him and Johnson for the Idler, when collected into volumes.

2 In 1752 Johnson was almost entirely occupied with his Dictionary. The last paper of his Rambler was published March 23 this year; in a great measure to smooth the constitutional asperity of his temper. When those particulars are known, this candid sincerity, which began with compassion, and terminated in a friendship that subsisted till death dissolved it, will be easily accounted for. — Hawkins, p. 362.

Mrs. Williams was a person extremely interesting. She had uncommon firmness of mind, a boundless curiosity, retentive memory, and strong judgment. She had various powers of pleasing. Her personal afflictions and slender fortune she seemed to forget, when she had the power of doing an act of kindness: her natural cheerfulness, her sweet temper, her lowly and simple body that was truly deplorable. Her regard to Dr. Johnson was formed with such strength of judgment and firm esteem, that her voice never hesitated when she repeated his name, or recited his good deeds; though upon many other occasions her want of other conversation made her use the old saw, as "ever and ever," to affect her speech. Mrs. Williams was blind before she was acquainted with Dr. Johnson. She had many resources, though not those of money. That she was industrious was certain; but from the blundering manner of the will, I fear she never reaped the benefit of it. The lady left money to erect a hospital for ancient maidens; but the number she had allotted being too great for the donation, the Doctor (Johnson) said, it would be better to expunge the word maintain, and put in to stare such a number of old maidens. They asked him what name should be given it; he replied, 'Let it be called Jenny's Whirl.' [The name of a well-known tavern near Chelsea in London, which was kept by Mrs. Phillips, and was given her for a small annual allowance, and some other Welsh ladies, to all of whom she was related. Mrs. Montague, on the death of Mr. Montague, presented to the school one hundred pounds per annum. As near as I can calculate, Mrs. Williams had about thirty-five or forty pounds a year. The furniture she used in her apartment in Dr. Johnson's house was, it is said, bought for one hundred and fifty pounds. The tea and bread and butter being at least half of her nourishment. Sometimes she had a servant or charwoman to do the harder sort of work. She was extremely hardy and industrious. I have frequently seen her at work. Upon remarking one day her facility in moving about the house, searching into drawers, and finding books, without the help of sight, 'Believe me (said she), persons who cannot do these common offices without sight, did but little while they enjoyed that blessing.' Scanty circumstances, bad health, and blindness, are surely a sufficient apology for her being sometimes impatient: her natural disposition was good, friendly, and humane." — Lady Knight. (Ants, p. 24.)

I see her now—a pale, shrunken old lady, dressed in scarlet, made in the handsome French fashion of the time (1775), with a lace cap, with two stiffened projecting wings on the temples, and a black lace hood over it. Her temper has been recorded as marked by her exactness. This might be excited by some of the meager inmates of the upper floors [of Dr. Johnson's house]; but her gentle kindness to me I never shall forget, or think inconsistent with a bad temper. I know nobody from whose discourse there was a better chance of deriving high ideas of moral rectitude. Miss Hawkins's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 152. See post, 25 November, 1766.—Croker.

Here the author's memory failed him, for, according to the account of the bookseller Williams (see ante), the work here read March 17; but, in truth, as has been already observed, she must have been able to lay the fourteenth of March; at which time Mrs. Johnson was at her end, for she died on the following Tuesday, March 17. Had the concluding paper of that work been written on the day of her death, it would have been still more extraordinary than it is, considering the extreme grief into which the author was plunged by that event. The melancholy cast of that con-after which, there was a cessation for some time of any exertion of his talents as an essayist. But, in the same year, Dr. Hawkesworth, who was his warm admirer, and a studious imitator of his style, and then lived in great intimacy with him, began a periodical paper, entitled, "The Adventurer," in connection with other gentlemen, one of whom was Johnson's much-loved friend Dr. Bathurst; and, without doubt, they received many valuable hints from his conversation, most of his friends having been so assisted in the course of their works.

That there should be a suspension of his literary labours during a part of the year 1752, will not seem strange, when it is considered that soon after closing his Rambler, he suffered a loss which, there can be no doubt, affected him with the deepest distress. For on the 17th of March, O. S., his wife died. Why Sir John Hawkins should unwarrantably take upon him even to suppose that Johnson's fondness for her was dissembled (meaning simulated or assumed), and to assert, that if it was not the case, "it was a lesson he had learned by rote," I cannot conceive; unless it proceeded from a want of similar feelings in his own breast. To argue from her being much older than Johnson, or any other circumstances, that he could not really love her, is absurd; for love is not a subject of reasoning, but of feeling, and therefore there are no common principles upon which one can persuade another concerning it. Every man feels for himself, and knows how he is affected by particular qualities in the person he admires, the impressions of which are too minute and delicate to be substantiated in language.

The following very solemn and affecting prayer was found after Dr. Johnson's decease, by his servant, Mr. Francis Barber, who delivered it to his worthy friend the Reverend Mr. Strahan, Vicar of Edlington, who at my earnest request has obligingly favoured me with a copy of it, which he and I compared with the original. I present it to the world as an undoubted proof of a circumstance in the character of my illustrious friend, which, though some, whose hard minds I never shall envy, may attack as superstitions, will, I am sure, endear him more to numbers of good men. I have an additional, and that a personal motive for presenting it, because it sanctions what I myself have always maintained and am fond to indulge.

"O Lord! Governor of heaven and earth, in whose hands are embodied and departed spirits, if thou hast ordained the souls of the dead to minister to the living, and appointed my departed wife to have care of me, grant that I may enjoy the good effects of her attention and ministration, whether exercised by appearance, impulses, dreams, or in any other manner agreeable to thy government. Forgive my presumption, enlighten my ignorance, and however meaner agents are employed, grant me the blessed influences of thy holy Spirit, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

What actually followed upon this most interesting piece of devotion by Johnson, we are not informed; but I, whom it has pleased God to afflict in a similar manner to that which occasioned it, have certain experience of benignant communication by dreams. That his love for his wife was of the most ardent kind, and, during the long period of fifty years, was unimpaired by the lapse of time, is evident from various passages in the series of his Prayers and Meditations, published by the Reverend Mr. Strahan, as well as from other memorials, two of which I select, as strongly marking the tenderness and sensibility of his mind.

"March 28, 1753. I kept this day as the anniversary of my Tetty's death, with prayer and tears including essay is sufficiently accounted for by the situation of Mrs. Johnson at the time it was written; and her death three days afterwards put an end to the paper. — MALONE. Mr. Malone seems also to have fallen into some errors, from not adverting to the change of style. Johnson, at this period, used the old style so that Mr. Boswell may have copied from some MS. note the date of the 2d of March as that on which the last Rambler was written, though it was published next day, viz. the 3d, O. S., or 14th, N. S.; and as Mrs. Johnson's death was on the 17th, O. S., or 29th, N. S., the Rambler was concluded a fortnight before that event, and was concluded because, as Dr. Johnson expressly says in the last number, "have supported it for two years, and multiplied his essays to six volumes, he determined to desist." It died thereof a natural death, though it is very likely that the loss of Mrs. Johnson would have stopped it, had it not been already terminated. — CROKER.

1 The last paper of the Adventurer assigns to Dr. J. War-ton such as have the signature Z, and leaves the rest to Hawkins. Hawkins adds that the paper marked A, which are said to have come from a source that remained unknown, was received by Dr. War-ton and Draper, distinguished by the letter T (the first of which is dated 3rd March, 1753.) by Johnson, who received two guineas for every number. The authenticity of paper, some of which he had before adjusted in his stipulation for the Rambler, and was probably the measure of reward to his fellow-labourers. — Hawkins. But see post, p. 80, n. 3, more on this subject. — CROKER.

2 Johnson himself has in his Dictionary given to the word "dissembled" the same meaning in which it is here used by Hawkins. He adds, however, very justly, that such a use of it is erroneous. — CROKER.

3 George, afterwards D.D., second son of Johnson's friend, Andrew Strahan, M. P. and King's Printer. He died May 1824, aged 80.

4 Mr. Boswell's wife died in June, 1750; his Life of Johnson was first published in April, 1791. See the letter to Mr. Elphinston on a similar loss, ante, p. 66. n. 1. — CROKER.

5 The originals of this publication are now deposited in Pembroke College. It is to be observed, that they consist of a few little memorandum books, and a great number of separate scraps of paper, and bear no marks of having been arranged or intended for publication by Dr. Johnson. Each prayer is in a separate piece of paper, generally a sheet—but sometimes a fragment—of note paper. The memoranda and observations are generally in little banks of a few leaves sewed together. This subject will be referred to hereafter; (sub November and December, 1784;) but it is even now improved. Dr. Johnson, on this subject, remarks that the second part of the Rambler's publication was not foreseen nor prepared by Dr. Johnson himself, but patched up by the reverend gentleman who edited it. — CROKER.

The publication has done no harm; on the contrary, though it has on a few points given rise to criticism, misrepresentations, and sneer, (see next note,) it, on the whole, raises Johnson's character for piety and charity; but it was in the first instance a breach of confidence towards Johnson, and it assumed towards the public a character of authority which it did not possess. — CROKER, 1846.
in the morning. In the evening I prayed for her conditionally, if it were lawful."

"April 29, 1753. I know not whether I do not too much indulge the vain longings of affection; but I hope that with respect to my heart, and that when I die like my Tetty, this affection will be acknowledged in a happy interview, and that in the mean time I am incited by it to piety. I will, however, not deviate too much from common and received methods of devotion."

Her wedding-ring, when she became his wife, was, after her death, preserved by him, as long as he lived, with an affectionate care, in a little round wooden box, in the inside of which he pasted a slip of paper, thus inscribed by him in fair characters, as follows:

"Eheu!
Eliz. Johnson,
Nupta Jul. 9° 1736,
Mart. 17° 1753."

After his death, Mr. Francis Barber, his faithful servant, and residiary legatee, offered this memorial of tenderness to Mrs. Lucy Porter, Mrs. Johnson's daughter; but she has declined to accept of it, he had it enamelled as a mourning ring for his old master, and presented it to his wife, Mrs. Barber, who now has it.

1 Miss Seward, with equal truth and taste, thus expresses herself concerning these and similar passages:—"These philosophical meditations, with their pious prayers for old Totty's soul; their contrite parade about lying in bed on a morning; drinking creamed tea on a fast day; snoring at sermons; and having omitted to ponder well Bel and the Dragon, and Tobit and his Dog." And in another letter she does not scruple to say, that Mr. Boswell confessed to her his idea that Johnson was "a Roman Catholic in his heart." Miss Seward's credit is by this time so low that it is hardly necessary to observe how improbable it is that Mr. Boswell could have made any such confession, and that Dr. Johnson thought charitably of the Roman Catholics, and defended their religion from the coarse language of our political tests, which call it impious; and his exertions in her behalf, especially in the case of the Misses Cornelia, which the Roman Catholics were willing to dispute with us on no other terms than that we should not unanimously disclaim all participation in the doctrines of that church (see post, May 3, 1773: April 5, 1774: Is. 11, 5: 2 Tim. 3, 21.) (the mother of Miss Cornelia Knight, author of "Marina Ficinia," wrote from Rome to Mr. Hoole,—"Dr. Johnson's political principles ran high, both in church and state: he wished power to the king and to the heads of the church, as the laws of England have established; but I know he disdained absolute power; and I am very sure of his disapprobation of the doctrines of the Church of Rome; because about three weeks before we came abroad, he said to my Cornelia, "You are going where the ostentations pomp of church ceremonies attracts the imagination; but if they want to persuade you to change, you must remember, that by increasing your faith, you may be persuaded to become Turk." If these were not the words, I have kept up to the express request of Mr. Hoole, a letter written by him to me by all his Roman Catholic acquaintance, yet was Mr. Johnson a most unshaken Church-of-England man! and I think, or at least strongly suspect, that he even wrote a letter to Mr. Barnard, the king's librarian, when he was in Italy collecting books, contained some very particular advice to his friends to turn his back on "a Roman Catholicitifer of the Church of Rome." And finally— which may perhaps be thought more likely to express his real sentiments than even a more formal denunciation of Rome was proposed (see post, April 30, 1773), that monuments of eminent men should in future be erected in St. Paul's, and when some in conversation suggested that Dr. Johnson observed, "Why, sir, as Pope was a Roman Catholic, I would not have him to be first."—Croker.

2 It seems as if Dr. Johnson had been a little ashamed of the disproportion between his age and that of his wife, for neither in this inscription nor that over her grave, written thirty years later, does he mention her age, which was at her death sixty-three. —Croker.

3 Offended perhaps, and not unreasonably, that she was not mentioned in Johnson's will. —C., 1831. It has been observed to me, that neither had she in her will, made before Johnson's death, remembered him—but she could hardly have thought of Johnson's outruling her. —Croker, 1846.

4 "I asked him," says Mrs. Piozzi, "if he ever disputed with his wife (I had heard that he loved her passionately)." "Perpetually," said he: "my wife had a particular reverence for cleanliness, and desired the praise of others, and her house was always so clean, that when they became troublesome to their best friends, slaves to their own wants, and only sigh for the hour of the day when the househands out of the house. So our house was always neat and clean, and without any trouble or nonsense; a clean floor is so comfortable, she would say sometimes, by way of twitting; that at home she saw the chance of having such a day enough about the floor, we would now have a touch at the ceiling." On another occasion I have heard him blame her for a fault many people have, of setting the mirey of their neighbours, half unintentionally, half wantonly, before their eyes, showing them the bad side of their profession, stranton, &c. He said, "She would lament the dependence of pupling to a young heir, &c., and once told a waterman who rowed her along the Thames in a wherry, that he was no happier than a galley-slave, one being chained to the oar by authority, the other by want. She read comedy better than any body he ever heard (he said); in tragedy she mothed too much." Garrick, however, told Mr. Thrale that she was a little painted puppet of no value at all, and quite disfigured with affected, full of odd airs of rural elegance; and he made one notice no scenes, by mimicking her in a dialogue he pretended to have overheard. Mr. Johnson has told me that her hair was eminently beautiful, quite blonde and so fine, that she could play the harpsichord in a room and was always desirous to dye it black, which he very judiciously snippaned her from doing. The picture I found of her and her daughter, Mrs. Lucy Porter, said it was like. The intelligence I gained of her from old Mr. Thrale was perfectly perfect: —Piozzi. But Lettice only knew her in her last years, and in very bad health. —Croker.

5 In the Gentleman's Magazine, February, 1794, p. 100, was printed a letter pretending to be that written by John- son on the death of his wife: but it is merely a transcript of the 41st number of the Idler, on 'the death of a friend,' the fictitious date, March 17, 1751, O. S., was added to give a colour to this deception, —Malone.

The state of mind in which a man must be upon the death of a woman whom he sincerely loves, had been in his contemplation many years before. In his Irene, we find the following fervent and tender speech of Demetrius, addressed to his Aspasia:—

"From those bright regions of eternal day,
Where now thou shin'st amongst thy fellow sain ts,
Array'd in purer light, look down on me!
In pleasing visions and assusive dreams,
O! soothe my soul, and teach me how to lose thee."

I have, indeed, been told by Mrs. Desmou lins, who, before her marriage, lived with Mr. Johnson at Hampstead, that she indulged herself in country air and nice living, at an unsuitable expense, till her husband was alarmed with the death of the Doctor, and that she had since been treated with that complacency which is the most engaging quality in a wife. But all this is perfectly compatible with her fondness for her, especially when it is remembered that he had a high opinion of her understanding, and that the impressions which her beauty, real or imaginary, had originally made upon his fancy, being continued by habit, had not been effaced, though she herself was doubtless much altered for the worse. —The dreadful shock of separation took place in the night; and he immediately despatched a letter to his friend, the Reverend Dr. Taylor, which, as Taylor told me, expressed grief in the strongest manner he had ever read; so that it is much to be regretted it has not been preserved. The letter was brought to Dr. Taylor, at his house in the cloisters, Westminster, about three in the morning; and as it signified an earnest desire to see him, he got up, and went to Johnson as soon as he was dressed, and found him in tears and in extreme agitation. After being a little while together, Johnson requested him to join with him in prayer. He then prayed extempore, as did Dr. Taylor; and thus by means of that piety which was ever his primary object, his troubled mind was, in some degree, soothed and composed.

The next day he wrote as follows:

JOHNSON TO TAYLOR.

"March 18, 1792.

"Dear Sir,—Let me have your company and instruction. Do not live away from me. My distress is great.

"Pray desire Mrs. Taylor to inform me what mourning I should buy for my mother and Miss Porter, and bring a note in writing with you.

"Remember me in your prayers, for vain is the help of man. I am, dear sir,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

That his sufferings upon the death of his wife were severe, beyond what are commonly endured, I have no doubt, from the information of many who were then about him, to none of whom I give more credit than to Mr. Francis Barber, his faithful negro servant 1 who came into his family about a fortnight after the dismal event. These sufferings were aggravated by the melancholy inherent in his constitution, and although he probably was not oftener in the wrong than she was, in the little disagreements which sometimes troubled his married denance which (however improbable the fact) it is hard to resist, that Johnson resigned to Dr. Bathurst all the profits of the Adventurer, two guineas a paper, for about thirty papers; and all other accounts lead to a belief, that about this period Johnson was in extreme distress. It is therefore more probable that he was induced to take the Negro by charity and his love of Dr. Bathurst,—C. 1731. The Anderdon MSS. contain an importunate letter, dated July 3, 1731, from one Mitchell, a tradesman in Chandos Street, pressing Johnson to pay £2 due by his wife ever since August, 1749, and threatening legal proceedings to enforce payment. This letter Mr. Boswell had endorsed, "Proof of Dr. Johnson's wretched circumstances in 1751."—_Croker_, 1845.

2 See his beautiful and affecting Rambler, No. 51. — _Malone_. This was written two years before Mrs. Johnson's death. — _Croker_.

3 It does not appear that Johnson was fully persuaded that there was a middle state; his prayers being only conditionate, i.e., if such a state existed.—_Malone_. This is not a correct statement of the case; the conditionate prayer is "to me so to intercede; and in all his prayers of this nature he most powerfully intercedes the humble limitation of "as far as I can; as far as I may be permitted, I recommend, &c.;" but it is also to be observed, that he sometimes prays to the Almighty without alluding to any middle state, departed, as if he believed the sentence to have been already pronounced. — _Croker_.

4 A few months before his death, Johnson honoured her
Dr. Taylor, has been published since his death, is a performance of uncommon excellence, and full of rational and pious comfort to such as are depressed by that severe affliction which Johnson felt when he wrote it. When it is considered that it was written in such an agitation of mind, and in the short interval between her death and burial, it cannot be read without wonder.

From Mr. Francis Barber I have had the following authentic and artless account of the situation in which he found him recently after his wife's death: "He was in great affliction. Mrs. Williams was then living in his house, which was in Gough Square. He was busy with the Dictionary. Mr. Shiel, and some others of the gentlemen who had formerly written for him, used to come about him. He had then little for himself, but frequently sent money to Mr. Shiel when in distress. The friends who visited him at that time, were chiefly Dr. Bathurst, and Mr. Diamond, an apothecary in Cork Street, Burlington-gardens, with whom he and Mrs. Williams generally dined every day. There was a talk of his going to Iceland with him, which would probably have happened, had he lived. There were also Mr. Cave, Dr. Hawkesworth, Mr. Ryland, merchant on Tower-hill, Mr. Masters, the poetess, who lived with Mr. Cave, Mrs. Carter, and sometimes Mrs. Macanuay; also, Mrs. Gardiner, wife of a tallow-chandler on Snow-hill, not in the learned way, but a worthy memory by the following epistle, which was inscribed on her tombstone, in the church of Brondley: —

He conductum reliqua
ELIZABETHILE
Antiqui Jarvistorum gentis,

Formosa, ingeuntia, necesse est
Uxoris, primis nuptiis, Henrico Porteri, Secundis, SAMUELIO JOHNSON;
Quo multum labori, dilectatum
Hoc lapide contextum.
Obit Londini, Muse Mar.
J. DODCULL. — BOSWELL.

Here are buried the remains of ELIZABETH, of the ancient family of Jereis, of Peatling in Leicestresshire. Beautiful, accomplished, ingenious, plana, the wife in a first marriage of Henry Porter, in a second, of Samuel Johnson: who has covered with this stone her whom he much loved and long lamented. She died in London in March, 1753." — C., 1486.

1 Dr. Bathurst, though a physician of no inconsiderable merit, had not the good fortune to get much practice in London. He was, therefore, willing to accept of employment abroad, and, to the regret of all who knew him, fell a sacrifice to the destructive climate, in the expedition against the Havannah. Mr. Langton recollects the following passage in a letter from Dr. Johnson to Mr. Beuwerel: — "The Havannah has taken; a conquest to be duly obtained I for, Bathurst died before it; " Via Priamus tantae tanteq Troja fuit." — BOSWELL.

There are in Harwood's History of Lichfield two letters from Bathurst to Johnson, dated Barbadoes, January 13. and Jamaica, March 18. 1757; from which it would seem that Mr. Bowles's letter of February 17, for Bathurst left London, and returned to the West Indies some years before the expedition against the Havannah of 1758. Nor is his name to be found in the list of medical officers who accompanied the army from England; he probably, therefore, joined the expedition in the West Indies. The first of these letters runs thus: —

"The many acts of friendship and affection you have confided upon me, to fully convince me of your being interested in my welfare, that even my present stupidity will not prevent my taking a pen in my hand to acquaint you that I am this instant arrived safe at Barbadoes, and I hope I may add, without having forgot all your lessons; and I am confident not without praying most fervently that the Supreme Being will enable me to deserve the approbation and friendship of so great and so good a man: alas! you little know how un-deserving I am of the favours I have received from you. May health and happiness for ever attend you. Excuse me for dropping my pen, for it is impossible that it should express the gratitude that is due to you, from your most affectionate friend, and most obliged servant, Richard BATHURST."

Dr. Johnson told Mrs. Piozzi that he loved "dear, dear Bathurst, because he never loved any human creature;" and it was on him that he bestowed the singular eulogy of being a good hater: "Dear Bathurst," said he, "was a man to my very heart's content; he had a foible, and the balance was a rogue, and he hated a Whig: he was a very good hater!" — CRocker.

2 Mary Masters published a small volume of poems about 1738, and, in 1756, "Familiar Letters and Poems," in octavo, which is supposed to have died about 1750. — CRocker.

3 Catherine Sawbridge, sister of Mrs. Alderman Sawbridge, was born in 1753; but it was not till 1760 that she was married to Dr. Macaulay, a physician; so that Barber's account was, in respect to her, incorrect, either in date or name. She was married a second time, in 1778, to Mr. Graham, with no increase of responsibility. She died in 1791. — CRocker.

4 With this good woman, who was introduced to him by Mrs. Masters, he kept up constant intercourse, and remembered her in his will, by the bequest of a book. See post, Vol. 1783. — CRocker.

5 See add. Vol. 2. — C.

6 Thomas, second Lord Southwell, F.R.S., born 1698, succeeded his father in 1730, and died in 1766. — CRocker.

7 Robert Levett, father of Mr. Payne, was a politician, and became early in life a waiter at a coffee-house in Paris; where the surgeons who frequented it, finding him of an inquisitive turn, and attentive to their business, took him up, and gave him some instructions in their art. They afterwards furnished him with the means of other knowledge, by procuring him an admission to a medical course for him, and anatomy as were read by the ablest professors of that part of science. He had a very extensive practice. He graduated about twenty years under Johnson's hospitable roof, who never wished him to be regarded as an inferior, or treated him like a dependent. — Steevens.
has been generally imagined. To trace his acquaintance with each particular person, if it could be done, would be a task, of which the labour would not be repaid by the advantage. But exceptions are to be made; one of which must be a friend so eminent as Sir Joshua Reynolds, who was truly his dulce deus, and with whom he maintained an uninterrupted intimacy to the last hour of his life. When Johnson lived in Castle Street, Cavendish Square, he used frequently to visit two ladies who lived opposite to him, Miss Cotterells, daughters of Admiral Cotterell. Reynolds used also to visit there, and thus they met. Mr. Reynolds, as I have observed above, had from the first reading of his Life of Savage, conceived a very high admiration of Johnson's powers of writing. His conversation no less delighted him; and he cultivated his acquaintance with the laudable zeal of one who was ambitious of general improvement. Sir Joshua, indeed, was lucky enough, at their very first meeting, to make a remark, which was so much above the common-place style of conversation, that Johnson at once perceived that Reynolds had the habit of thinking for himself. The ladies were regretting the death of a friend, to whom they owed great obligations; upon which Reynolds observed, "You have, however, the comfort of being relieved from a burden of gratitude." They were shocked a little at this alleviating suggestion, as too selfish; but Johnson defended it in his clear and forcible manner, and was much pleased with the "mind, the fair view of human nature," which it exhibited, like some of the reflections of Rocheclercout. The consequence was, that

1 Mr. Murphy, who is, at this period, better authority than Mr. Boswell, says, "It was as late as life before he had the habit of mixing, otherwise than occasionally, with polite company;" and Dr. Harwood favoured me with the following memorandum, written in Johnson's writing, made about this time, of certain visits which he was to pay (perhaps on his return from Oxford in 1754) and which, as it contains that of some of the highest and lowest of his acquaintance, is probably a list of nearly all his friends:—

2 Captain Charles Cotterell retired totally from the service in July, 1747, being put on the superseded list, with the rank and pay of a rear-admiral. He died in August, 1754. — CROKER.

3 It would be naturally inferred from Mr. Boswell's account, that the acquaintance between Johnson and Sir Joshua took place so early as at the time when the former resided in Castle Street, but it was not so. Reynolds had not then come to town. The acquaintance must have commenced subsequently to Reynolds' fixing himself in London, towards the end of 1752. In 1753, he took a house in Newport Street, where, opposite to him, resided the Cottrells. (See Northcote's Life of Reynolds, vol. i. p. 69.) Barber also must have been in error when he described Reynolds as one of Johnson's intimates, at the period of his wife's death. — CROKER.

4 Johnson himself has a sentiment somewhat similar in his life with Reynolds. He is too much inclined to inferiority, that their gratitude is a specific December 1754. They return benefits, not because recompence is a pleasure, but because, in the sense of Johnson, it is a duty. This is, no doubt, "a somewhat similar sentiment," but in Reynolds. Rambler, Johnson mentions it with the censure it deserves; whereas on the text, he is reserving the charge. Such an observation is very little like the usual good manners, good nature, and good sense of Sir Joshua; and we cannot but suspect the authority, whatever it was, on which Boswell admitted this anecdote. — CROKER.

5 Jane Warrington, second wife of John second Duke of Argyll. His Grace died in 1743. She survived till 1767. — CROKER.

6 Mr. Langton was only 15 when the Rambler was terminated, having been born about 1737, and he entered Trinity College, Oxford, July 7, 1757. So much of his history is told with that of Dr. Johnson's, that it is unnecessary to say more in this place, except that he was remarkable for his knowledge of Greek, and on Dr. Johnson's death, he succeeded him as professor of ancient literature in the Royal Academy. He died on the 10th of December 1801, and was buried at Southampton. The following description of his person and appearance later in life is interesting, and its resemblance is confirmed by a beautiful portrait by Reyn- olds, in the possession of his family. "O! that we could sketch him with his mild countenance, his elegant features, and his sweet smile, sitting with one leg twisted round the other, as if fearing to occupy more space than was equitable; his person formed in such a manner as to support his height, and his arms crossed over his bosom, or his hands locked together on his knee; his oblong gold-mounted spectacles taken from the waistcoat pocket opposite his hand, and either remaining between his fingers or set by him on the table, but which was never used when his mind was occupied in conversation; so soon as conversation left the box was produced." — Miss Hawkins' Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 292. — CROKER.
might, with strict propriety, be called. Mr. Langton was exceedingly surprised when the sage first appeared. He had not received the smallest intimation of his figure, dress, or manner. From perusing his writings, he fancied he should see a decent, well-drest, in short, a remarkably decorous philosopher. Instead of which, down from his bedchamber about noon, came, as newly risen, a huge uncouth figure, with a little dark wig which scarcely covered his head, and his clothes hanging loose about his body. But his conversation was so rich, so animated, and so forcible, and his religious and political notions so congenial with those in which Langton had been educated, that he conceived for him that veneration and attachment which he ever preserved. Johnson was no less ready to love Mr. Langton, for his being of a very ancient family: for I have heard him say, with pleasure, “Langton, Sir, has a grant of free-warren over his Sepulchre, Henry the Second; and Cardinal Stephen Langton, in King John’s reign, was of this family.”

Mr. Langton afterwards went to pursue his studies at Trinity College, Oxford, where he formed an acquaintance with his fellow-student, Mr. Topham Beaufleek, who, though their opinions and modes of life were so different, that it seemed utterly improbable that they should at all agree, had so ardent a love of literature, so acute an understanding, such elegance of manners, and so well discerned the excellent qualities of Mr. Langton, a gentleman eminent not only for worth and learning, but for an inexhaustible fund of entertaining conversation, that they became intimate friends.

Johnson, soon after this acquaintance began, passed a considerable time at Oxford. He at first thought it strange that Langton should associate so much with one who had the character of being loose, both in his principles and practice; but, by degrees, he himself was fascinated. Mr. Beaufleek’s being of the St. Alban’s family, and having, in some particulars, a resemblance to Charles the Second, contributed, in Johnson’s imagination, to throw a lustre upon his other qualities; and, in a short time, the mirth, pious Johnson, and the gay, dissipated Beaufleek, were companions.

“What a coalition! (said Garrick, when he heard of this:) I shall have my old friend to bail out of the Round-house.” But I can bear testimony that it was a very agreeable association. Beaufleek was too polite, and valued learning and wit too much, to offend Johnson by sallies of infidelity or licentiousness; and Johnson delighted in the good qualities of Beaufleek, and hoped to correct the evil. Innumerable were the scenes in which Johnson was amused by these young men. Beaufleek could take more liberty with him than any body with whom I ever saw him; but, on the other hand, Beaufleek was not spared by his respectable companion, when reproof was proper. Beaufleek had such a propensity to satire, that at one time Johnson said to him, “You never open your mouth but with intention to give pain; and you have often given me pain, not from the power of what you said, but from seeing your intention.” At another time applying to him, with a slight alteration, a line of Pope, he said,—

Every thing thou dost shows the one, and every thing thou say’st, the other.” At another time he said to him, “Thy body is all vice, and thy mind all virtue.” Beaufleek is not seeming to relish the compliment, Johnson said, “Nay, Sir, Alexander the Great, marching in triumph into Babylon, could not have desired to have had more said to him.”

Johnson was some time with Beaufleek at his house at Windsor, where he was entertained with experiments in natural philosophy. One Sunday, when the weather was very fine, Beaufleek enticed him, insensibly, to saunter about all the morning. They went into a churchyard, in the time of divine service, and Johnson laid himself down at his case upon one of the tomb-stones. “Now, Sir, (said Beaufleek) you are like Ithar’s Idle Apprentice.” When Johnson got his pension, Beaufleek said to him, in the humorous phrase of Falstaff, “I hope you’ll now purge, and live cleanly, like a gentleman.”

One night when Beaufleek and Langton had supped at a tavern in London, and sat till about three in the morning, it came into their heads to go and knock up Johnson, and see if they could prevail on him to join them in a ramble. They rapped violently at the door of his chambers in the Temple, till at last he appeared in his shirt, with his little black wig on the top of his head, instead of a nightcap, and a Poker in his hand, imagining, probably, that some ruffians were coming to attack him. When he discovered who they were, and was told their errand, he smiled, and with great good humour agreed to their proposal: “What, is it you, you dogs! I’ll have a frisk with you.”

1 It is to be wondered that he did not also mention Bishop Langton, a distinguished benefactor to the cathedral of Lichfield, and who also had a grant of free-warren over his patrimonial inheritance, from Edward 1. the relationship might probably be as clearly traced in the one case as in the other. See Harwood’s History of Lichfield, p. 139. — Croker.
2 Topham Beaufleek, only son of Lord Sidney Beaufleek, third son of the first Duke of St. Albans, was born in 1739, and entered Trinity College, Oxford, in November, 1757. — Croker.

3 * Your taste of follies, and our scorn of fools.

4 Perhaps some experiments in electricity, which was, at this time, a fashionable curiosity: it cannot be supposed that the natural philosophy of Mr. Beaufleek’s country-house went very deep—Croker.

5 Johnson, as Mr. Kemble observes to me, might here have had in his thoughts the words of Sir John Brute (a character which, doubtless, he had been represented by Garrick), who uses nearly the same expression in “The Provoked Wife,” Act iii. sc. 1. — Malone.
He was soon drest, and they sallied forth together into Covent-Garden, where the green-grocers and fruiters were beginning to arrange their hampers, just come in from the country. Johnson made some attempts to help them; but the honest gardeners stared so at his figure and manner, and odd interference, that he soon saw his services were not relished. They then repaired to one of the neighbouring taverns, and made a bowl of that liquor called Bishop, which Johnson had always liked; while, in joyous contempt of sleep, from which he had been roused, he repeated the festive lines,

"Short, O short then be thy reign,
And give us to the world again!"

They did not stay long, but walked down to the Thames, took a boat, and rowed to Billingsgate. Beanclerk and Johnson were so well pleased with their amusement, that they resolved to persevere in dissipation for the rest of the day: but Langton deserted them, being engaged to breakfast with some young ladies. Johnson scolded him for "leaving his social friends, to go and sit with a set of wretched un-idea'd girls." Garrick, being told of this ramble, said to him smartly, "I heard of your frolic other night. You'll be in the Chronicle." Upon which Johnson afterwards observed, "He durst not do such a thing. His wife would not let him." He entered upon this year, 1753, with his usual piety, as appears from the following prayer, which I transcribed from that part of his diary which he burnt a few days before his death:

"Jan. 1, 1753, N. S.; which I shall use for the future.

"Almighty God, who hast continued my life to this day, grant that, by the assistance of thy Holy Spirit, I may improve the time which thou shalt grant me, to my eternal salvation. Make me to remember, to thy glory, thy judgments and thy mercies. Make me so to consider the loss of my wife, whom thou hast taken from me, that it may dispose me, by thy grace, to lead the residue of my life in thy fear. Grant this, O Lord, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

He now relieved the drudgery of his Dictionary, and the melancholy of his grief, by taking an active part in the composition of "The Adventurer," in which he began to write April 10, marking his essays with the signature T., by which most of his papers in that collection are distinguished: those, however, which have that signature, and also that of Mylarigrus, were not written by him, but, as I suppose, by Dr. Bathurst. Indeed, Johnson's energy of thought and richness of language are still more decisive marks than any signature. As a proof of this, my readers, I imagine, will not doubt that No. 39, on Sleep, is his; for it not only has the general texture and colour of his style, but the authors with whom he was peculiarly in agreement were readily introduced in it in cursory allusion. The translation of a passage in Statius 5 quoted in that paper, and marked C. B., has been erroneously ascribed to Dr. Bathurst, whose Christian name was Rich'd. How much this amiable man actually contributed to "The Adventurer," cannot be known. Let me add, that Hawkesworth's imitations of Johnson are sometimes so happy, that it is extremely difficult to distinguish them with certainty, from the composition of his great archetype. Hawkesworth was his closest imitator, a circumstance of which that writer would once have been proud to be told; though, when he had become elated by having risen into some degree of consequence, he, in a conversation with me, had the provoking effrontery 6 to say that he was not sensible of it.

Johnson was truly zealous for the success of "The Adventurer;" and very soon after his engaging in it, he wrote the following letter:

JOHN TO JOSEPH WARTON.

"8th March, 1753.

"Dear Sir,—I ought to have written to you before, but I ought to do many things which I do not; nor can I, indeed, claim any merit from this letter; for being desired by the authors and proprietor of the Adventurer to look out for another hand, my thoughts necessarily fixed upon you, whose fund of literature will enable you to assist them, with very little interruption of your studies.

"They desire you to engage to furnish one paper a month, at two guineas a paper, which you may very readily perform. We have considered that a paper should consist of pieces of imagination, pictures of life, and descriptions of literature. The part which depends on the imagination is very well supplied, as you will find when you read the paper; for descriptions of life, there is now a treaty almost made with an author and an authoress; and the province of criticism and literature—almost morbid regret which Johnson felt so long for the loss of his own wife.—Croker.

1 And had the gratitude to immortalise in his Dictionary as "a mixture of wine, oranges, and sugar."—Croker, 1846.
2 Mr. Langton has recollectors or collectors in the Johnson, repeated, the passage wrong. The lines are in Lord Lansdowne's Drinking Song to Sleep, and run thus:—

"Short, very short, be then thy reign.
For I'm in haste to laugh and drink again."

3 As Johnson's companions in this frolic were both thirty years younger than he, it is no wonder that Garrick should be a little alarmed at such extravagances. Nor can we help smiling at the philosopher of fifty scolding a young man of twenty for having the bad taste to order the company of a set of wretched un-idea'd girls. The sarcastic allusion to Garrick's domestic habits seems a little inconsistent with that of his companions in this frolic.

4 See the original passage as to Johnson's and Bathurst's share in the "Adventurer."

5 This is a slight inaccuracy. The Latin Sapphics translated by Dr. Bathurst were written by Cowley, and are in his fourth book on Plants.—Malone.

6 Effrontery is too offensive a term for the occasion. The improved style of Dr. Johnson in the latter might as well be said to be borrowed from the Adventurer, as that of the Adventurer from the Rambler. Johnson and Hawkesworth may have influenced each other, and yet either might say, without effrontery, that he was not conscious of it.—Croker.

7 Mr. Malone here added a long note, surmising that this author and authoress were Henry Fielding and his sister; but he produces no proof, and seems to admit, that even if they were the persons meant, they never contributed.—Croker.
Boswell’s Life of Johnson.

JOHNSON TO JOSEPH WARTON.

8th March, 1754.

"Dear Sir, — I cannot but congratulate you upon the conclusion of a work, in which you have borne so great a part with such flourish. I immediately determined that your name should be mentioned, but the paper having been some time written, Mr. Hawkesworth, I suppose, did not care to disorder its text, and therefore put your eulogy in a note. He and every other man mentions your papers of criticism with great commendation, though not with greater than they deserve.

"But how little can we venture to exult in any intellectual powers or literary attainments, when we consider the condition of the present age? How dear are the hopes and full of projects, versed in many languages, high in fancy, and strong in retentive capacity, the works of Johnson! Is it not a strong resemblance of his recovery? or is he to pass the remainder of his life in misery and degradation — perhaps with complete consciousness of his calamity?"

You have flattered us, dear Sir, for some time, with hopes of seeing you; when you come you will find your reputation increased, and with it the kindness of those friends who do not envy you; for success always produces either love or hatred. I enter my name among those that love, and love you more and more in proportion as by writing more you are more known; and believe, that as you continue to diffuse among us your integrity and learning, I shall be still with greater esteem and affection, dear Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant.

The Author, I conceive, is here in an error. He had before published in the "Journal of the Library" on April 10th (when No. 45 was published), above a month after the date of his letter to Dr. Warton. The two papers under consideration begin with the same prefixed initials, but do not precisely remember from whom I derived it. I believe, however, my informant was Dr. Warton.

With respect to No. 39, on Sleep, which our author has ascribed to Johnson, even if it were written by him, it would require such a statement to Dr. Warton; for it appeared on March 20th, near a fortnight after the date of Johnson’s letter to that gentleman. But on considering it attentively, though the style be liable to the sublimity of that of Johnson, I believe it was written by his friend Dr. Bathurst, and perhaps touched in a few places by Johnson himself. Dr. Johnson has observed, that "this paper not only has the general texture and colour of his style, but the authors with whom he was peculiarly conversant are readily introduced in it, in cursory allusion." Now the authors each, he never would own them; nay, he used to say, he did not write them: but the fact was, that he "dicated them," while Bathurst wrote. I read to him Mrs. Williams’s account: he smiled, and said nothing.

I am not quite satisfied with the casuistry by which the productions of one person are thus passed upon the world for the productions of another. I allow that not only knowledge, but powers and qualities of mind, may be communicated; but the actual effect of individual exertion never can be transferred, with truth, to any other than its own original cause. One person’s child may be made the child of another person by adoption, as among the Romans, or by the ancient Jewish mode of a wife having children born to her upon her knees, by her handmaid. But these were children in a different sense from that of nature. It was clearly understood that they were not of the blood of their nominal parents. So in literary children, an author may give the profits and fame of his composition to another man, but cannot make that other the real author. A Highland gentleman mentioned in that paper are Fontenelle, Milton, Razamazzini, Madde, Scaudery, Swift, Homer, Barretter, Status, Cowley, and Sir Thomas Browne. With many of these, doubtless, Johnson was acquainted; and in some, he discovered a common friend. This paper would have characterised the expression quoted from Swift as elegant: and with the works of Razamazzini it is very improbable he should have been acquainted. Mr. J. was a celebrated physician, who died at Padua in 1714, at the age of 81; with whose writings Dr. Bathurst may be supposed to have been acquainted. But the statement Croker:

"Johnson, without doubt, had read his Latin poems on plants; but Bathurst’s profession probably led him to read it with more attention than his friend had given to it; and Cowley’s eulogy on the poet would more readily occur to the naturalist and the physician, than to a more general reader. I believe, however, that the last paragraph of the paper on Sleep, in which Sir Thomas Browne is quoted, is the property of Sleep, as we lie down to rest, was never written by this gentleman.

There is a great confusion, and, as it seems, several errors, in Mr. Croker’s copy of this letter. He has not the share in the Adventurer, but it may be confidently asserted, on the evidence of Hawkins (ante, p. 75. n. 1.), of Dr. War.

"Johnson, and, of course, cannot have been written by him. I, therefore, have no copy of it, as Mr. Croker says.

The letter, by the way, which Mr. Johnson wrote to Mr. Croker, and which Mr. Croker published in the "Mug.", No. 3, in a letter to Mr. Johnson, is written in a different style, with a peculiar breadth of language, which might become friend.) Dooland would have had a perfect right to present a friend with one of this instrument, or to use it for himself, but he would not have been justifiable in allowing another maker to use his name. If a publisher had, on the strength of these papers, in the Adventurer, offered Dr. Bathurst a large price for a literary work, could Johnson have possibly acquiesced in it? The demand, then, was reasonable, but he did give all his share of the profits of the Adventurer to Dr. Bathurst, who, himself, wrote the papers in question. This was, however, of small advantage to Johnson, for, itself, to show the depth of his distress—greater, we may suppose, than Bathurst was likely to be in. Mr. Chalmers treats too lightly Dr. Johnson’s seeming acquiescence in it, and Dr. Johnson’s letter to Mr. Croker, in which he says, "probably smiled to see his friend puzzling himself with a difficulty which a plain question could in a moment have removed."
man, a younger branch of a family, once consulted me if he could not validly purchase the chiefship of his family, from the chief who was willing to sell it. I told him it was impossible for him to acquire, by purchase, a right to be a different person from what he really was;
for that the right of chiefship attached to the blood of primogeniture, and, therefore, was incapable of being transferred. I added, that even though Esaú sold his birthright, or the advantages belonging to it, he still remained the first-born of his parents; and that whatever agreement a chief might make with any of the clan, the Heralds’ Office could not admit of the metamorphosis, or with any decency attest that the younger was the elder: but I did not convince the worthy gentleman.

Johnson’s papers in the Adventurer are very similar to those of the Rambler; but, being rather more varied in their subjects, and being mixed with essays by other writers, upon topics more generally attractive than even the most elegant ethical discourses, the sale of the work, at first, was more extensive. Without meaning, however, to depreciate the Adventurer, I must observe, that as the value of the Rambler came, in the progress of time, to be better known, it grew upon the public estimation, and that its sale has far exceeded that of any other periodical papers since the reign of Queen Anne.

In one of the books of his diary I find the following entry:

“Apr. 3. 1753. I began the second vol. of my Dictionarv, room being left in the first for Preface, Grammar, and History, none of them yet begun.

O Gon, who hast hitherto supported me, enable me to proceed in this labour, and in the whole task of my present state; that when I shall render up, at the last day, an account of the talent committed to me, I may receive pardon, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.”

JOHNSON TO RICHARDSON.

“26th Sept. 1753.

“Dearest Sir, I return you my sincerest thanks for the volumes of your new work; but it is a kind of tyrannical kindness to give only so much at a time, as will only make me long for; but that will probably be thought, even of the whole, when you have given it.

“I have no objection but to the preface, in which you first mention the letters as fallen by some chance into your hands, and afterwards mention your health as such, that you almost despaired of going through your plan. If you were to require my opinion which part should be changed, I should be inclined to the suppression of that part which seems to disclaim the composition. What is modesty, if it deserts from truth? Of what use is the display of the faults of your own child? Why commend it?

“You must forgive this, because it is meant well.

“I thank you once more, dear Sir, for your books; but cannot I prevail this time for an index?
—such I wished, and shall wish, to Clarissa. Suppose that in one volume an accurate index was made to the three works — while I am writing an objection arises — such an index to the three would look like the preclusion of a fourth, to which I will never contribute; for if I cannot benefit mankind, I hope never to injure them. I am, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,

“S. Johnson.”

In 1754 I can trace nothing published by him, except his numbers of the Adventurer, and “The Life of Edward Cave,” in the Gentleman’s Magazine for February. In biography there can be no question that he excelled, beyond all who have attempted that species of composition; upon which, indeed, he set the highest value. To the minute selection of characteristic circumstances, for which the ancients were remarkable, he added a philosophic research, and the most perspicuous and energetic language. Cave was certainly a man of estimable qualities, and Johnson, who had been diligent and successful in his own business, which, doubtless, entitled him to respect. But he was peculiarly fortunate in being recorded by Johnson; who, of the narrow life of a printer and publisher, without any digressions or adventitious circumstances, has made an interesting and agreeable narrative.

The Dictionary, we may believe, afforded Johnson full occupation this year. As it approached to its conclusion, he probably worked with redoubled vigour, as seemen increase their exertion and alacrity when they have a near prospect of their haven.

Lord Chesterfield, to whom Johnson had paid the high compliment of addressing to his lordship the plan of his Dictionary, had behaved to him in such a manner as to excite his contempt and indignation. The world has been for many years amused with a story confidently told, and as confidently repeated with additional circumstances, that a sudden disgust was taken by Johnson upon occasion of his having been one day kept long in waiting in his lordship’s antechamber, for “which the reason assigned was, that he had company with him; and that at last, when the door opened, out walked Colley Cibber; and that Johnson was so violently provoked when he found for whom he had been so long excluded, that he went away in a passion, and never would return. I remember having mentioned this story to George Lord Lyttelton, who told me he was very intimate with Lord Chesterfield, and, holding it as a well-known truth, defended Lord Chesterfield by saying, that “Cibber, who had been introduced familiarly by the back-stairs, had probably not been there above ten minutes.” It may seem strange even to entertain a doubt concerning a story so long and so widely current, and thus implicitly adopted, if not sanctioned, by the authority which I have mentioned; but Johnson himself assured me, that there was not the least foundation for it. He told me, that there never was any particular incident which produced a quarrel between Lord Chesterfield and him; but that his lordship’s continued neglect was the reason why he resolved to have no connection with him.

When the Dictionary was upon the eve of publication, Lord Chesterfield, who, it is said, had flattered himself with expectations that Johnson would dedicate the work to him, attempted, in a courtly manner, to soothe and insinuate himself with the sage, conscious, as it should seem, of the cold indifference with which he had treated its learned author; and further attempted to conciliate him, by writing two papers in “The World,” in recommendation of the work: and it must be confessed, that they contain some studied compliments, so finely turned, that if there had been no previous offence, it is probable that Johnson would have been highly delighted. Praise, in general, was pleasing to him; but by praise from a man of rank and elegant accomplis-ments, he was peculiarly gratified. His Lordship says, "I think the public in general, and the republic of letters in particular, are greatly obliged to Mr. Johnson for having undertaken and executed so great and desirable a work. Perfection is not to be expected from man; but if we are to judge by the various works of Johnson already published, we have good reason to believe, that he will bring this as near to perfection as any man could do. The Plan of it, which he published some years ago, seems to me to be a proof of it. Nothing can be more rationally imagined, or more accurately and elegantly expressed. I therefore recommend the previous perusal of it to all those who intend to buy the Dictionary, and who, I suppose, are all those who can afford it." . . . .

"It must be owned, that our language is, at present, in a state of anarchy, and hitherto, perhaps, it may not have been the worse for it. During our free and open trade, many words and expressions have been imported, adopted, and naturalized from other languages, which have greatly enriched our own. Let it still preserve what real strength and beauty it may have borrowed from others; but let it not, like the Tarpeian maid, be overwhelmed and crushed by unnecessary ornaments. The time for discrimination seems to be now come. Toleration, adoption, and naturalization have run their length. Good order and authority are now necessary. But where shall we find them, and, at the same time, the obedience due to them? We must have recourse to the old Roman expedient in times of confusion, and choose a dictator. Upon this principle, I give my vote for Mr. Johnson to fill that great and arduous post. And I hereby declare, that I make a total surrender of all my rights and privileges in the English language, as a free-born British subject, to the said Mr. Johnson, during the term of his dictatorship. Nay, more; I will not only obey him like an old Roman, as my dictator, but, like a modern Roman, I will implicitly believe in him as my Pope, and hold him to be infallible while in the chair, but no longer. More than this he cannot well require; for, I presume that obedience can never be expected, when there is neither terror to enforce, nor interest to invite it." . . . .

"But a Grammar, a Dictionary, and a History of our language through its several stages, were still wanting at home, and importantly called for from abroad. Mr. Johnson's labours will now, I dare say, very fully supply that want, and greatly contribute to the further spreading of our language in other countries. Learners were discouraged, by finding no standard to resort to; and, consequently, thought it incapable of any. They will now be undeceived and encouraged."

This courtly device failed of its effect. Johnson, who thought that "all was false and hollow," despised the honied words, and was even indignant that Lord Chesterfield should, for a moment, imagine that he could be the dupe of such an artifice. His expression to me concerning Lord Chesterfield, upon this occasion, was, "Sir, after making great professions, he had, for many years, taken no notice of me; but when my Dictionary was coming out, he fell a scribbling in 'The World' about it. Upon which, I wrote him a letter, expressed in civil terms, but such as might show him that I did not mind what he said or wrote, and that I had done with him."

This is that celebrated letter of which so much has been said, and about which curiosity has been so long excited, without being gratified. I, for many years solicited Johnson to favour me with a copy of it, that so excellent a composition might not be lost to posterity. He delayed from time to time to give it me; till at last, in 1781, when we were on a visit at Mr. Dilley's, at Southhill in Bedfordshire, he was pleased to dictate it to me from memory. He afterwards found among his papers a copy of it, which he had dictated to Mr. Baretti, with its title and corrections, in his own handwriting. This he gave to Mr. Langton; adding, that if it were to come into print, he wished it to be from that copy. By Mr. Langton's kindness, I am enabled to enrich my work with a perfect transcript of what the world has so eagerly desired to see.

TO THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.

February 7, 1755.

"My Lord,—I have been lately informed, by the proprietor of 'The World,' that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your lordship. To be so distinguished, is an honour, which, being very little accustomed to favours from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

"When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address, and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre;"
— that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending; but I found my attendance so little encouraged, that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourteous scholar can possess. I had done all that I could; and no man was well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

"Seven years, my lord, have now past, since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door; during which time I have been pursuing my art through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and I have brought it, at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, 1 one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before.

"Is it not a patron, my lord, one who looks with uneasiness on a man struggling for life in the water, and when he has reached ground, euvemers him alive?—Dr. Johnson 3

"In the same case the owner of a garden, pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical aspersion not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should consider me as owing that to a patron, which Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

Remembered, that Johnson's introduction to Lord Chesterfield did not take place till his lordship was past fifty, and he was just then attacked by a disease which gradually estranged him from all society. The neglect lasted, it is charged, from 1748 to 1755; now, his private letters to his most intimate friends will prove that during that period Lord Chesterfield may be excused for not cultivating Johnson's society: — c. e. g. 28th Jan. 1748, "I know you are well acquainted with me, and will not think me impertinent in saying that from acknowledging your former letters," 30th June, 1752, "I am here in my hermitage, very deaf, and, consequently, more dependent on writing my ideas, than the world could, or would, ever understand. A letter in your hand would be much to me; but to have any new letter would make me ache. The world, if I may venture to say so, is a place which I have never understood, and I am not sure my mind is now so clear that I understand it. I am not sure which is the better place to be," 26th Jan. 1755. "My deafness is extremely increased, and daily increasing, and cuts me wholly off from the society of others, and my other complaints depair me the society of myself," 4 &c. &c. Johnson, perhaps, knew nothing of all this, and imagined that Lord Chesterfield declined his acquaintance on some opinion derogatory to his personal pretensions. Mr. Tyers, however, suggests a more precise and probable ground for Johnson's animosity than Boswell gives, by hinting that Johnson expected some pecuniary assistance from Lord Chesterfield. He says, "it does not appear that Lord Chesterfield showed any substantial proofs of appreciation of his lordship's letters, but not word alone please him." — Bosw. Sketch, p. 7. — Croker.

1 The following note is subjoined by Mr. Langton: — "Dr. Johnson is said to have written to his friend Mr. M. P. [Maitland?] that I would annex to it my information to me, that whereas it is said in the letter that 'no assistance has been received,' he did not receive from Lord Chesterfield the sum of ten pounds; but as that was so inconsiderable a sum, he thought the mention of it could not properly find a place in a letter of the kind."

But this surely is an insufficient excuse; for the sum, though not inconsiderable, was one which Johnson tells us, that Paul Whitehead, then his landlord, was ready to give him, if he could invent any new work: it was as much as Johnson himself had received for the copyright of his best poetical production; and when Dr. Maden, some years after, gave him the same sum for revising a work of his, Johnson said the Doctor "was very generous; for ten guineas was to me, at that time, a great sum," (see post, 1756;) and, as I suppose it was given when the "Plan" was submitted to Lord Chesterfield, it really was a not inconsiderable amount. At all events, when Johnson alleged against him such a trite as the waiting in his ante-room, he ought not to have omitted the pecuniary obligation on, even if it had been more inconsiderable. — Croker.

2 I confess I do not see the object, nor indeed the meaning, of this allusion. — Croker.

3 The remark that a very few useful purpose, have been earlier. Johnson may have felt, as Mr. Tyers intimates, that some other kind of notice was not taken, but "the notice his lordship sent" was written very well timed, and could not have come sooner. — Croker.

4 In this passage Dr. Johnson evidently alludes to the love of his wife. We find the same tender recollection recurring to his mind upon innumerable occasions; and, perhaps, no man ever more forcibly felt the truth of the sentiment so elegantly expressed by my friend Mr. Malms, in his prologue to Mr. Jephson's tragedy of "Julia": —

"Vain — wealth, and fame, and fortunate fostering care, If no lord bestow the splendid blessings share,
And, each day's bustling pageantry once past,
There, only there, our bliss is found at last." — Boswell.

5 Upon comparing this copy with that which Dr. Johnson dictated to me, from recollection, the variations are so slight, that this must be added to the many other proofs which he gave of the wonderful extent and accuracy of his memory.

6 Soon after Edwards's "Canons of Criticism" came out, Johnson was violently assailed by the inhabitants of the City of London. He thought that the "Canons" were only the "Reflections of the World," but not word alone please him." — Croker.

Thus it appears that Johnson was not satisfied with the conduct of his friends, and was not satisfied with himself, and that he was in perfect sympathy with the sentiments of his age.
Lord Chesterfield's fallacious patronage made him feel, he dismissed the word garret from the sad group, and in all the subsequent editions the line stands

"Toil, envy, want, the Patron, and the jail."

That Lord Chesterfield must have been mortified by the lofty contempt, and polite, yet keen, satire with which Johnson exhibited him to himself in this letter, it is impossible to doubt. He, however, with that glossy duplicity which was his constant study, affected to be quite unconcerned. Dr. Adams mentioned to Mr. Robert Dodsley that he was sorry Johnson had written his letter to Lord Chesterfield. Dodsley, with the true feelings of trade, said, "he was very sorry too; for that he had a property in the Dictionary, to which his lordship's patronage might have been of consequence." He then told Dr. Adams, that Lord Chesterfield had shown him the letter. "I should have imagined," (replied Dr. Adams) "that Lord Chesterfield would have concealed it." "Poh! (said Dodsley), do you think a letter from Johnson could hurt Lord Chesterfield? Not at all, sir. It lay upon his table, where any body might see it. He read it to me; said, 'This man has great powers,' pointed out the severest passages, and observed how well they were expressed." This air of indifference, which imposed upon the worthy Dodsley, was certainly nothing but a specimen of that dissimulation which Lord Chesterfield inculcated as one of the most essential lessons for the conduct of life. His lordship endeavoured to justify himself to Dodsley from the charges brought against him by Johnson; but we may judge from the flimsiness of his defence, from his having excused his neglect of Johnson, by saying, that "he had heard he had changed his lodgings, and did not know where he lived;" as if there could have been the smallest difficulty to inform himself of that circumstance, by inquiring in the literary circle with which his lordship was well acquainted, and was, indeed, himself, one of its ornaments.

Dr. Adams expostulated with Johnson, and suggested, that his not being admitted when he called on him, was probably not to be imputed to Lord Chesterfield; for his lordship had declared to Dodsley, that "he would have turned off the best servant he ever had, if he had known that he denied him to a man who would have been always more than welcome;" and in confirmation of this, he insisted on Lord Chesterfield's general affability and easiness of access, especially to literary men. "Sir, (said Johnson) that is not Lord Chesterfield; he is the proudest man this day existing." — "No, (said Dr. Adams) there is one person, at least, as proud; I think, by your own account, you are the prouder man of the two." — "But mine (replied Johnson instantly) was defensive pride." This, as Dr. Adams well observed, was one of those happy turns for which he was so remarkably ready.

Johnson having now explicitly avowed his opinion of Lord Chesterfield, did not refrain from expressing himself concerning that nobleman with pointed freedom: "This man, (said he) I thought, had been a lord among wits: but, I find, he is only a wit among lords!" And when his Letters to his natural son were published, he observed, that "they teach the morals of a whore, and the manners of a dancing master." 3

The character of a "respectable Hottentot," in Lord Chesterfield's Letters, has been generally understood to be meant for Johnson, and I have no doubt that it was. But I remember when the Literary Property of those letters was contested in the court of session in Scotland, and Mr. Henry Dundas 4, one of the counsel for the proprietors, read this character as an exhibition of Johnson, Sir David Dalrymple, Lord Hailes, one of the judges, maintained, with some warmth, that it was not intended as a portrait of Johnson, but of a

1 Why? If, as may have been the case, Lord Chesterfield felt that Johnson was unjust towards him, he would not have been mortified — It n'y a que la vérité qui blesse. By Mr. Boswell's own confession, it appears that Johnson did not give copies of this letter; that for many years Boswell had in vain solicited him to do so, and that he, after the lapse of twenty years, did so reluctantly. With all these admissions, how can Mr. Boswell attribute to anything but the magnanimity (if I may so say) of good taste and conscious rectitude, Lord Chesterfield's exposure of a letter which the relenting, if not repenting, author was so willing to bury in oblivion? — Croker.

2 This, like all the rest of the affair, seems discoloured by prejudice. Lord Chesterfield made no attack on Johnson, who certainly acted on the offensive, and not the defensive. — Croker.

3 That collection of letters cannot be vindicated from the serious charge of encouraging, in some passages, one of the vices most destructive to the good order and comfort of society, which his lordship represents as more fashionable guilt than good, in others, of inculcating the base practice of dissimulation, and recommending, with disproportionate anxiety, a perpetual attention to external elegance of manners. But it must, at the same time, be allowed, that they contain many good precepts of conduct, and much genuine information upon life and manners, very happily expressed; and that there was considerable merit in paying so much attention to the improvement of one who was dependent upon his lordship's protection; it has, probably, been exceeded in no instance by the most exemplary parent; and though I can by no means approve of confounding the distinction between lawful and illicit offspring, which is, in effect, insulting the civil establishment of our country, to look no higher; I cannot help thinking that it was to be kind not to attend to those of whose existence we have, in any way, been the cause. Mr. Stanhope's character has been unjustly represented as diametrically opposite to what Lord Chesterfield wished him to be. He has been called dull, gross, and awkward; but I knew him at Dresden, when he was envoy to that court; and though he could not boast of the grace, he was, in truth, a sensible, civil, well-behaved man. — Boswell.

4 In judging of Lord Chesterfield's letters. It should be re-collected that they were never intended for publication, and were written only to meet a private, particular, and somewhat extraordinary case; and that it is hard that Lord Chesterfield should be held responsible for a publication which he never could have anticipated, — but see (post. May, 1773.) Johnson's more favourable, and just opinion of these letters, which, bating their lax morality, not palliated even by the peculiar circumstances under which they were written — and, if I will venture to say, masterpieces of good taste, good writing, and good sense. — Croker, 1846.

late noble lord distinguished for abstruse science. I have heard Johnson himself talk of the character, and say that it was meant for George Lord Lyttelton, in which I could by no means agree; for his lordship had nothing of that violence which is a conspicuous feature in the composition. Finding that my illustrious friend could bear to have it supposed that it might be meant for him, I said, laughingly, that there was one trait which unquestionably did not belong to him; "he throws his meat anywhere but down his throat."— "Sir, (said he) Lord Chesterfield never saw me eat in his life."2

On the 6th of March came out Lord Bolingbroke's works, published by Mr. David Mallet. The wild and pernicious ravings under the name of "Philosophy," which were thus ushered into the world, gave great offence to all well-principled men. Johnson, hearing of their tendency, which nobody disputed, was roused with a just indignation, and pronounced this memorable sentence upon the noble author and his editor:—"Sir, he was a scoundrel, and a coward: a scoundrel for charging a blunderbuss against religion and morality; a coward, because he had not resolution to fire it off himself, but left half-a-crown to a beggarly Scotchman, to draw the trigger after his death!"3 Garrick, who, I can attest from my own knowledge, had his mind seasoned with pious reverence, and sincerely disapproved of the infidel writings of several whom in the course of his almost universal gay intercourse with men of eminence he treated with external civility, distinguished himself upon this occasion. Mr. Pelham having died on the very day on which Lord Bolingbroke's works came out, he wrote an elegant Ode on his death, beginning

"Let others hail the rising sun,
I bow to that whose course is run;"4 in which is the following stanza:

"The same sad morn, to Church and State
(So for our sins 't was fix'd by Fate)
A double stroke was given;
Black as the whirlwinds of the North,
St. John's fell genius issued forth,
And Pelham's fell to heaven."5

1 Probably George, second Earl of Macclesfield, who published, in 1734, a learned pamphlet on the alteration of the style, and was, in 1732, elected President of the Royal Society. Lord Macclesfield's manner was, no doubt, awkward and embarrassed, but little else in his character resembles that of the "respectable Hottenot," which much more probably was, as the world supposed, intended for Johnson. — CROKER.

2 Nor did we — and yet we know that Lord Chesterfield's picture, if meant for Johnson, was not overcharged; for what between his blindness, his nervousness, and his eagerness, all his friends describe his mode of eating to have been something worse than awkward. See post, August 8th, 1753. — CROKER.

3 See post, March 1750, where Johnson admits that he had not read this book. — CROKER.

4 It was the first remarkable phrase which Mr. Murphy ever heard him utter. — CROKER.

5 Mallet's wife, a foolish and conceited woman, one evening introduced herself to David Hume, at an assembly, saying, "We deists, Mr. Hume, should know one another." Hume was exceedingly displeased and disconcerted, and replied, "Madam, I am no deist; I do not so style myself, neither do I desire to be known by that appellation." — Hardy's Life of Lord Chalrton, vol. i. p. 235. Boswell himself tells the same story in his Hypochondriae. This imputation would, even on mere worldly grounds, be very disagreeable to Hume: for I have in my possession proof that when Lord Hertford (whose secretary, in his embassy to Paris, Hume had been) was appointed Lieutenant of Ireland, his lordship declined continuing him in the same character, alleging as a reason the dissatisfaction that it would excite on account of Hume's anti-religious principles. — CROKER.

When Johnson came to Oxford in 1754, the long vacation was beginning, and most people were leaving the place. This was the first time of his being there, after quitting the University. The next morning after his arrival, he wished to see his old college, Pembroke. I went with him. He was highly pleased to find all the college-servants which he had left there still remaining, particularly a very old butler; and expressed great satisfaction at being recognised by them and entertained with them familiarly. He waited on the master, Dr. Radcliffe, who received him very coldly. Johnson at least expected that the master would order a copy of his Dictionary, now near publication; but the master did not choose to talk on the subject, never asked Johnson to dine, nor even to visit him, while he staid at Oxford. After we had left the lodgings, Johnson said to me, 'There lives a man, who lives by the revenues of literature, and will not move a finger to support it.' If I come to live at Oxford, I shall take up my abode at Trinity.' 4 We then called on the Rev. Mr. Meckie, one of the fellows, and of Johnson's standing. Here was a most cordial greeting on both sides. On leaving him, Johnson said, 'I used to think Meckie had excellent parts, when we were boys together at the college: but, alas!''

' I remember, at the classical lecture in the Hall, I could not bear Meckie's superiority, and I tried to sit as far from him as I could, that I might not hear him construe.'

'As we were leaving the college, he said, 'Here I translated Pope's Messiah. Which do you think is the best line in it? — My own favourite is,' Votis aromaticas fundit Saronis nubes.

I told him, I thought it a very sonorous hexameter. I did not tell him, it was not in the Virgilian style. He much regretted that his _first_ tutor was dead; for whom he seemed to retain the greatest regard. He said, 'I once had been a whole morning sliding in Christ-Church meadows, and missed his lecture in logic. After dinner he sent for me to his room. I expected a sharp reproof for my idleness, and went with a beating heart.' 5 When we were seated, he told me he had sent for me to drink a glass of wine with him, and to tell me, he was not angry with me for missing his lecture. This was, in fact, a most severe reprimand. Some more of the boys were then sent for, and we spent a very pleasant afternoon.' Besides Mr. Meckie, there was only one other fellow of Pembroke now resident: from both of whom Johnson received the greatest civilities during this visit, and they pressed him very much to have a room in the college.

In the course of this visit Johnson and I walked three or four times to Ellsfield, a village beautifully situated about three miles from Oxford, to see Mr. [Francis] Wise, Radelilvan librarian, with whom Johnson was much pleased. At this place, Mr. Wise had fitted up a house and gardens, in a singular manner, but with great taste. Here was an excellent library, particularly a valuable collection of books in Northern literature, with which Johnson was often very busy. One day Mr. Wise 6 read to us a dissertation which he was preparing for the press, intitled 'A History and Chronology of the Fabulous Ages,' Some old divinities of Thrace, related to the Titans, and called the Cabiri, made a very important part of the theory of this piece; and in conversation after- wards, Mr. Wise talked much of his Cabiri. As we returned, we walked in the open air with Johnson, and he cried out Sufflamina, a Latin word which came from his mouth with peculiar grace, and was as much as to say, Put on your drag chain. Before we got home, I again walked too fast for him; and he now cried out, 'Why, you walk as if you were pursued by all the Cabiri in a body.' In an evening we frequently took long walks from Oxford into the country, returning to supper. Once, in our way home, we viewed the ruins of the abbey of Osney and Rewley, near Oxford. After at least half an hour's silence, Johnson said, 'I must beg the Vicar to move the Whigs. We had then a long conversation on Gothic build- ings; and in talking of the form of old halls, he said, 'In these halls, the fire-place was anciently always in the middle of the room, till the Whigs removed it on one side.' About this time there had been an execution of two or three criminals at Oxford on a Monday. Soon afterwards, one day at dinner, I was saying that Mr. Swinton, the chaplain of the gaol, 7 and also a frequent preacher before the university, a learned man, but often thoughtless and absent, preached the condemnation sermon on their execution, before the convicts, on the preceding day. Johnson then told his audience, that he should give them the remainder of what he had to say on the subject the next Lord's Day. Upon which, one of our company, a doctor of divinity, and a plain matter-of-fact man, by way of offering an apology for Mr, Swinton, greatly remarked, that he had probably preached the same sermon before the university: "Yes, Sir (says Johnson), but the university were not to be hanged the next morning.

"I forgot to observe before, that when he left Mr. Meeke, as I have told above,) he added, "About the same time of life, Meeke was left behind at Oxford to feed on a fellowship, and I went to London to get my living: now, Sir, see the difference of our literary characters!"

The following letter was written by Dr. Johnson to Mr. Chambers, of Lincoln College, afterwards Sir Robert Chambers, one of the judges in India:

JOHN TO CHAMBERS.

"London, Nov. 21, 1754.

"DEAR SIR,—The commission which I delayed to trouble you with at your departure, I am now obliged to send you; and beg that you will be so kind as to carry it to Mr. Warton, of Trinity, to whom I should have written immediately, but that I know not if he be yet come back to Oxford.

"In the catalogue of MSS. of Gr. Brit., see vol. i. page 18. MSS. Bodl. Martyrium xv. martyrum sub Juliano, actuare Theophylocto.

"It is desired that Mr. Warton will inquire, and send word, what will be the cost of transcribing this manuscript.

"He is desired to tell what is the age of each of these manuscripts; and what it will cost to have a transcript of the two first pages of each.

"If Mr. Warton be not in Oxford, you may try if you can get it done by any body else; or stay till he comes, according to your own convenience. It is for an Italian litterato.

"The answer is to be directed to his Excellency, Mr. Zon, Venetian Resident, Soho Square.

"I hope, dear Sir, that you do not regret the change of London for Oxford. Mr. Baretti is well, and Miss Williams; and we shall all be glad to hear from you, whenever you shall be so kind as to write to Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

The degree of Master of Arts, which, it has been observed, could not be obtained for him at an early period of his life, was now considered as an honour of considerable importance, in order to grace the title-page of his Dictionary; and his character in the literary world being by this time deservedly high, his friends thought that, if proper exertions were made, the University of Oxford would pay him the compliment.

JOHN TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] Nov. 28, 1754.

"DEAR SIR,—I am extremely obliged to you and to Mr. Wise, for the uncommon care which you have taken of my interest 2; if you can accomplish your kind design, I shall certainly take me a little habituation among you.

"The books which I promised to Mr. Wise, I have not been yet able to procure: but I shall send him a Finnick Dictionary, the only copy, perhaps, in England, which was presented me by a learned Swede: but I keep it back, that it may make a set of my own books 4 of the new edition, with which I shall accompany it, more welcome. You will assure him of my gratitude.

"Poor dear Collins 3! Would a letter give him any pleasure? I have a mind to write.

"I am glad of your bindence in your Spenserian design 6, yet I would not have it delayed. Three hours a day stolen from sleep and amusement will produce it. Let a Scvicour 7 transcribe the quotations, and interleave them with references, to save time. This will shorten the work, and lessen the fatigue.

"Can I do any thing to promoting the diploma? I would not be wanting to co-operate with your kindness; of which whatever be the effect, I shall be, dear Sir, your most obliged, &c.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHN TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] Dec. 21, 1754.

"DEAR SIR,—I am extremely sensible of the favour done me, both by Mr. Wise and yourself. The book 8 cannot, I think, be printed in less than six weeks, nor probably so soon; and I will keep back the title-page for such an insertion as you seem to promise me. Be pleased to let me know what money I shall send you, for bearing the expense of the affair [of the degree]; and I will take care that you may have it ready at your hand.

1 Curtis accrua mortal is. Poverty was the stimulus which made Johnson exert a genius naturally, it may be supposed, more vigorous than Meeke's, and he was now beginning to enjoy the fame, of which so many years of painful distress and penury had laid the foundation. Meeke had lived an easy life of decent competence; and on the whole, perhaps, as little envied Johnson, as Johnson him: the goodness and justice of Providence equalised, to a degree not always visible at first sight, the happiness of mankind — see esti malo qui matut moribus, et meliora fecit. — C. 1531. Meeke died about September, 1754. His death was followed by a curious incident. Horace Walpole, in one of his curiosity—hunts, intending to visit a Sir Thomas Reeves, was misdirected to poor Meeke's parsonage, where he arrived soon after his decease, and was surprised to find the house shut up, and to be told "the gentleman had suddenly died." He drove away believing that Sir Thomas was no more. See letter to Montagu, 3 Oct., 1753. Croker.

2 Sir Robert Chambers was born in 1737, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and educated at the same school with Lord Stowell.

3 His Dictionary. — Warton.

4 Of publishing a volume of observations on Spenser. It was hindered by my taking pupils in this College. — Warton.

5 Sir Robert Chambers was born in 1737, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and educated at the same school with Lord Stowell.

7 The Rambler. — Croker.

8 Collins (the poet) was at this time at Oxford, on a visit to Mr. Warton; but labouring under the most deplorable languor of body, and dejection of mind. — Warton. He was the son of a hatter in Chichester; born in 1720, and died there 1750. — Croker.
"I had lately the favour of a letter from your brother, with some account of poor Collins, for whom I am much concerned. I have a notion, that by very great temperance, or more properly abstinence, he may yet recover.

"There is an old English and Latin book of poems by Barclay, called "The Ship of Fools"; at the end of which are a number of Epigrams,—so he writes it, from Epicurean,—which are probably the first in our language. If you cannot find the book, I will get Mr. Dodsley to send it you.

"I shall be extremely glad to hear from you soon, to know if the affair proceeds. I have mentioned it to none of my friends, for fear of being laughed at for my disappointment.

"You know poor Mr. Dodsley has lost his wife; I believe he is much affected. I hope he will not suffer so much as I yet suffer for the loss of mine.

Ομοι τι δ' ομοι; θυητα γάρ πεπόθαμεν. 1

I have ever since seemed to myself broken off from mankind; a kind of solitary wanderer in the wild of life, without any direction, or fixed point of view; a gloomy gazer on the world, to which I have little relation. Yet I would endeavour, by the help of you and your brother, to supply the want of closer union by friendship; and hope to have long the pleasure of being, dear Sir, most affectionately yours,

SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO JOSEPH WARTON.

"Dear Sir,—I am sat down to answer your kind letter, though I know not whether I shall direct it so as that it may reach you; the miscarriage of it will be no great matter, as I have nothing to send but thanks, of which I owe you many; yet, if a few should be lost, I shall amply find them in my own mind; and professions of respect, of which the profession will easily be renewed while the respect continues: and the same causes which first produced can hardly fail to preserve it. Pray let me know, however, whether my letter finds its way to you.

"Poor dear Collins! 2—Let me know whether you think it would give him pleasure if I should write to him. I have often been near his state, and therefore have it in great commiseration.

"I sincerely wish you the usual pleasures of this joyous season, and more than the usual pleasures, those of contemplation on the great event which this festival commemorates. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate and most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

CHAPTER XII.

1755—1758.

In 1755 we beheld him to great advantage; his degree of Master of Arts conferred upon him, his Dictionary published, his correspondence animated, his benevolence exercised.

JOHN TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] Feb. 1. 1755.

"Dear Sir,—I wrote to you some weeks ago, but believe did not direct accurately, and therefore know not whether you had my letter. I would, likewise, write to your brother, but know not where to find him. I now begin to see land, after having wandered, according to Mr. Warburton's phrase, in this vast sea of words. What reception I shall meet with on the shore, I know not: whether the sound of bells, and acclamations of the people, which Ariosto talks of in his last Canto, 2 or a general murmur of dislike, I know not: whether I shall find upon the coast a Calypso that will court, or a Polyphem that will eat me. But if Polyphem comes, have at his eye. I hope, however, the critics will let me be at peace; for though I do not much fear their skill and strength, I am a little afraid of myself, and would not willingly fed so much ill-will in my bosom as literary quarrels are apt to excite.

"Mr. Baretto is about a work for which he is in great want of Crescimbeni, which you may have again when you please.

"There is nothing considerable done or doing among us here. We are not, perhaps, as innocent as villagers, but most of us seem to be so idle. I hope, however, you are busy; and should be glad to know what you are doing. I am, dearest Sir, your humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] Feb. 4. 1755.

"Dear Sir,—I received your letter this day, with great sense of the favour that has been done me; 3 for which I return my most sincere thanks: and entreat you to pay to Mr. Wise such returns as I ought to make for so much kindness so little deserved.

1 This verse is from the long-lost Bellerophon, a tragedy by Euripides. It is preserved by Suidas. — Charles Burney. The meaning is, "Alas! but why should I say alas? we have only suffered the common lot of mortality!" It was the habitual exclamation of the philosopher Crantor. — Croker.

3 His degree had now past the suffrages of the heads of colleges; but was not yet finally granted by the university: it was carried without a dissentient voice. — Warton.
JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"Dear Sir,—I had a letter last week from Mr. Wise, but have yet heard nothing from you, nor know in what state my little affair stands; of which I beg you to inform me, if you can, tomorrow by the return of the post. Mr. Wise sends me word, that he has not had the Finnick Lexicon yet, which I sent some time ago; and if he has it not, you must inquire after it. However, do not let your letter stay for that.

"Your brother, who is a better correspondent than you, and not much better, sends me word, that your pupils keep you in College: do but keep them from writing too. Let them at least give you time to write to, dear Sir, your most affectionate friend, &c.,

3 Principal of Saint Mary Hall, at Oxford. He brought with him the diploma from Oxford.—Warton. Dr. William King was born in 1695; entered of Hall 1701 D. C. L., 1715; and Principal of Saint Mary Hall in 1718. In 1722, he was a candidate for the representation of the university in parliament, on the Tory interest; but was defeated. He was a wit and a scholar, and, in particular, celebrated for his infatuity; highly obnoxious to the Hano-verian party, and the idol of the Jacobites. It appears from his Anecdotes of his own Times, published in 1819, that he was one of those intrusted with the knowledge of the Pre-tender's being in London in the latter end of the reign of George the Second, where Dr. King was introduced to him. His Memoirs say, in 1759; but this is supposed to be an error of the press or transcript for 1758. He died in 1763.—Croker.

JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] March 20, 1755.

"Dear Sir,—After I received my diploma, I wrote you a letter of thanks, with a letter to the Vice-Chancellor, and sent another to Mr. Wise; but have heard from nobody since, and begin to think myself forgotten. It is true, I sent you a double letter, and you may fear an expensive correspondent; but I would have taken it kindly, if you had returned it treble; and what is a double letter to a petty king, that having Fellowship and Finder's fees, can sleep without a Modus in his head.

"Dear Mr. Warton, let me hear from you, and tell me something, I care not what, so I hear it but from you. Something, I will tell you:- I hope to see my Dictionary bound and lettered, next week; — vasta mole superbus. And I have a great mind to come to Oxford at Easter; but you will not invite me. Shall I come uninvited, or stay here where nobody perhaps would miss me if I went? A hard choice! But such is the world to, dear Sir, yours, &c.

JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] March 20, 1755.

"Dear Sir,—Though not to write, when a man can write so well, is an offence sufficiently

1 We may conceive what a high gratification it must have been to Johnson to receive his diploma from the hands of the great Dr. King, whose principles were so congenial with his own. — Boswell.

2 These fellowships are pretty things; — We live indeed like petty kings, and every night I went to bed, without a Mops in my head. — Warton's Progress of Discontent.

3 The following extract of a letter from Thomas Warton to his brother will show his first sentiments on this great work: — "The Dictionary is arrived; the preface is noble. There is a grammar prefixed, and the history of the language ispretty full; but you may plainly perceive strokes of latinity and babulense. They are two most unread volumes. I have written him an invitation. I fear his preface will disgust, by the expressions of his consciousness of superiority, and of his contempt of patronage. The Rawlinson benefaction won't do for Johnson, which is this — a professorship of 80l. per annum, which is not to take place for four years; a fellowship to Hertford College, which is too ample for them to receive agreeably to Newton's statutes; and a fellowship to St. John's College, Neither of the last are to take place these forty years." By the Rawlinson benefaction, Dr. Hall understood the Anglian Project of the Rawlinson benefaction, which was founded in 1750, but did not take effect before 1786. — Croker.

4 Matthew Maty, M. D. and F. R. S., was born in Holland in 1718, and educated at Leyden, but he came in 1740 to settle in England. He became secretary to the Royal Society in 1728, and in 1772, principal librarian of the British Museum. Maty being the friend and admirer of Lord Chesterfield, whose works he afterwards published, would, as Dr. Hall observes, particularly at this period, have little recommendation to the good opinion of the lexicographer; but his Journal Britannicum is mentioned by Mr. Gibbon in a tone very different from Dr. Johnson's. This humble though useful labour, which had once been dignified by the genius of Hakluyt, the learning of Le Sueur, the discernment of Dr. Johnson, by the taste, the knowledge, and the judgment of Maty. His style is pure and eloquent, and in his virtues he may be reckoned among the most detached of the school of Fontenelle. — Gibbon's Miscellaneous Works. Dr. Maty died in 1776. — Croker.

Dr. Adams told me, that this scheme of a "Bibliothèque" was a serious one; for upon his visiting him one day, he found his parlor floor covered with parcels of foreign and English literary journals, and he told Dr. Adams he meant to undertake a Review. "How, Sir, (said Dr. Adams,) can you think of doing it alone? All branches of knowledge must be considered in it. Do you know Mathematics? Do you know Natural History?" Johnson answered, "Why, Sir, I must do as well as I can." The chief purpose is to give my countrymen a view of what is doing in literature upon the continent; and I shall have, in a good measure, the choice of my subject, for I shall select such books as I best understand." Dr. Adams suggested, that as Dr. Maty had just then finished his "Bibliothèque Britannique," which was a well-executed work, giving foreigners an account of British publications, it might, with great advantage, assume him as an assistant. "He, (said Johnson) the little black dog! I'd throw him into the Thames." The scheme, however, was dropped.

In one of his little memorandum books I find the following hints for his intended Review or Literary Journal; "The Annals of Literature, foreign as well as domestic. Initiate

"Sir, — I have sent some parts of my Dictionary, such as were at hand, for your inspection. The favour which I beg is, that if you do not like them, you will say nothing. I am, Sir, your most affectionate humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON.”

BIRCH TO JOHNSON.

"Sir, — The part of your Dictionary which you have favoured me with the sight of has given me such an idea of the whole, that I must sincerely congratulate the public upon the acquisition of a work long wanted, and now executed with an industry, accuracy, and judgment, equal to the importance of the subject. You might, perhaps, have chosen one in which your genius would have appeared to more advantage, but you could not have fixed upon any other in which your labours would have done such substantial service to the present age and to posterity. I am glad that your health has supported the application necessary to the performance of so vast a task; and can undertake to promise you as one (though perhaps the only) reward of it, the approbation and thanks of every well-wisher to the honour of the English language. I am, with the greatest regard, Sir, your most faithful and most affectionate humble servant, "Tho. Birch.”

Mr. Charles Burney, who has since distinguished himself so much in the science of music, and obtained a Doctor’s degree from the University of Oxford, had been driven from the capital by bad health, and was now residing at Lynne Regis in Norfolk. He had been so much delighted with Johnson’s "Rambler,” and the plan of his Dictionary, that when the great work was announced in the newspapers as nearly finished, he wrote to Dr. Johnson, begging to be informed when and in what manner his Dictionary would be published; intreating, if it should be by subscription, or he should have any books at his own disposal, to be favoured with six copies for himself and friends.

In answer to this application, Dr. Johnson wrote the following letter, of which (to use Dr. Burney’s own words) “if it be remembered that it was written to an obscure young man, who at this time had not much distinguished himself even in his own profession, but whose name could never have reached the author of 'The Rambler,’ the politeness and urbanity may be opposed to some of the stories which have been lately circulated of Dr. Johnson’s natural rudeness and ferocity.”

JOHNSON TO BURNEY,

“Grove Square, Fleet Street, April 8, 1755.

"Sir, — If you imagine that by delaying my answer I intended to shew any neglect of the notice with which you have favoured me, you will neither think justly of yourself nor of me. Your civilities were offered with too much elegance not to engage attention; and I have too much pleasure in pleasing men like you, not to feel very sensibly the distinction which you have bestowed upon me.

"Few consequences of my endeavours to please or to benefit mankind have delighted me more than your friendship thus voluntarily offered, which now I have it I hope to keep, because I hope to continue to deserve it.

"I have no Dictionaries to dispose of for myself, but shall be glad to have you direct your friends to Mr. Dodsley, because it was by his recommendation that I was employed in the work.

"When you have leisure to think again upon me let me be favoured with another letter; and another yet, when you have looked into my Dictionary. If you find faults, I shall endeavour to mend them; if you find none, I shall think you blinded by kind partiality: but to have made you partial in his favour, will very much gratify the ambition of Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,

Mr. Andrew Millar, bookseller in the Strand, took the principal charge of conducting the publication of Johnson’s Dictionary; and as the patience of the proprietors was repeatedly tried and almost exhausted, by their expecting that the work would be completed within the time which Johnson had sanguinely supposed, the learned author was often goaded to dispatch, more especially as he had received all the copy-money, by different drafts, a considerable time before he had finished his task. When the messenger who carried the last sheet to Millar returned, Johnson asked him, “Well, what did he say?” — Sir, (answered the messenger) he said, ‘Thank God, I have done with him.’ ” “I am glad (replied Johnson, with a smile,) that he thanks God for any thing.” It is remarkable, that those with whom Johnson chiefly contracted for his literary labours were Scotchmen, Mr. Millar and Mr. Strahan. Millar, though himself no great judge of literature, had good sense enough to have for his friends very able men to give him their opinion and advice in the purchase of copyright; the consequence of which was his acquiring a very large fortune, with great liberality. Johnson said of him, “I respect Millar, Sir; he has raised the price of literature.” The same praise may be justly given to Panckoucke, the eminent bookseller of Paris. Mr. Strahan’s

1 Sir John Hawkins, p. 341., inserts two notes as having passed formerly between Andrew Millar and Johnson, to the above effect. I am assured this was not the case. In the way of incidental remark it was a pleasant play of raillery.

JOHN TO MR. LANGTON.

At Langton, Lincolnshire.

"May 6, 1755.

Sir,—It has been long observed, that men do not suspect faults which they do not commit; your own elegance of manners, and punctuality of complaisance, did not suffer you to impute to me that negligence of which I was guilty, and I have not since atoned. I received both your letters, and received them with pleasure proportionate to the esteem which so short an acquaintance strongly impressed, and which I hope to confirm by nearer knowledge, though I am afraid that gratification will be for a time withheld.

"I have, indeed, published my book, 1 of which I beg to know your father's judgment, and yours; and I have now staid long enough to watch its progress in the world. It has, you see, no patron, and, I think, has yet had no opponents, except the critics of the coffee-house, whose outcries are soon dispersed into the air, and are thought on no more: from this, therefore, I am at liberty, and think of taking the opportunity of this interval to make an excursion, and why not then into Lincolnshire? or, to mention a stronger attraction, why not to dear Mr. Langton? I will give the true reason, which I know you will approve:—I have a mother more than eighty years old, who has counted the days to the publication of my book, in hopes of seeing me; and to her, if I can disengage myself here, I resolve to go. 2

"As I know, dear Sir, that to delay my visit for a reason like this, will not deprive me of your esteem, I beg it may not lessen your kindness. I have very seldom received an offer of friendship which I so earnestly desire to cultivate and mature. I shall rejoice to hear from you, till I can see you, and will see you as soon as I can; for when the duty that calls me to Liefield is discharged, my inclination will carry me to Langton. I shall delight to hear the ocean roar, 3 or see the stars twinkle, in the company of men to whom Nature does not spread her volumes or utter her voice in vain.

"Do not, dear Sir, make the slowness of this letter a precedent for delay, or imagine that I approve the inceivility that I have committed; for I have known you enough to love you, and sincerely to wish a further knowledge; and I assure you, once more, that to live in a house that contains such a father and such a son, will be accounted a very uncommon degree of pleasure, by, dear Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,

JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] June 24. 1755.

"Dear Sir,—To talk of coming to you, and not yet to come, has an air of trifling which I would not willingly have among you; and which, I believe, you will not willingly impute to me, when I have told you, that since my promise, two of our partners 1 are dead, and that I was solicited to suspend my excursion till we could recover from our confusion.

"I have not laid aside my purpose; for every day makes me more impatient of staying from you. But death, you know, hears not supplications, nor pays any regard to the convenience of mortals. I hope now to see you next week; but next week is but another name for to-morrow, which has been noted for promising and deceiving. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"[London.] Aug. 7. 1755.

"Dear Sir,—I told you that among the manuscripts are some things of Sir Thomas More. I beg you to pass an hour in looking on them, and procure a transcript of the ten or twenty first lines of each, to be compared with what I have; that I may know whether they are yet published. The manuscripts are these:

"If you procure the young gentleman in the library to write out what you think fit to be written, I will send to Mr. Prince the bookseller to pay him what you shall think proper. Be pleased to make my compliments to Mr. Wise, and all my friends. I am, Sir, your affectionate, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

The Dictionary, with a Grammar and History of the English Language, being now at length published, in two volumes folio 2, the world contemplated with wonder so stupendous a work achieved by one man, while other countries had thought such undertakings fit only for whole academies. Vast as his powers were, I cannot but think that his imagination deceived him, when he supposed that by constant application he might have performed the task in three years. Let the Preface be attentively perused, in which is given, in a clear, strong, and glowing style, a comprehensive, yet particular view of what he had done; and it will be evident that the time he employed upon it was comparatively short. I am unwilling to swell my book with long quotations from what is in everybody's hands, and I believe there are few prose compositions in the English language that are read with more delight, or are more familiar, than that preliminary discourse. One of its excellences has always struck me with peculiar admiration; I mean the perspicuity with which he has expressed abstract scientific notions. As an instance of this, I shall quote the following sentence: "When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their own nature collateral?" 3 We have here an example of what has been often said, and I believe with justice, that there is for every thought a certain nice adaptation of words which none other could equal, and which when a man has been so fortunate as to hit, he has attained, in that particular case, the perfection of language.

The extensive reading which was absolutely necessary for the accumulation of authorities, and which alone may account for Johnson's retentive mind being enriched with a very large and various store of knowledge and imagery, must have occupied several years. The Preface furnishes an eminent instance of a double talent, of which Johnson was fully conscious. Sir Joshua Reynolds heard him say, "There are two things which I am confident I can do very well: one is an introduction to any literary work, stating what it is to contain, and how it should be executed in the most perfect manner; the other is a conclusion, showing from various causes why the execution has not been equal to what the author promised to himself and to the public."

How should puny scribblers be abashed and disappointed, when they find him displaying a perfect theory of lexicographical excellence, yet at the same time candidly and modestly allowing that he "had not satisfied his own expectations." Here was a fair occasion for the exercise of Johnson's modesty, when he was called upon to compare his own arduous performance, not with those of other individuals, (in which case his inflexible regard to truth would have been violated had he affected dilufence,) but with speculative men who, he who can outstrip all his competitors in the race, may yet be sensible of his deficiency.

2 It came out on the 15th April, 1755 — price £4 10s. bound. There have been several editions in two volumes, folio and quarto; and in 1818, a largely augmented, but not proportionally improved, edition was published by Mr. Todd in four volumes quarto. It is to be hoped that, in any future edition, on 3 I confess that I cannot join in Mr. Boswell's opinion of the perspicuity of this passage. I do not understand it; and is there not something like a contradiction in terms? Can parallels be accurately said to branch out? — CROKER.

when he runs against time. Well might he say, that "the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned;" for he told me, that the only aid which he received was a paper containing twenty etymologies, sent to him by a person then unknown, who he was afterwards informed was Dr. Pearce,1 Bishop of Rochester. The etymologies, though they exhibit learning and judgment, are not, I think, entitled to the first prize amongst the various parts of this immense work. The definitions have always appeared to me such astonishing proofs of acuteness of intellect and precision of language, as indicate a genius of the highest rank. This it is which marks the superior excellence of Johnson's Dictionary over others equally or even more voluminous, and must have made it a work of much greater mental labour than mere Lexicons, or Word-Books, as the Dutch call them. They, who will make the experiment of trying how they can define a few words of whatever nature, will soon be satisfied of the unquestionable justice of this observation, which I can assure my readers is founded upon much study, and upon communication with more minds than my own.

A few of his definitions must be admitted to be erroneous. Thus, Windsor and Leeeward, though directly of opposite meaning, are defined identically the same way ["toward the wind"]; as to which inconsiderable specks it is enough to observe, that his Preface announces that he was aware that there might be many such in so immense a work; nor was he at all discoverted when an instance was pointed out to him.2 A lady once asked him how he came to define Patern the knee of a horse; instead of making an elaborate defence, as she expected, he at once answered, "Ignorance, Madam, pure ignorance." His definition of Network [any thing reticulated or dussedated at equal distances, with interstices between the intersections"] 3 has been often quoted with sportive malignity, as obscuring a thing in itself very plain. But to these frivolous censure no other answer is necessary than that with which we are furnished by his own Preface:

"To explain, requires the use of terms less abstruse than that which is to be explained, and such terms cannot always be found. For, as nothing can be proved but by supposing something intuitively known, and evident without proof, so nothing can be defined but by the use of words too plain to admit of definition. Sometimes easy words are changed into harder, as, burial, into sepulture or interment; dry, into desiccative; dryness, into sicilly, or aridity; fit, into paroxysm; for the easiest word, whatever it be, can never be translated into one more easy."

His introducing his own opinions, and even prejudices, under general definitions of words, while at the same time the original meaning of the words is not explained, as his

1 Zachary Pearce, born in 1650, was the son of a distiller in High Holborn: he was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and became Bishop of Rochester in 1756. He died June 29. 1774. See post, under 19th May, 1777. — Chorke.

2 He owns in his Preface the deficiency of the technical part of his work; and he said, he should be much obliged to me for definitions of musical terms for his next edition, which he did not live to superintend. — Burney.

3 Boswell, probably out of tenderness to Johnson, did not give the obvious definitions; which I have afforded as a necessary explanation, and to save my readers the trouble of hunting for them in the old editions; — for Mr. Todd has, unjustifiably as I think, obliterated some and altered others. — Chorke.

4 The Commissioners of Excise, being offended by this severe reflection, consulted Mr. Murray, then Attorney-General, to know whether redress could not be obtained. I wished to have procured for my readers a copy of the opinion which he gave, and which may now be justly considered as historical; but I have been too prudent to have the board not to prosecute. Johnson never made the smallest alteration in this passage. And he still retained his early prejudice against Excise; for in "The Idler," No. 62., there is the following very extraordinary paragraph: "The authenticity of Clarendon's History, though printed with the sanction of one of the first universities of the world, had not an unexpected manuscript been happily discovered, would, with the help of faction's credulity, have been brought into question, by the two lowest of all human beings, a scribbler for a party, and a commissioner of excise." The persons to whom he alludes were Mr. John Oldmixon, and George Ducket, Esq. — Boswell.

I am more fortunate than Mr. Boswell, in being able (through the favour of Sir F. Doyle, deputy-boy, chairman of the Excise Board) to present the reader with the case submitted to Lord Mansfield, and his opinion.

"Case for the opinion of Mr. Attorney-General.

"Mr. Samuel Johnson has lately published 'A Dictionary of the English Language,' in which are the following words:

"'EXCEIN, n.s. A hateful tax levied upon commodities, and adjudged not by the common judges of property, but by wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid.'"

5. TORY [a cant term, derived, I suppose, from an Irish word signifying a savage. One who adheres to the ancient constitution of the state and the apostolic hierarchy of the church of England: opposed to a Whig].

6. WHIG [the name of a faction].

7. PENSION [an allowance made to any one without an equivalent. In England it is generally understood to mean pay given to a state hireling for treason to his country].

8. PENSIONER [a slave of state hired by a stipend to obey his master].

9. OATS [a grain which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people].

10. EXCISE [a hated tax levied upon commodities, and adjudged not by the common judges of property, but by wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid]." — Murray.

Whether any such step was taken, Sir Francis Doyle was not able to discover: probably not; but Johnson, in his own octavo abridgment of the Dictionary, had the good sense to omit the more offensive parts of the definitions of both Excise and Pension. We have already seen (note, p. 5. n. 3.) the probable motive of the attack on the Excise. — Chorke.
And a more, cannot be fully defended, and must be placed to the account of capricious and humorous indulgence.

Talking to me upon this subject when we were at Ashbourne in 1777, he mentioned a still stronger instance of the predominance of his private feelings in the composition of this work, than any now to be found in it. "You know, sir, Lord Gower forsook the old Jacobite interest. When I came to the word Renegado, after telling that it meant 'one who deserts to the enemy, a revoler,' I added, Sometimes we say a Gower.¹ Thus it went to the press: but the printer had more wit than I, and struck it out.²

Let it, however, be remembered, that this indulgence does not display itself only in sarcasm towards others, but sometimes in playful allusion to the notions commonly entertained of his own laborious task. Thus: "Grab Street, the name of a street in London, much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems; whence any mean production is called Grab Street."—"Lexicographer, a writer of dictionaries, a harmless drudge."³

At the time when he was concluding his very eloquent Preface, Johnson's mind appears to have been in such a state of depression, that we cannot contemplate without wonder the vigorous and splendid thoughts which so highly distinguish that performance.

"I (says he) may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which if I could obtain in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me? I have protracted my work till most of those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave; and success and miscarriage are empty sounds. I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise."

That this indifference was rather a temporary than an habitual feeling, appears, I think, from his letters to Mr. War-ton; and however he may have been affected for the moment, certain it is that the honours which his great work procured him, both at home and abroad, were very grateful to him. His friend the Earl of Cork and Orrery, being at Florence, presented it to the Academia della Crusca. That Academy sent Johnson their Vocabulario, and the French Academy sent him their Dictionnaire, which Mr. Langton had the pleasure to convey to him.

It must undoubtedly seem strange, that the conclusion of his Preface should be expressed in terms so desponding, when it is considered that the author was then only in his forty-sixth year. But we must ascribe its gloom to that miserable dejection of spirits to which he was constitutionally subject, and which was aggravated by the death of his wife two years before. I have heard it ingeniously observed by a lady of rank and elegance, that "his melancholy was then at its meridian." It pleased Goo to grant him almost thirty years of life after this; and once, when he was in a placid frame of mind, he was obliged to own to me that he had enjoyed happier days, and had many more friends, since that gloomy hour, than before.

It is a sad saying, that "most of those whom he wished to please had sunk into the grave;" and his case at forty-five was singularly unhappy, unless the circle of his friends was very narrow. I have often thought, that as longevity is generally desired, and I believe, generally expected, it would be wise to be continually adding to the number of our friends, that the loss of some may be supplied by others. Friendship, "the wine of life," should, like a well-stocked cellar, be thus continually renewed; and it is consolatory to think, that although we can seldom add what will equal the generous first-growths of our youth, yet friendship becomes insensibly old in much less time than is commonly imagined, and not many years are required to make it very mellow and pleasant. Warmth will, no doubt, make a considerable difference. Men of affectionate temper and bright fancy will converse a great deal sooner than those who are cold and dull.

The proposition which I have now endeavoured to illustrate was, at a subsequent period of his life, the opinion of Johnson himself. He said to Sir Joshua Reynolds, "If a man does not make new acquaintance as he advances through life, he will soon find himself left alone. A man, Sir, should keep his friendship in constant repair."

The celebrated Mr. Wilkes, whose notions and habits of life were very opposite to his, but who was ever eminent for literature and vivacity, saluted with a little Jeu d'Esprit upon the following passage in his Grammar of the English Tongue, prefixed to the Dictionary: "H seldom, perhaps never, begins any but the first syllable." In an essay printed in "The Public Advertiser," this lively writer enumerated many instances in opposition to this remark: for example, "The author of this observation must be a man of a quick apprehension, and of a most compre-hensive genius." The position is undoubtedly expressed with too much latitude.

This light sally, we may suppose, made no great impression on our Lexicographer; for

¹ I suppose when Johnson attempted the pun he wrote the name (as pronounced) Gōer. He has Gör in his Dictionary in its obvious meaning, and also "in an ill sense," as a go-between. Lord Gower, after a long opposition to the Whig ministry (which was looked upon as equivalent to Jacobitism) accepted, in 1742, the office of Privy Seal, and was the object of much censure both with Whigs and Tories. Sir C.H. Williams ironically calls him "Hammerclay Gower."

² For which he gives no authority, and surely a writer of a Dictionary who should admit such reflections as those on Exelee, Pension, &c., could hardly hope to pass for a harmless drudge. — Croker.
we find that he did not alter the passage till many years afterwards. He had the pleasure of being treated in a very different manner by his old pupil Mr. Garrick, in the following complimentary Epigram:

"On Johnson's Dictionary."

"Talk of war with a Briton, he'll boldly advance, That one English soldier will beat ten of France; Would we alter the boast from the sword to the pen, Our odds are still greater, still greater our men: In the deep mines of science though Frenchmen may toil, Can their strength be comparr'd to Locke, Newton, and Boyle? Let them rally their heroes, send forth all their powers, Their verse-men and prose-men, then match them with ours! First Shakespeare and Milton, like Gods in the fight, Have put their whole drama and epic to flight; In sates, epistles, and odes would they cope, Their numbers retreat before Dryden and Pope; And Johnson, well arm'd like a hero of yore, Has beat forty French, and will beat forty more!"

Johnson this year gave at once a proof of his benevolence, quickness of apprehension, and admirable art of composition, in the assistance which he gave to Mr. Zachariah Williams, father of the blind lady whom he had humanely received under his roof. Mr. Williams had followed the profession of physic in Wales; but, having a very strong propensity to the study of natural philosophy, had made many ingenious advances towards a discovery of the longitude, and repaired to London in hopes of obtaining the great parliamentary reward. He failed of success: but Johnson, having made himself master of his principles and experiments, wrote for him a pamphlet, published in quarto, with the following title: "An Account of an Attempt to ascertain the Longitude at Sea, by an exact Theory of the Variation of the Magntetical Needle; with a Table of the Variations at the most remarkable Cities in Europe, from the year 1660 to 1680."

"To diffuse it more extensively, it was accompanied with an Italian translation on the opposite page, which it is supposed was the work of Signor Baretti, an Italian of considerable literature, who having come to England a few years before, had been employed in the capacity both of a language master and an author, and formed an intimacy with Dr. Johnson. This pamphlet Johnson presented to the Bodleian Library. On a blank leaf of it is pasted a paragraph cut out of a newspaper, containing an account of the death and character of Williams, plainly written by Johnson."

In July this year he had formed some scheme of mental improvement, the particular purpose of which does not appear. But we find in his Prayers and Meditations, p. 25, a prayer entituled, "On the Study of Philosophy, as an instrument of living;" and after it follows a note, "This study was not pursued."

On the 13th of the same month he wrote in his Journal the following scheme of life, for Sunday: "Having lived" (as he with tenderness of conscience expresses himself) "not without an habitual reverence for the Sabbath, yet without that attention to its religious duties which Christianity requires;"

1. To rise early, and in order to it, to go to sleep early on Saturday.
2. To use some extraordinary devotion in the morning.
3. To examine the tenor of my life, and particularly the last week; and to mark my advances in religion, or recession from it.
4. To read the Scripture methodically with such helps as are at hand.
5. To go to church twice.
6. To read books of divinity, either speculative or practical.
7. To instruct my family.
8. To wear off by meditation any worldly soil contracted in the week.

In 1756 Johnson found that the great fame of his Dictionary had not set him above the necessity of "making provision for the day that was passing over him." No royal or noble patron extended a munificent hand to give in..." dependence to the man who had conferred stability on the language of his country. We may feel indignant that there should have been such unworthy neglect; but we must, at the same time, congratulate ourselves, when we consider, that to this very neglect, operating to erode the natural indolence of his constitution, we owe many valuable productions, which otherwise, perhaps, might never have appeared. He had spent, during the progress of the work, the money for which he had contracted to write his Dictionary. We have seen that the reward of his labour was only fifteen hundred and seventy-five pounds; and when the expense of amanuenses, and paper and other articles, are deducted, his clear profit was very inconsiderable. I once said to him, “I am sorry, Sir, you did not get more for your Dictionary.” His answer was, “I am sorry too. But it was very well. The booksellers are generous, liberal-minded men.” He, upon all occasions, did ample justice to their character in this respect. He considered them as the patrons of literature: and indeed, although they have financially been considerably aided by his Dictionary, it is to them that we owe its having been undertaken and carried through at the absolute cost of expense, for they were not absolutely sure of being indemnified.

JOHNSON TO RICHARDSON.

“Tuesday, 18th Feb. 1756.

DEAR SIR,—I return you my sincerest thanks for the favour 8 which you were pleased to do me two nights ago. Be pleased to accept of this little book 9, [probably the Account of the Longitude], which is all that I have published this winter. The inflammation is come again into my eye, so that I can write very little. I am, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant.

SAM. JOHNSON.”

JOHNSON TO RICHARDSON.

“Gough Square, 16th March, 1756.

SIR,—I am obliged to entreat your assistance; I am now under an arrest for five pounds eighteen shillings. Mr. Stralan, from whom I should have received the necessary help in this case, is not at home, and I am afraid of not finding Mr. Millar.

If you will be so good as to send me this sum, I will very gratefully repay you, and add it to all former obligations. I am, Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.”

—Gent. Mag.

On the first day of this year we find, from his private devotions, that he had then recovered from sickness, and in February that his eye was restored to its use. The pious gratitude with which he acknowledges mercies upon every occasion is very edifying; as is the humble submission which he breathes, when it is the will of his heavenly Father to try him with afflictions. As such dispositions become the state of man here, and are the true effects of religious discipline, we cannot but venerate in Johnson one of the most exercised minds that our holy religion hath ever formed. If there be any thoughtless enough to suppose such exercise the weakness of a great understanding, let them look up to Johnson, and be convinced that what he so earnestly practised must have a rational foundation.

JOHNSON TO PAUL 11.

Brook Green, Hammersmith.

“Monday, Dec. 23, 1755.

DEAR SIR,—I would not have you think that I forget or neglect you. I have never been out of doors since you saw me. On the day after I had been with you, I was seized with a hoarseness, which still continues. I had then a cough so violent, that I once fainted under its convulsions. I was afraid of my lungs; my physician bled me yesterday and the day before, first almost against his will, but the next day without my [word wanting]. I had been bled once before, so that I have lost in all 54 ounces. I live on broths, and my cough, I thank God, is much abated, so that I can sleep. I find it impossible to fix a time for coming to you, but as soon as the physician gives me leave, if you can spare a bed, I will pass a week at your house. Change of air is often of use, and I know you will let me live my own way. I have been pretty much dejected. I am, Sir, your most humble servant.

They seem to have been gainers immediately, for a second folio edition was, if we may believe the title-page, published within a year: an extraordinary rate for so large and expensive a work. —Croker.

2 This letter was written in consequence of Mr. Richard- son’s having given bail for Dr. Johnson.” The foregoing note is from Richardson’s Correspondence; but there must be some mistake in the date of the letter itself. The 19th Feb. 1756, fell on a Thursday. As Johnson’s handwriting is not easily read, perhaps the transcriber mistook Thursday for Tuesday. —Croker.

3 No work of Johnson’s appears to have been published separately about this time, except Williams’s Account of the Longitude. — Croker.

4 This is a continuation of the correspondence referred to, ante, p. 42. Some of it is trifling, and all obscure; but it may be hereafter cleared up, and it affords us, as I before said, a glimpse into Johnson’s private life at this dark period. — Croker.

"Sir,— Having obtained from Mr. Garrick a benefit for a gentlewoman of [word illegible], distress'd by blindness, almost the only casualty that could have distrest her, I beg leave to trouble you, among my other friends, with some of her tickets. "Tuesday, 13th Jan. 1756. [1756.]
"Sir,— I am much confused with an accident that has happened. When your papers were brought me, I broke open the first without reading the superscription, and when I had opened it, found it not to belong to me. I did not read it when I found my mistake. I see it is a very full paper, and will give you much trouble to copy again, but perhaps it will not be necessary, and you may mend the seal. I am sorry for the mischance. You will easily believe it was nothing more. If you send it me again, the child shall carry it.
For bringing Mr. Swynfen, I know not well how to attempt it. I am not sure that her husband will be pleased, and I think it would look too much like making myself a party, instead of acting the part of a common friend, which I shall be very ready to discharge. I should imagine that the best way would be to send her word when you will call on her, and perhaps the questions on which she is to resuscitate her remembrance, and come to her at her own house. I really know not how to ask her husband to send her, and I certainly will not take her without asking him. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

"Madam,— From the liberty of writing to you, if I have hitherto been deterred from the fear of your understanding, I am now encouraged to it from the confidence of your goodness.
"I am soliciting a benefit for Miss Williams, and beg that if you can by letters influence any in her favour (and who is there whom you cannot influence?) you will be pleased to patronise her on this occasion. Yet, for the time is short, and as you were not in town, I did not till this day remember that you might help us, and recollect how widely and how rapidly light is diffused.
"To every joy is appended a sorrow. The name of Miss Carter introduces the memory of Cave. Poor dear Cave! I owed him much; for to him I owe that I have known you. He died, I am afraid, unexpectedly to himself, yet surely unburthened with any great crime, and for the positive duties of religion I have yet no right to condemn him for neglect.

"Sir,— I am still of opinion that they will hear me at the Gate, and I have no difficulty to speak to them; but though I hope I can obtain a forbearance, I am confident that I shall get nothing more; nor would any attempt to borrow of them or sell to them have any other effect than that of disabling me from succeeding in my first request. You may easily believe that spindles are there in very little credit.
"I will propose to a friend to speak to Mr. Hitch. You well know it is impossible to guess what may be the answer when money is to be sought. If my friend refuses the errand, what shall we do? That must be considered. Will you then write to him by me, as a preparative, and then see him, if he gives any countenance to the affair? You are much more skilful in these transactions than I, and might much sooner find out a proper person to deal with, for my friends have not much money.

JOHNSON TO JOSEPH WARTON.

DEAR SIR,—Though, when you and your brother were in town, you did not think my humble habitations worth a visit, yet I will not so far give way to sullenness as not to tell you that I have lately seen an octavo book which I suspect to be yours, though I have not yet read above ten pages. That way of publishing, without acquainting your friends, is a wicked trick. However, I will not so far depend upon a mere conjecture as to charge you with a fraud which I cannot prove you to have committed.

I should be glad to hear that you are pleased with your new situation. You have now a kind of royalty, and are to be answerable for your conduct to posterity. I suppose you care not now to answer a letter, except there be a lucky concurrence of a post-day with a holiday. These restraints are troublesome for a time, but custom makes them easy, with the help of some honour, and a great deal of profit, and I doubt not but your abilities will obtain both.

For my part, I have not lately done much. I have been ill in the winter, and my eye has been inflamed; but I please myself with the hopes of doing many things, with which I have long pleased and deceived myself.

What becomes of poor dear Collins? I wrote him a letter which he never answered. I suppose writing is very troublesome to him. That man is no common loss. The moralists all talk of the uncertainty of fortune, and the transitoriness of beauty; but it is yet more dreadful to consider that the powers of the mind are equally liable to change; that understanding may make its appearance and depart, that it may blaze and expire.

Let me not be long without a letter, and I will forgive you the omission of the visit; and if you can tell me that you are now more happy than before, you will give great pleasure to, dear Sir, your most affectionate and most humble servant,

I knew not what to do. — I then had recourse to young Mr. Cave, who very civilly went about the business, and came to me yesterday in the evening with this account.

"Mr. Cave seized, and has a man in possession.

"He made a sale, and sold only a fire-shovel for four shillings.

"The goods were appraised at about eighty pounds.

"Mr. Cave will stay three weeks without any further motion in the business, but will still keep his possession.

"He expects that you should pay the expense of the seizure; how much it is I could not be informed.

"He will stay to Christmas upon security. He is willing to continue you tenant, or will sell the mill to any that shall work or buy the machine. He values his mill at a thousand pounds.

"He did not come up about this business, but another.

"Mr. Barker, as young Mr. Cave thinks, is at Northampton.

JOHNSON TO PAUL.

"Sir,— I am no less surprised than yourself at the treatment which you have met with, and agree with you that Mr. Cave must impute to himself part of the discontent that he shall suffer till the spindles are produced.

"If I have any opportunity of dispensing the gloom that overcasts him at present, I shall endeavour it both for his sake and yours; but it is to little purpose that remonstrances are offered to voluntary inattention or to obstinate prejudice. — POOCk MSS.

His works this year were, an abstract or epitome, in octavo, of his folio Dictionary, and a few essays in a monthly publication, entitled "The Universal Visitor." Christopher Smart, with whose unhappy attachment of mind he sincerely sympathised, was one of the stated undertakers of this miscellany, and it was to assist him that Johnson sometimes employed his pen. All the essays marked with two asterisks have been ascribed to him; but I am confident, from internal evidence, that of these neither "The Life of Chancer," "Reflections on the State of Portugal," nor "An Essay on Architecture," were written by him. I am equally confident, upon the same evidence, that he wrote "Further Thoughts on Agriculture,"† being the sequel of a very inferior essay on the same subject, and which, though carried on as if by the same hand, is both in thinking and expression so far above it, and so strikingly peculiar, as to leave no doubt of its true parent; and that he also wrote "A Dissertation on the State of Literature and Authors," ‡ and "A Dissertation on the Epitaphs written by Pope." The last of these, indeed, he afterwards added to his "Idler." Why the essays truly written by him are marked in the same manner with some which he did not write, I cannot explain; but, with deference to those who have ascribed to him the three essays which I have rejected, they want all the characteristic marks of Johnsonian composition.

He engaged also to superintend and contribute largely to another monthly publication, entitled "The Literary Magazine, or Universal Review," the first number of which came out in May this year. What were his emoluments from this undertaking, and what other writers were employed in it, I have not discovered. He continued to write in it, with intermissions, till the fifteenth number; and I think that he never gave better proofs of the force, acuteness, and vivacity of his mind, than in this miscellany, whether we consider his original essays, or his reviews of the works of others. The "Preliminary Address"† to the public, is a proof how this great man could embellish with the graces of superior composition, even so trite a thing as the plan of a magazine.

His original essays are, "An Introduction to the Political State of Great Britain;" † † "Remarks on the Militia Bill;" † † "Observations on his Britannic Majesty's Treaties with the Empress of Russia and the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel;" † † "Observations on the Present State of Affairs;" † † "Memoirs of Frederick II. King of Prussia." † † In all these he displays extensive political knowledge and sagacity, expressed with uncommon energy and perspicuity, without any of those words which he sometimes took a pleasure in adopting, in imitation of Sir Thomas Browne; of whose "Christian Morals" he this year gave an edition, with his "Life" prefixed to it, which is one of Johnson's best biographical performances. In one instance only in these essays has he indulged his Brownism. Dr. Robertson, the historian, mentioned it to me, as having at once convinced him that Johnson was the author of the "Memoirs of the King of Prussia." Speaking of the pride which the old King, the father of his hero, took in being master of the tallest regiment in Europe, he says, "To review this towering regiment was his daily pleasure; and to perpetuate it was so much his care, that when he met a tall woman, he immediately commanded one of his Titanian retinue to marry her, that they might propagate prosperity." For this Anglo-Latian word "prosperity," Johnson had, however, the authority of Addison.

His reviews are of the following books:

of praying with profane eyes into the recesses of policy, it is evident that this reverence can be claimed only by counsels yet unexecuted, and projects suspended in deliberation. But when a design has ended in miscarriage or success, when every eye and every ear is witness to general discontent, or general satisfaction, it is then a proper time to disentangle confusion and illustrate obscurity; to show by what causes every event was produced, and in what effects it is likely to terminate; to lay down with distinct particularity what rumour always huddles in general exclamation, or perplexes by indigestged narratives; to shew whence happiness or calamity is derived, and whence it may be expected; and honestly to lay before the people what inquiry can gather of the past, and conjecture can estimate of the future.

Here we have it assumed as an incontrovertible principle, that in this country the people are the superintendents of the conduct and measures of those by whom government is administered; of the beneficial effect of which the present reign afforded an illustrious example, when addresses from all parts of the kingdom controlled an audacious attempt to introduce a new power subversive of the crown. A still stronger proof of his patriotic spirit appears in his review of an "Essay on Waters, by Dr. Lucas," of whom, after describing him as a man well known to the world for his daring defiance of power, when he thought it exerted on the side of wrong, he thus speaks:

"The Irish ministers drove him from his native country by a proclamation, in which they charge him with crimes of which they never intended to be called to the proof, and oppressed him by methods equally irresistible by guilt and innocence. Let the man thus driven into exile, for having been the friend of his country, be received in every other place as a confessor of liberty; and let the tools of power be taught in time, that they may rob, but cannot impoverish."

Some of his reviews in this Magazine are very short accounts of the pieces noticed, and I mention them only that Dr. Johnson's opinion of the works may be known; but many of them are examples of elaborate criticism, in the most masterly style. In his review of the "Memoirs of the Court of Augustus," he has the resolution to think and speak from his own mind, regardless of the cant transmitted from age to age, in praise of the ancient Romans. Thus:

"I know not why any one but a schoolboy in his declamation should whine over the Commonwealth of Rome, which grew great only by..."
the misery of the rest of mankind. The Romans, like others, as soon as they grew rich, grew corrupt; and in their corruption sold the lives and freedoms of themselves, and of one another. Again: "A people, who while they were poor robbed mankind; and as soon as they became rich robbed one another."—In his review of the Miscellanies in prose and verse, published by Elizabeth Harrison, but written by many hands, he gives an eminent proof at once of his orthodoxy and candour.

The authors of the essays in prose seem generally to have imitated, or tried to imitate, the copiousness and luxuriance of Mrs. Rowe. This, however, is not all their praise; they have laboured to add to her brightness of imagery, her purity of sentiments. The poets have had Dr. Watts before their eyes; a writer, who, if he stood not in the first class of genius, compensated that defect by a ready application of his powers to the promotion of piety. The attempt to employ the ornaments of romance in the promotion of piety I think was first made by Mr. Boyle's "Martyrdom of Theodora;" but Boyle's philosophical studies did not allow him time for the cultivation of style; and the completion of the great design was reserved for Mrs. Rowe. Dr. Watts was one of the first who taught the Dissenters to write and speak like other men, by shewing them that elegance might consist with piety. They would have both done honour to a better society, for they had that charity which might well make their failings be forgotten, and with which the whole Christian world wish for communion. They were pure from all the heresies of an age, to which every opinion is become a favourite that the universal church has hitherto detested! This praise the general interest of mankind requires to be given to writers who please and do not corrupt, who instruct and do not weary. But to them all human eulogies are vain, whom I believe applauded by angels, and numbered with the just.

His defence of Tea against Mr. Jonas Hanway's violent attack upon that elegant and popular beverage, shows how very well a man of genius can write upon the slightest subject, when he writes, as the Italians say, con amore: I suppose no person ever enjoyed with more relish the infusion of that fragrant leaf than Johnson. The quantities which he drank of it at all hours were so great, that his nerves must have been uncommonly strong, not to have been extremely relaxed by such an interminable use of it. He assured me, that he never felt the least inconvenience from it; which is a proof that the fault of his constitution was rather a too great tension of fibres, than the contrary. Mr. Hanway wrote an angry answer to Johnson's review of his Essay on Tea, and after a full and deliberate pause, made a reply to it; the only instance, I believe, in the whole course of his life, when he condescended to oppose any thing that was written against him. I suppose, when he thought of any of his little antagonists, he was ever justly aware of the high sentiment of Ajax in Ovid:

"Iste tult prelibum jam nunc certaminis hujus, Qui, cim victus erit, mecum certasse feretur."

But, indeed, the good Mr. Hanway laid himself so open to ridicule, that Johnson's animadversions upon his attack were chiefly to make sport.

The generosity with which he pleads the cause of Admiral Byng is highly to the honour of his heart and spirit. Though Voltaire affects to be witty upon the fate of that unfortunate officer, observing that he was shot "pour encourager les autres," the nation has long been satisfied that his life was sacrificed to the political favour of the times. In the vault belonging to the Torrington family, in the church of Southill, in Bedfordshire, there is the following epitaph upon his monument, which I have transcribed:—

"TO THE PERPETUAL DISGRACE OF PUBLIC JUSTICE,
THE HONOURABLE JOHN BYNG, ESQ.
ADMIRAL OF THE BLUE, FELL A MARTYR TO POLITICAL PERSECUTION;
MARCH 14. IN THE YEAR 1757;
WHEN BRAVERY AND LOYALTY WERE INSUFFICIENT SECURITIES FOR THE LIFE AND HONOUR OF A NAVAL OFFICER."

1 In this review, Johnson candidly describes himself as "a hardened and shameless tea-drinker, who has for many years diluted his meals with only the infusion of this fascinating plant; whose kettles have scarcely time to cool; who with tea amuses the evening, with tea soaks the midnight, and with tea welcomes the morning." This last phrase his friend, Tom Tyers, happily parodied, "te veniente die—te decedente." Hawkins calls his addiction to it unmanly, and almost gives it the colour of a crime. The Rev. Mr. Parker, of Henley, is in possession of a teapot which belongs to Dr. Johnson, and which contains above two quarts.—Croker.

2 "Losing, he wins, because his name will be Ennobled by defeat, who durst contend with me."—Dryden.

3 Nothing can be more unfounded than the assertion that Byng fell a martyr to "political persecution." It is impossible to read the trial without being convinced that he had misconducted himself; and the extraordinary proceedings in both Houses of Parliament subsequent to his trial, prove, at once, the zeal of his friends to invalidate the finding of the court-martial, and the absence of any regular proceedings. By a strange coincidence of circumstances, it happened that there was a total change of ministry between the accusation and the sentence, so that one party prepared the trial and the other directed the execution: there can be no stronger proof that he was not a political martyr. See this subject treated at large in the Quarterly Review for April, 1822—1831. But though legally, and, I believe, justly convicted, it is likely that he would have been pardoned had not popular fury run so high. The public had from the first condemned the unhappy admiral, and anticipated his fate. Thus Lloyd writes on the 29th September, 1756, three months before the change of ministry, and six months before Byng's execution:—

"So ministers of basest tricks,
I love a fling at Politics;
Amuse the nation's court and king,
By breaking Fowke and hanging Byng."—

And in the London Magazine for the same month, in a long vituperative article addressed to Mr. Byng, he wrote these lines:—

"An injured nation must be satisfied;
To public execution thou must go,
A public spectacle of shame and woe."

I now believe that the general officer alluded to, enite, p. 42, may have been General Fowke, whom, after a kind of acquittal by a court-martial, George II. struck out of the army Rolls, and that the narrators of the anecdote mistook the date.—Croker.
Johnson's most exquisite critical essay in the Literary Magazine, and indeed any where, is his review of Soame Jenyns's "Inquiry into the Origin of Evil." Jenyns was possessed of lively talents, and a style eminently pure and easy, and could very happily play with a light subject, either in prose or verse: but when he speculated on that most difficult and excruciating question, the Origin of Evil, he "ventured far beyond his depth," and, accordingly, was exposed by Johnson, both with acute argument and brilliant wit. I remember when the late Mr. Bicknell's humorous performance, entitled "The Musical Travels of Joel Collyer," in which a slight attempt is made to ridicule Johnson, was ascribed to Soame Jenyns, "Ha! (said Johnson) I thought I had given him enough of it."

His triumph over Jenyns is thus described by my friend Mr. Courtenay, in his "Poetical Review of the literary and moral character of Dr. Johnson;" a performance of such merit, that I am not unhonoured with a very kind and partial notice in it, I should echo the sentiments of men of the first taste loudly in its praise:

"When specious sophists with presumption scan
The source of evil, hidden still from man;
Revive Arabian tales, and vainly hope To rival St. John and his scholar Pope :
Though metaphysics spread the gloom of night,
By reason's star he guides our aching sight:
The bounds of knowledge marks, and points the way
To pathless wastes where wilder'd sages stray;
Where, like a farthing link-boy, Jenyns stands,
And the dim torch drops from his feeble hands."

This year Mr. William Payne, brother of the respectable bookseller of that name, published "An Introduction to the Game of Draughts," to which Johnson contributed a Dedication to the Earl of Rochford,* and a Preface,* both of which are admirably adapted to the treatise to which they are prefixed. Johnson, I believe, did not play at draughts after leaving College; by which he suffered; for it would have afforded him an innocent soothing relief from the melancholy which distressed him so often. I have heard him regret that he had not learnt to play at cards; and the game of draughts we know is peculiarly calculated to fix the attention without straining it. There is a composure and gravity in draughts which insensibly tranquillises the mind; and, accordingly, the Dutch are fond of it, as they are of smoking, of the sedative influence of which, though he himself never smoked, he had a high opinion. Besides, there is in draughts some exercise of the faculties; and accordingly, Johnson, wishing to dignify the subject in his Dedication with what is most estimable in it, observes, "Triflers may find or make any thing a trifle; but since it is the great characteristic of a wise man to see events in their causes, to obviate consequences, and ascertain contingencies, your lordship will think nothing a trifle by which the mind is inured to caution, foresight, and circumspection."

As one of the little occasional advantages which he did not disdain to take by his pen, as a man whose profession was literature, he this year accepted of a guinea from Mr. Robert Dodsley, for writing the Introduction to "The London Chronicle," an evening newspaper; and even in so slight a performance exhibited peculiar talents. This Chronicle still subsists, and from what I observed, when I was abroad, has a more extensive circulation upon the continent than any of the English newspapers. It was constantly read by Johnson himself; and it is but just to observe, that it has all along

This was an unbecoming indulgence of puny resentment, at a time when he himself was at a very advanced age, and had the advantage of descendancy to the grave. I was truly sorry for it; for he was then become an avowed and (as my Lord Bishop of London, who had a serious conversation with him on the subject, assures me) a sincere Christian. He could not expect that Johnson's numerous friends would patiently bear to have the memory of their master stigmatized by no mean pen, but that, at least, one would be found to retort. Accordingly, this unjust and sarcastic epitaph was met in the same public field by an answer, in terms by no means soft, and such as wanton provocation only could justify:

1 Some time after Dr. Johnson's death, there appeared in the newspapers and magazines (the former in small and pell-mell attack upon him, in the form of an Epitaph, under the name of Mr. Soame Jenyns, very unworthy of that gentleman, who had quietly submitted to the critical lash while Johnson lived. It assumed, as characteristics of him, all the vulgar circumstances of abuse which had circulated amongst the ignorant:——

"Here lies poor Johnson. Reader, have a care, Tread lightly, lest you rouse a sleeping bear;
Religious, moral, generous, and humane
He was — but self-sufficient, rude, and vain;
ill-bred and overbearing in dispute.
A scholar and a Christian — yet a brute.
Would you know all his wisdom and his folly,
His actions, sayings, mirth, and melancholy,
Boswell and Thrale, retailers of his wit,
Will tell you how he wrote, and talked, and cough'd, and spit."

Gent. Mag. 1785.

This was an unbecoming indulgence of puny resentment, at a time when he himself was at a very advanced age, and had the advantage of descendancy to the grave. I was truly sorry for it; for he was then become an avowed and (as my Lord Bishop of London, who had a serious conversation with him on the subject, assures me) a sincere Christian. He could not expect that Johnson's numerous friends would patiently bear to have the memory of their master stigmatized by no mean pen, but that, at least, one would be found to retort. Accordingly, this unjust and sarcastic epitaph was met in the same public field by an answer, in terms by no means soft, and such as wanton provocation only could justify:

2 See post, August 19. 1773. Hawkins heard Johnson say, that insanity had grown more frequent since smoking had gone out of fashion. — Croker.

3 The London Chronicle, or Universal Evening Post, was published three times a week. The first number, containing Johnson's Introduction, appeared Jan. 1. 1757. Mr. Boswell often wrote in this journal. — Croker.

"Prepared for a creature not quite dead yet."

"Here lies a little ugly nauseous elf,
Who, judging only from its wretched self,
Feebly attempted, petulant and vain,
The 'Origin of Evil' to explain.
A mighty Genius at this ell displeased,
With a strong critical grasp theurchin squeezed.
For thirty years its coward spleen it kept,
Till in the dust the mighty Genius slept;
Then stunk and frettid in expiring smut,
And blink'd at Jenyns with its last poor puff."— Boswell.

The answer was no doubt by Mr. Boswell himself, and does more credit to his zeal than to his poetical talents. This Review was so successful that Johnson re-published it in a separate pamphlet. Jenyns was born in 1705, and died in 1757. He was for near forty years in Parliament, and published some poetry; but his best known work is "Node; also, Evidences of the Christian Religion, published in 1774. Of this work, the seriousness and sincerity was much questioned, which in the opinion of Mr. Boswell's observation as to his being a "sincere Christian." — Croker.

Another instance of the same nature has been communicated to me by the Reverend Dr. Thomas Campbell, who has done himself considerable credit by his own writings. "Sitting with Dr. Johnson one morning alone, he asked me if I had known Dr. Madden, who was author of the premium-scheme in Ireland. On my answering in the affirmative, and also that I had for some years lived in his neighbourhood, &c., he begged of me that when I returned to Ireland, I would endeavour to procure for him a poem of Dr. Madden's called "Boulter's Monument." The reason (said he) why I wish for it, is this: when Dr. Madden came to London, he submitted that work to my castigation; and I remember I blotted a great many lines, and might have blotted more many without making the poem worse. However, the Doctor was very thankful, and very generous, for he gave me ten guineas, which was to me at that time a great sum."

He this year resumed his scheme of giving an edition of Shakspeare with notes. He issued Proposals of considerable length, in which he showed that he perfectly well knew what a variety of research such an undertaking required; but his indolence prevented him from pursuing it with that diligence which alone can collect those scattered facts, that genius, however acute, penetrating, and luminous, cannot discover by its own force. It is remarkable, that at this time his fancied activity was for the moment so vigorous, that he promised his work should be published before Christmas, 1757. Yet nine years elapsed before it saw the light. His throes in bringing it forth had been severe and remittent; and at last we may almost conclude that the Cesarian operation was performed by the knife of Churchill, whose upbraiding satire, I dare say, made Johnson's friends urge him to dispatch.

"He for subscribers baits his hook, And takes your cash; but where's the book? No matter where; wise fear, you know, Forbids the robbing of a foe; But what, to serve our private ends, Forbids the cheating of our friends?"

About this period he was offered a living of considerable value in Lincolnshire, if he were inclined to enter into holy orders. It was a rectory in the gift of Mr. Langton, the father of his much valued friend. But he did not accept of it; partly, I believe, from a conscientious motive, being persuaded that his temper and habits rendered him unfit for that assiduous and familiar instruction of the vulgar and ignorant, which he held to be an essential duty in a clergyman; and partly because his love of a London life was so strong, that he would have thought himself an exile in any other place, particularly if residing in the country. Whoever would wish to see his thoughts upon that subject displayed in their full force, may peruse the Adventurer, Number 126.

In 1757 it does not appear that he published anything, except some of those articles in the Literary Magazine, which have been mentioned. That magazine, after Johnson ceased to write in it, gradually declined, though the popular epithet of Antiquarian was added to it; and in July, 1758, it expired. He probably prepared a part of his Shakspeare this year, and he dictated a speech on the subject of an address to the Throne, after the expedition to Rochfort, which was delivered by one of his friends. I know not what in what public meeting. It is printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for October, 1785, as his, and bears sufficient marks of authenticity.

By the favour of Mr. Joseph Cooper

been paid, he considered them so absolutely the property of Johnson, that it proved an annoyance to him. He reckoned that he had written about forty sermons; but, except as to some, knew not in what hands they were. "I have," said he, "been paid for them, and have no right to inquire about them." This practice is of very doubtful propriety. In the case of an elective chapel, it might, as the Bishop Erlington observed, be of some doubt to an absolute fraud, as a person might be chosen for the merits of a sermon not written by himself. See ante, p. 82. — Croker.

They have been reprinted by Mr. Malone, in the Preface to his edition of Shakespeare. — Boswell.

Langton, near Partney. — Croker.

Hawkins, who first told this fact on Johnson's own authority, does not mention this latter and lower motive for Johnson's refusal. It was,' he says, 'in a pleasant country, and of such nearly value, as might have tempted one in better circumstances, but he had scruples about the duties of the manse, and the country, and said he had not.' Johnson said, "the requisites for the office, and I cannot succeed in consciencebear the dock which I am unable to feed." And Hawkins further informs us, that this case was one of those instances more straitened than usual, and even his ordinary relaxation of his club failed him. "About the year 1756, time had produced the effect of the death of many of Johnson's friends, who were used to meet him in Ivy-lane. Death had taken from them McGhie; Barker went to settle as a practising physician at Trowbridge; Dyer went abroad; Hawkesworth was busied in forming new connections; and I had lately made one that removed from me all temptations to pass away evenings from him. The consequence was, that our symposium at the King's Head broke up." — Croker.
Walker, of the Treasury, Dublin, I have obtained a copy of the following letter from Johnson to the venerable author of "Disserations on the History of Ireland."

JOHNSON TO CHS. O'CONNOR, ESQ.

"London, April 9. 1757.

Sir,—I have lately, by the favour of Mr. Faulkner, seen your account of Ireland, and cannot forbear to solicit a prosecution of your design. Sir William Temple complains that Ireland is less known than any other country, as to its ancient state. The natives have had little leisure, and little encouragement for inquiry; and strangers, not knowing the language, have had no ability.

"I have long wished that the Irish literature were cultivated. Ireland is known by tradition to have been once the seat of piety and learning; and surely it would be very acceptable to all those who are curious either in the original of nations, or the affinities of languages, to be further informed of the revolution of a people so ancient, and once so illustrious.

"What relation there is between the Welsh and Irish language, or between the language of Ireland and that of Biscay, deserves inquiry. Of these provincial and untended tongues, it seldom happens that more than are understood by any one man; and, therefore, it seldom happens that a fair comparison can be made. I hope you will continue to cultivate this kind of learning, which has too long lain neglected, and which, if it be suffered to remain in oblivion for another century, may, perhaps, never be retrieved. As I wish well to all useful undertakings, I would not forbear to let you know how much you deserve, in my opinion, from all lovers of study, and how much pleasure your work has given to Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant, SAML. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"Dear Sir,—Dr. Marsili, of Padua, a learned gentleman, and good Latin poet, has a mind to see Oxford. I have given him a letter to Dr. Huddersford, and shall be glad if you will introduce him, and shew him any thing in Oxford.

"I am printing my new edition of Shakspeare. "I long to see you all. Any cannot conveniently come yet. You might write to me now and then, if you were good for any thing. But 4 honores mutant mores. Professors forget their friends. I shall certainly complair to Miss Jones 5 I am, your, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

"Please to make my compliments to Mr. Wise."

JOHNSON TO [THOMAS WARTON].

"Oct. 27. 1757.

"Dear Sir,—I have been thinking and talking with Mr. Allen about some literary business for an inhabitant of Oxford. Many schemes might be plausible proposed, but at present these may be sufficient. 1. An Ecclesiastical History of England. In this there are a great many materials which must be compressed into a narrow compass. This book has not exceeded the bulk of Ireland, (not of England only, but of Europe;) this must not exceed the same bulk, and will be full of and very entertaining. 3. The Life of Richard the First. 4. The Life of Edward the Confessor.

"All these are works for which the requisite materials may be found at Oxford, and any of them well executed would be well received. I impart these designs to you in confidence, that what you do not make use of yourself shall revert to me uncommunicated to any other. The schemes of a writer are his property, and his reward, and therefore they must not be made common. I am, Sir, your most humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO BENNET LANGTON,

"Jan. 29, 1758."

"Dear Sir,—Though I might have expected to hear from you, upon your entrance into a new state of life at a new place, yet recollecting (not without some degree of shame) that I owe you a letter and that they shall give yearly two liberal premiums for two compositions, one in verse, and the other In prose, in the Irish language," — Boswell. Since the above was written (May, 1790), Mr. Flood's will has been set aside, after a trial at bar, in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. — Malone.

4 Mr. Warton was elected Professor of Poetry at Oxford in the preceding year.— Warton.

5 Miss Jones lived at Oxford, and was often of our parties. She was a very ingenious poetess, and published a volume of poems; and, on the whole, was most sensible, agreeable, and amiable woman. She was sister to the Rev. River Jones, Chanter of Christ Church Cathedral at Oxford, and Johnson used to call her the Chantress. I have heard him often address her in this passage from "I Pemoneo":

"Thee, Chantress, of the woods among I woo," &c.

She died unmarried. — Warton.

6 This letter was found by Mr. Peter Cunningham, in the papers of Allen, the printer, and was intended, no doubt, for Thomas Warton, though, perhaps, from some change of opinion, not forwarded to him. — Croker.

7 This letter is dated June 24, 1757, and was so placed by Mr. Boswell; but this must be a mistake; for it is evidently written on Mr. Langton's entrance into college life; now Langton entered Trinity College, Oxford, 7th July, 1757, and no doubt began to reside in the following autumn, and we shall see in a subsequent letter dated June 1, 1758, that Langton had been already some time the pupil of Warton. The true date, therefore, of this letter, was, probably, January and not June. — Croker.
upon an old account, I think it my part to write first. This, indeed, I do not only from complaisance but from interest; for living on in the old way, I am very glad to a correspondent so capable as yourself to diversify the hours. You have, at present, too many novelties about you to need any help from me to drive along your time.

I know not any thing more pleasant, or more instructive, than to compare experience with expectation, or to register from time to time the difference between idea and reality. It is by this kind of observation that we grow daily less liable to be disappointed. You, who are very capable of anticipating futurity, and raising phantoms before your own eyes, must often have imagined to yourself an academical life, and have conceived what would be the manners, the views, and the conversation of men devoted to letters; how they would choose their companions, how they would direct their studies, and by how they would regulate their lives. Let me know what you expected, and what you have found. At least record it to yourself, before custom has reconciled you to the scenes before you, and the disparity of your discoveries to your hopes has vanished from your mind. It is a rule never to be forgotten, that whatever strikes strongly, should be described while the first impression remains fresh upon the mind.

I love, dear Sir, to think on you, and therefore should willingly write more to you, but that the post will not now give me leave to do more than send my compliments to Mr. Warton, and tell you that I am, dear Sir, most affectionately, your very humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

Mr. Burney having enclosed to him an extract from the review of his Dictionary in the Bibliothèque des Savans [t. iii. p. 482.] and a list of subscribers to his Shakspeare, which Mr. Burney had procured in Norfolk, he wrote the following answer: —

JOHNSON TO BURNEY,
At Lynne, Norfolk.

"Gough Square, Dec. 24. 1757.

Sir,—That I may shew myself sensible of your favours, and not commit the same fault a second time, I make haste to answer the letter which I received this morning. The truth is, the other likewise was received, and I wrote an answer; but being desirous to transmit you some proposals and receipts, I waited till I could find a convenient conveyance, and day was passed after day, till other things drove it from my thoughts;
yet not so, but that I remember with great pleasure your commendation of my Dictionary. Your praise was welcome, not only because I believe it was sincere, but because praise has been very scarce. A man of your candour will be surprised when I tell you, that among all my acquaintance there were only two, who upon the publication of my book did not endeavour to depress me with threats of ceuser from the public, or with objections learned from those who had learned them from my own preface. Yours is the only letter of good-will that I have received; though, indeed, I am promised something of that sort from Sweden.

"However, my new edition of Shakspeare will be received I know not; the subscription has not been very successful. I shall publish about March.

"If you can direct me how to send proposals, I should wish they were in such hands.

"I remember, Sir, in some of the first letters with which you favoured me, you mentioned your lady. May I inquire after her? In return for the favourites which you have shown me, it is not much to tell you, that I wish you and her all that can conduce to your happiness. I am, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

In 1758 we find him, it should seem, in as easy and pleasant a state of existence, as constitutional unhappiness ever permitted him to

JOHNSON TO BURNEY,
At Lynne, Norfolk.

"London, March 1. 1758.

Sir,—Your kindness is so great, and my claim to any particular regard from you so little, that I am at a loss how to express my sense of your favours; 2 but I am, indeed, much pleased to be thus distinguished by you.

"I am ashamed to tell you that my Shakspeare will not be out so soon as I promised my subscribers; but I did not promise them more than I promised myself. It will, however, be published before summer.

"I have sent you a bundle of proposals, which, I think, do not profess more than I have hitherto performed. I have printed many of the plays, and have hitherto left very few passages unexplained;
where I am quite at loss, I confess my ignorance, which is seldom done by commentators.

"I have likewise enclosed twelve receipts; not that I mean to impose upon you the trouble of pushing them with more importance than may seem proper, but that you may rather have more than fewer than you shall want. The proposals you will disseminate as there shall be an opportunity. I once printed them at length in the Chronicle, and some of my friends (I believe Mr.
Murphy, who formerly wrote the Gray's-Inn Journal) introduced them with a splendid encomium.

"Since the Life of Brown, I have been a little engaged, from time to time, in the Literary Magaazine, but not very lately. I have not the collection by me, and therefore cannot draw out a catalogue of my own parts, but will do it, and send it. Do not buy them, for I will gather all those that have anything of mine in them, and send them to Mrs. Burney, as a small token of gratitude for the regard which she is pleased to bestow upon me.

"I am, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

1 Here Mr. Boswell had inserted a letter to Mr. Langton, dated, by mistake, June 9, 1758, which, from its internal evidence, clearly belongs to 1760, where it will be found. — Croker.

2 This letter was an answer to one, in which was enclosed a draft for the payment of some subscriptions to his Shaks-peare. — Boswell.
Dr. Burney has kindly favoured me with the following memorandum, which I take the liberty to insert in his own genuine easy style. I love to exhibit sketches of my illustrious friend by various eminent hands.

"Soon after this, Mr. Burney, during a visit to the capital, had an interview with him in Gough Square, where he dined and drank tea with him, and was introduced to the acquaintance of Mrs. Williams. After dinner, Mr. Johnson proposed to Mr. Burney to go up with him into his garret, which being accepted, he there found about five or six Greek folios, a deal writing-desk, and a chair and a half. Johnson, giving to his guest the entire seat, tottered himself on with only three legs and one arm. Here he gave Mr. Burney Mrs. Williams's history, and showed him some volumes of Shakspeare already printed, to prove that he was in earnest. Upon Mr. Burney's opening the first volume, at the Merchant of Venice, he observed to him that he seemed to be more severe on Warburton than Theobald. "O poor Tib! (said Johnson) he was ready knocked down to my hands; Warburton stands between me and him."—'But, Sir, (said Mr. Burney) you'll have Warburton upon your bones, won't you?'—'No, Sir; he'll not come out; he'll only growl in his den.'—'But you think, Sir, that Warburton is a superior critic to Theobald?'—'O, Sir, he'd make two-and-fifty Theobalds, cut into slices! The worst of Warburton is, that he has a rage for saying something, when there's nothing to be said.'—Mr. Burney then asked him whether he had seen the letter which Warburton had written in answer to a pamphlet, addressed 'To the most impatient man alive.' He answered in the negative. Mr. Burney told him it was supposed to be written by Mallet. The controversy now raged between the friends of Pope and Bolingbroke; and Warburton and Mallet were the leaders of the several parties. Mr. Burney asked him then if he had seen Warburton's book against Bolingbroke's Philoçophy?—'No, Sir; I have never read Bolingbroke's impiety, and therefore am not interested about its con-futation.'"

CHAPTER XIII.

On the fifteenth of April he began a new periodical paper, entitled "The Idler," which came out every Saturday in a weekly newspaper, called "The Universal Chronicle, or Weekly Gazette," published by Newbery. These essays were continued till April 5, 1760. Of one hundred and three, their total number, twelve were contributed by his friends; of which, Nos. 33, 93. and 96. were written by Mr. Thomas Warton; No. 67. by Mr. Langton; and Nos. 76, 79, and 82. by Sir Joshua Reynolds; the concluding words of No. 82,—"and pollute his canvas with deformity,"—being added by Johnson, as Sir Joshua informed me.

The Idler is evidently the work of the same mind which produced the Rambler, but has less body and more spirit. It has more variety of real life, and greater facility of language. He describes the miseries of idleness, with the lively sensations of one who has felt them; and in his private memorandums while engaged in it, we find, "This year I hope to learn diligence." [Pr. and Med., p. 30.] Many of these excellent essays were written as hastily as an ordinary letter. Mr. Langton remembers Johnson, when on a visit to Oxford, asking him one evening how long it was till the post went out; and on being told about half an hour, he exclaim'd, "then we shall do very well." He upon this instantly sat down and finished an Idler, which it was necessary should be in London the next day. Mr. Langton having signified a wish to read it, "Sir, (said he) you shall not do more than I have done myself." He then folded it up and sent it off.

Yet there are in the Idler several papers which show as much profundity of thought, and labour of language, as any of this great man's writings. No. 14. "Robbery of time;" No. 24. "Thinking;" No. 41. "Death of a friend;" No. 43. "Flight of time;" No. 51. "Domestic greatness unattainable;" No. 52. "Self-denial;" No. 58. "Actual, how short of benevolence and other amiable qualities, used to say, that he paid a morning visit to Johnson, intending from his chambers to send a letter into the city; but, to his great surprise, he found an author by profession without pen, ink, or paper. The present Bishop of Salisbury [Douglas] was also among those who endeavoured, by constant attention, to soothe the cares of a mind which he knew to be afflicted with gloomy apprehensions."—CRoKER.

1 This is a slight mistake. The first number of "The Idler" appeared on the 15th of April, 1758, in No. 2. of the Universal Chronicle, &c., which was published by J. Payne, for whom also the Rambler had been printed. On the 29th of April this newspaper assumed the title of "Payne's Universal Chronicle," &c.—MALONE.
fancied, excellence;" No. 89. "Physical evil moral good;" and his concluding paper on "The horror of the last," will prove this assertion. I know not why a motto, the usual trampling of periodical papers, is prefixed to very few of the Idlers, as I have heard Johnson commend the custom; and he never could be at a loss for a one, his memory being stored with innumerable passages of the classics. In this series of essays he exhibits admirable instances of grave humour, of which he had an uncommon share. Nor on some occasions has he repressed that power of sophistry which he possessed in so eminent a degree. In No. 11. he treats with the utmost contempt the opinion that our mental faculties depend, in some degree, upon the weather; an opinion, which they who have never experienced its truth are not to be envied, and of which he himself could not but be sensible, as the effects of weather upon him were very visible. Yet thus he declares:

"Surely, nothing is more reproachful to a being endowed with reason, than to resign its powers to the influence of the air, and live in dependence on the weather and the wind for the only blessings which nature has put into our power, tranquillity and benevolence. This distinction of seasons is produced only by imagination operating on luxury. To temperance, every day is bright; and every hour is propitious to diligence. He that shall resolutely excite his faculties, or exert his virtues, will soon make himself superior to the seasons; and may set at defiance the morning mist and the evening damp, the blasts of the east, and the clouds of the south."

Alas! it is too certain, that where the frame has delicate fibres, and there is a fine sensibility, such influences of the air are irresistible. He might as well have bid defiance to the ague, the palsy, and all other bodily disorders. Such boasting of the mind is false elevation.

"I think the Romans call it Stoicism."

But in this number of his Idler his spirits seem to run riot 1; for in the wantonness of his disposition he forgets, for a moment, even the reverence for that which he held in high respect; and describes "the attendant on a Court," as one "whose business is to watch the looks of a being, weak and foolish as himself." 2

His unqualified ridicule of rhetorical gesture or action is not, surely, a test of truth; yet we cannot help admiring how well it is adapted to produce the effect which he wished:

"Neither the judges of our laws, nor the representatives of our people, would be much affected by laboured gesticulations, or believe any man the more because he rolled his eyes, or puffed his cheeks, or spread abroad his arms, or stamped the ground, or thumped his breast; or turned his eyes sometimes to the ceiling, and sometimes to the floor."

A casual coincidence with other writers, or an adoption of a sentiment or image which has been found in the writings of another, and afterwards appears in the mind as one's own, is not un frequent. The richness of Johnson's fancy, which could supply his page abundantly on all occasions, and the strength of his memory, which at once detected the real owner of any thought, made him less liable to the imputation of plagiarism than, perhaps, any of our writers. In the Idler, however, there is a paper, in which conversation is assimilated to a bowl of punch, where there is the same train of comparison as in a poem by Blacklock, in his collection published in 1736; in which a parallel is ingeniously drawn between human life and that liquor. It ends,—

"Say, then, physicians of each kind, Who cure the body or the mind, What harm in drinking can there be, Since punch and life so well agree?"

To the Idler 3, when collected in volumes, he added, beside the Essay on Epitaphs, and the Dissertation on those of Pope, an Essay on the Bravery of the English common Soldiers. He, however, omitted one of the original papers, which in the folio copy is No. 22. 4

JOHNSON TO THOMAS Warton.

"London," April 14, 1758,

"Dear Sir,—Your notes upon my poet were very acceptable. I beg that you will be so kind as to continue your searches. It will be reproductive to my work, and suitable to your professorship, to have something of yours in the notes. As you have given no directions about your name, I shall therefore put it. I wish your brother would take the same trouble. A commentary must arise from the forti est discoveries of many men in devous walks of literature. Some of your remarks are on plays already printed: but I purpose to add an Appendix of Notes, so that nothing comes too late.

"You give yourself too much unceasing, dear Sir, about the loss of the papers. 5 The loss is nothing, if nobody has found them; nor even then, perhaps, if the numbers be known. You are not the only friend that has had the same mischance. You may repair your want out of a stock, which is deposited with Mr. Allen, of Magdalen Hall; or out of a parcel which I have just sent to Mr. Chambers, for the use of any body that will be so kind as to want them. Mr. Langtons are well; and Miss Roberts, whom I have at last brought to

1 This doctrine of the little influence of the weather, however, seems to have been his fixed opinion: he often repeated it in conversation. See post, p. 146.—CROKER.

2 Mr. Boswell seems resolved to forget that Johnson's reverence for the court had not yet commenced. George II. was still alive, whom Johnson always abused, and sometimes very indiscreetly. See ante, p. 42, and post, April 6, 1753.—CROKER.

3 Prior (Life of Goldsmith, i. 348.) denies that this paper was added to the early editions of the Idler, and supposes it to have been Goldsmith's; but it is evidently Johnson's style.

speak, upon the information which you gave me, that she had something to say. I am, &c.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHN TO THOMAS WARTON.

"London, June 1. 1758.

"DEAR SIR,—You will receive this by Mr. Baretti, a gentleman particularly entitled to the notice and kindness of the professor of poesy. He has time but for a short stay, and will be glad to have it filled up with as much as he can hear and see.

"In recommending another to your favour, I ought not to omit thanks for the kindness which you have shown to myself. Have you any more notes on Shakspeare? I shall be glad of them.

"I see you publish sometimes; his mind is as exalted as his stature. I am half afraid of him; but he is no less amiable than formidable. He will, if the forwardness of his spring be not blasted, be a credit to you, and to the University. He brings some of my plays* with him, which he has my permission to show you, on condition you will hide them from every body else. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

JOHN TO LANGTON,

"DEAR SIR,—I should be sorry to think that what engrosses the attention of my friend, should have no part of mine. Your mind is now full of the fate of Dury 2; but his fate is past, and nothing remains but to try what reflection will suggest to mitigate the terrors of a violent death, which is more formidable at the first glance, than on a nearer and more steady view. A violent death is never very painful; the only danger is lest it should be unpardoned. But if a man can be supposed to make no provision for death in war, what can be the state that would have awakened him to the care of futurity? When would that man have prepared himself to die, who went to seek death without preparation? What then can be the reason why we lament more him that dies of a wound, than him that dies of a fever? A man that languishes with disease, ends his life with more pain, but with less virtue: he leaves no example to his friends, nor bequeaths any honour to his descendants. The only reason why we lament a soldier's death, is, that we think he might have lived longer; yet this cause of grief is common to many other kinds of death, which are not so passionately bewailed. The truth is, that every death is violent which is the effect of accident; every death which is not gradually brought on by the miseries of age, or when life is extinguished for any other reason than that it is burnt out. He that dies before sixty, of a cold or consumption, dies, in reality, by a violent death; yet his death is borne with patience, only because the cause of his untimely end is silent and invisible. Let us endeavour to see things as they are, and then inquire whether we ought to complain. Whether to see life as it is, will give us much content; I know not; but the conclusion which is drawn from truth, if any there be, is solid and durable: that which may be derived from error, must be, like its original, fallacious and fugitive. I am, dear Sir, your most humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHN TO LANGTON,

At Langton.

"Jan. 9. 1759 (1759).

"DEAREST SIR,—I must have indeed slept very fast, not to have been awakened by your letter. None of your suspicions are true; I am not much richer than when you left me; and what is worse, my omission of an answer to your first letter will prove that I am not much wiser. But I go on as I formerly did, designing to be some time or other both rich and wise; and yet cultivate neither mind nor fortune. Do you take notice of my example, and learn the danger of delay. When I was as you are now, towering in [the] confidence of twenty-one, little did I suspect that I should be, at forty-nine, what I now am.

"But you do not seem to heed my admonition. You are busy in acquiring and in communicating knowledge, and while you are studying, enjoy the end of study, by making others wiser and happier. I was much pleased with the tale that you told me of being tutor to your sisters. If, who have no sisters nor brothers, look with some degree of innocent envy on those who may be said to be born to friends 4; and cannot see, without wonder, how rarely that native union is afterwards regarded. It sometimes, indeed, happens, that some supervenient cause of discord may overpower this original amity; but it seems to me more frequently thrown away with levity, or lost by negligence, than destroyed by injury or violence. We tell the ladies that good wives make good husbands; I believe it is a more certain position that good brothers make good sisters.

"I am satisfied with your stay at home, as Juvenal with his friend's retirement to Cumae: I know that your absence is but, though it be not best for me.

His lady and Mr. Langton's mother were sisters. He left an only son, Lieutenant-Colonel Dury, who has a company in the same regiment.—Bowell.
4 Gibbon, in his Memoirs, alludes to this subject with good taste and feeling:—"From my childhood to the present hour, I have deeply and sincerely regretted my sister, whose life was somewhat prolonged, and whom I remember to have seen an amiable infant. The relation of a brother and a sister, particularly if they do not marry, appears to me of a very singular advantage. It is a familiar and tender friendship with a female much about our own age; an affection perhaps softened by the secret influence of the sex, but pure from any mixture of sensual desire—the sole species of Platonic love that can be indulged with truth, and without danger." Mem., p. 26.—Croker.

in this, that she has not scattered her precepts in the wind, at least not those which she bestowed upon you.

"The two Martons just looked into the town, and were taken to see Cleone, where, David [Garrick] says, they were starved for want of company to keep them warm. David and Doddy 1 have had a new quarrel, and, I think, cannot conveniently quarrel any more. 'Cleone' was well acted by all the characters, but Bellamy 2 left nothing to be desired. I went one first night, and, as I was told; for Doddy, you know, is my patron, and I would not desert him. The play was very well received. Doddy, after the danger was over, went every night to the stage-side, and cried at the distress of poor Cleone.

"I have left off housekeeping, and therefore made presents of the game which you were pleased to send me. The pheasant I gave to Mr. Richardson 3, the bustard to Dr. Lawrence, and the pot I placed with Miss Williams, to be eaten by myself. She desires that her compliments and good wishes may be accepted by the family; and I make the same request for myself.

"Mr. Reynolds has within these few days raised his price to twenty guineas a head 4, and Miss 5 is much employed in miniatures. I know not any body [else] whose prosperity has increased since you left me.

"Murphy is to have his 'Orphan of China' acted next month; and is therefore, I suppose, happy. I wish I could tell you of any great good to which I was approaching, but at present my prospects do not much delight me; however, I am always pleased when I find that you, dear Sir, remember your affectionate, humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

In 1759, in the month of January, his mother died, at the great age of ninety, an event which deeply affected him; not that "his mind had acquired no firmness by the contemplation of mortality;" 6 but that his reverential affection for her was not abated by years, as indeed he retained all his tender feelings even to the latest period of his life. I have been told, that he regretted much his not having gone to visit his mother, for several years previous to her death. But he was constantly engaged in literary labours which confined him to London; and though he had not the comfort of seeing his aged parent, he contributed liberally to her support.

"HONOUR'D MADAM,—The account which Miss [Porter] gives me of your health pierces my heart. God comfort and preserve you and save you, for the sake of Jesus Christ.

"I would have Miss read to you from time to time the Passion of our Saviour, and sometimes the sentences in the Communion Service, beginning Come unto me, all ye that travail and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

"I have just now read a physical book, which inclines me to think that a strong infusion of the bark would do you good. Do, dear mother, try it.

"Pray, send me your blessing, and forgive all that I have done amiss to you. And whatever you have done, and what debts you would have paid first, or any wrong else that you would direct, let Miss [Porter] put it down; I shall endeavour to obey you.

"I have got twelve guineas 8 to send you, but unhappily am at a loss how to send it to-night. If I cannot send it to-night, it will come by the next post.

"Pray, do not omit any thing mentioned in this letter. God bless you for ever and ever.—I am your dutiful son,

JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER,
At Mrs. Johnson's, in Lichfield.

"16th Jan. 1759.

"My dear Miss,—I think myself obliged to you beyond all expression of gratitude for your care of my dear mother. God grant it may not be without success. Tell Kitty 10 that I shall never forget

4 Sir Joshua afterwards greatly advanced his price. I have been informed by Sir Thomas Lawrence, his admirer and rival, that in 1787 his prices were two hundred guineas for the whole length, one hundred for the half-length, seventy for the life-cast, and fifty for (what is called) the three-quarters. But even on these prices some increase must have been made, as Horace Walpole said, "Sir Joshua, in his old age, becomes avareous. He had one thousand guineas for my picture of the three ladies Walpolegraver."—Walpottan. This picture is half-lengths of the three ladies on one canvas.—Croker.

5 Miss Reynolds, the sister of Sir Joshua.—Croker.

6 Hawkins, p. 395. Mr. Boswell contradicts Hawkins, for the mere pleasure, as it would seem, of doing so. The reader must observe that Mr. Boswell's work is full of anecdotes of Johnson's want of firmness in contemplating mortality; (see a striking instance sub Oct. 20, 1759,1) and though Johnson may have a few words on the subject, there is reason to fear that he had never visited Lichfield, and, consequently, not seen his mother, since 1753. Mr. Boswell alleges as an excuse, that he was engaged in literary labours, which confined him to London. Such an excuse for an absence of twenty years is idle besides. It is stated that Johnson visited Ashbourne about 1740 (ante, p. 59), Tunbridge Wells in 1748 (ante, p. 58), Oxford in 1754 (ante, p. 88). We shall see presently, that Johnson felt remorse for this neglect.—Croker.

7 Since the publication of the third edition of this work, the following letters of Dr. Johnson, occasioned by the last illness of his mother, were obligingly communicated to Mr. Malone, by the Rev. Dr. Vyse. They are placed here agreeably to the chronological order almost uniformly observed by the author; and so strongly evince Dr. Johnson's piety and tenderness of heart, that every reader must be gratified by their insertion.—Malone. I have added some others.—Croker.

8 Written by mistake for 1759, as the subsequent letters show. On the outside of the letter of the 13th was written by another hand—"Pray acknowledge the receipt of this by return of post, without fall."—Malone.

9 Six of these twelve guineas Johnson appears to have borrowed from Mr. Allen, the printer. See Hawkins's Life of Johnson, p. 260, n.—Malone.

Yesterday, Oct. 17, I took my leave for ever of my dear old friend, Catherine Chambers, who came to live with my mother about 1724, and has been but little parted from us since. She buried my father, my brother, and my mother. She is now fifty-eight years old.—Malone.

"DEAR HONOUR'D MOTHER, — Neither your condition nor your character make it fit for me to say much. You have been the best mother, and I believe the best woman in the world. I thank you for your indulgence to me, and beg forgiveness of all that I have done ill, and all that I have omitted to do well. "You will conceive my sorrow for the loss of my mother, of the best mother. If she were to live again, surely I should behave better to her. But she is happy, and what is past is nothing to her; and for me, since I cannot repair my faults to her, I hope repentance will efface them. I return you and all those that have been good to her my sincerest thanks, and pray God to repay you all with infinite advantage. Write to me, and comfort me, dear child. I shall be glad likewise, if Kitty will write to me. I shall send a bill of twenty pounds in a few days, which I thought to have brought to my mother; but God suffered it not. I have not power or composure to say much more. God bless you, and bless us all. I am, dear Miss, your affectionate humble servant,

It is not of any use for me now to come down; nor can I bear the place. If you want any directions, Mr. Howard & will advise you. JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.

"6th Feb. 1759.

"DEAR MISS, — I have no reason to forbear writing, but that it makes my heart heavy, and I had nothing particular to say which might not be delayed to the next post; but had no thoughts of ceasing to correspond with my dear Lucy, the only person now left in the world with whom I think myself connected. There needed not my dear mother's desire, for every heart must lean to somebody, and I have nobody but you; in whom I put all my little affairs with too much confidence to desire you to keep receipts, as you prudently proposed.

1 This letter was written on the second leaf of the preceding, addressed to Miss Porter. — Malone.

2 So, in the prayer which he composed on this occasion: "Almighty God, merciful Father, in whose hands are life and death, satisfy unto me the sorrow which I now feel. Forgive me whatever I have done unwisely to my mother, and what I have omitted to do kindly. Make me to remember her good precepts and good example, and to reform my life according to thy holy word," &c. — Prayers and Meditations, p. 31. — Malone.

3 Mrs. Johnson probably died on the 20th or 21st January, and was buried on the day this letter was written. — Malone.

4 Mr. Murphy states: "With this supply (the price of Rasselas) Johnson set out for Lichfield; but did not arrive in time to close the eyes of a parent whom he loved. He attended the funeral, which, as appears among his memo-

5 Randums, was on the 22d of January, 1759." It is clear, from all these letters, that he did not personally attend on that occasion, and the memorandum mentioned must have referred to the date or expenses of the funeral, and not to his own presence. Rasselas was not written, nor of course, it may be presumed, sold, till two months later. — Croker.

6 Mr. Howard was a prior in the Ecclesiastical Court, and resided in the Close. — Croker.

7 "No. 41. of the Idler," says Hawkins, "though it takes the character of a letter to the author, was written by Johnson himself on his mother's death, and may be supposed to describe as truly as pathetically his sentiments on the separation of friends and relations. But it is observable that the Idlers, which now bear the dates of the 13th and 20th January, are on trivial subjects, and are even written in a vein of pleasantry. — Croker."
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON.

"If you and Kitty will keep the house, I think I shall like it best. Kitty may carry on the trade for herself, keeping her own stock apart, and laying aside any money that she receives for any of the goods which her good mistress has left behind her. I do not see, if this scheme be followed, any need of apprising the books. My mother's debts, dear mother, I suppose I may pay with little difficulty; and the little trade may go silently forward. I fancy Kitty can do nothing better; and I shall not want to put her out of a house, where she has lived so long, and with so much virtue. I am very sorry that she is ill, and earnestly hope that she will soon recover; let her know that I have the highest value for her, and would do any thing for her advantage. Let her think of this proposal. I do not see any likelier method by which she may pass the remaining part of her life in quietness and competence."

"You must have what part of the house you please, while you are inclined to stay in it; but I flatter myself with the hope that you and I shall some time pass our days together. I am very solitary and comfortless, but will not invite you to come hither till I can have hope of making you live here, without disliking your stay. I pray, my dearest, write to me as often as you can. I am, dear Madam, your affectionate humble servant,

"1st March, 1758[9].

"DEAR MADAM,—I thought your last letter long in coming; and did not require or expect such an inventory of little things as you have sent me. I could have taken your word for a matter of much greater value. I am glad that Kitty is better; let her be paid first, as my dear, dear mother ordered, and then let me know at once the sum necessary to discharge her other debts, and I will find it you very soon.

"I beg, my dear, that you would act for me without the least scruple, for I can repose myself very confidently upon your prudence, and hope we shall never have reason to love each other less. I shall take it very kindly if you make it a rule to write to me once at least every week, for I am now very desolate, and am loth to be universally forgotten. I am, dear sweet, your affectionate servant,

Pearson MSS.

Soon after his mother's death, he wrote his "Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia:" 3 concerning the publication of which Sir John Hawkins guesses vaguely and kindly, 4 instead of having taken the trouble to inform himself with authentic precision. Not to trouble my readers with a repetition of the knight's ravies, I have to mention, that the late Mr. Strahan the printer told me, that Johnson wrote it, that with the profits he might defray the expense of his mother's funeral, and pay some little debts which she had left. He told Sir Joshua Reynolds, that he composed it in the evenings of one week, 5 sent it to the press in portions as it was written, and had never since read it over. Mr. Strahan, Mr. Johnston, and Mr. Dodson purchased it for a hundred pounds, but afterwards paid him twenty-five pounds more, when it came to a second edition.

Considering the large sums which have been received for compilations, and works requiring not much more genius than compilations, we cannot but wonder at the very low price which he was content to receive for this admirable performance; which, though he had written nothing else, would have rendered his name immortal in the world of literature. None of his writings has been so extensively diffused over Europe; for it has been translated into most, if not all, of the modern languages. This tale, with all the charms of oriental imagery, and all the force and beauty of which the English language is capable, leads us through the most important scenes of human life, and shows us that this stage of our being is full of "vanity and vexation of spirit." To those who look no further than the present life, or who maintain that human nature has not fallen from the state in which it was created, the instruction of this sublime story will be of no avail. But they who think justly, and feel with strong sensibility, will listen with eagerness and admiration to its truth and wisdom. Voltaire's Candide, written to refute the system of Optimism, which it has accomplished with brilliant success, is wonderfully similar in its plan and conduct to Johnson's Rasselas; insomuch, that I have heard Johnson say, that if they had not been published so closely one after the other that there was not time for imitation, it would have been in vain to deny that the scheme of that which came latest was taken from the other. Though the proposition illustrated by both these works was the same, namely, that in our present state there is more evil than good, the intention of the writers was very different. Voltaire, I am afraid, meant only by wanton profaneness to obtain a sportive victory over religion, and to discredit the belief of a superintending Providence: Johnson meant, by showing the unsatisfactory nature of things temporal, to direct the hopes of man to things eternal. Rasselas, as was observed to me by a very accomplished lady, may be considered as a more enlarged and more deeply philosophical discourse in prose, upon the interesting truth, which in his "Vanity of 1 Hawkins's account is substantially the same as Mr. Boswell's. — Croker.

2 Rasselas was published in March or April, 1759—Boswell.

3 In chapter 24, Johnson, in the character of Imlac, pathetically describes his own feelings: "I have neither mother to be delighted with the reputation of her son, nor wife to partake the honours of her husband." — Malone.

4 See under June 2. 1791. Finding it then accidentally in a chaise with Mr. Boswell, he read it eagerly. This was doubtless long after his declaration to Sir Joshua Reynolds. — Malone.

5 This is not quite exact. The appearance of the two works was very near; but it seems that Johnson might have seen Caudle, which was published at last in February 1759, (Grimm, li. 388.) and Rasselas was written, it appears, towards the middle of March. — Croker.
Human Wishes” he had so successfully enforced in verse.

The fund of thinking which this work contains is such, that almost every sentence of it may furnish a subject of long meditation. I am not satisfied if a year passes without my having read it through; and at every perusal, my admiration of the mind which produced it is so highly raised, that I can scarcely believe that I had the honour of enjoying the intimacy of such a man.

I restrain myself from quoting passages from this excellent work, or even referring to them, because I should not know what to select, or, rather, what to omit. I shall, however, transcribe one, as it shows how well he could state the arguments of those who believe in the appearance of departed spirits: a doctrine which it is a mistake to suppose that he himself ever positively held:

"If all your fear be of apparitions (said the prince), I will promise you safety: there is no danger from the dead; he that is once buried will be seen no more.

"That the dead are seen no more (said 1mlac), I will not undertake to maintain, against the concurrent and unvaried testimony of all ages, and of all nations. There is no people, rude or learned, among whom apparitions of the dead are not related and believed. This opinion, which prevails as far as human nature is diffused, could become universal only by its truth; those that never heard of one another, would not have agreed in a tale which nothing but experience can make credible. That it is doubted by single cavillers, can very little weaken the general evidence; and some who deny it with their tongues, confess it by their fears."

Notwithstanding my high admiration of Rasselas, I will not maintain that the "morbid melancholy" in Johnson's constitution may not, perhaps, have made life appear to him more insipid and unhappier than it generally is: for I am sure that he had less enjoyment from it than I have. Yet, whatever additional shade his own particular sensations may have thrown on his representation of life, attentive observation and close enquiry have convinced me, that there is too much reality in the gloomy picture. The truth, however, is, that we judge of the happiness and misery of life differently at different times, according to the state of our changeable frame. I always remember a remark made to me by a Turkish lady, educated in France: "Ma foi, monsieur, notre bonheur dépend de la façon que notre sang circule." This has I learnt from a pretty hard course of experience, and would, from sincere benevolence, impress upon all who honour this book with a perusal, that until a steady conviction is obtained, that the present life is an imperfect state, and only a passage to a better, if we comply with the divine scheme of progressive improvement; and also that it is a part of the mysterious plan of Providence, that intellectual beings must "be made perfect through suffering;" there will be a continual recurrence of disappointment and uneasiness. But if we walk with hope in "the mid-day sun" of revelation, our temper and disposition will be such, that the comforts and enjoyments in our way will be relished, while we patiently support the inconveniences and pains. After much speculation and various reasons, I acknowledge myself convinced of the truth of Voltaire’s conclusion, "Après tout, c’est un monde passable." But we must not think too deeply:

"— where ignorance is bliss, 'Tis folly to be wise."

is, in many respects, more than poetically just.

Let us cultivate, under the command of good principles, "la théorie des sensations agréables;" and, as Mr. Burke once admirably counselled a grave and anxious gentleman, "live pleasant."

The effect of Rasselas, and of Johnson’s other moral tales, is thus beautifully illustrated by Mr. Courtenay:

"Impressive truth, in splendid fiction drest, Checks the vain wish, and calms the troubled breast: O'er the dark mind a light celestial throws, And soothes the angry passions to repose; As oil effus’d illumines and smooths the deep, When round the bark the foaming surges sweep."

It will be recollected, that during all this year he carried on his Idler; and no doubt

1 This is a mere sophism: all ages and all nations are not agreed on this point, though such a belief may have existed in particular persons, in all ages and all nations. He might as well have said that insanity was the natural and true state of the human mind, because it has existed in all nations and all ages.—Croker.

2 Mr. Boswell, no doubt, saw some meaning in these words; but what that meaning might be, I cannot guess.—Croker.

3 This paper was in such high estimation before it was collected into volumes, that it was seized on with avidity by various publishers of newspapers and magazines, to enrich their publications. Johnson, to put a stop to this unfair proceeding, wrote for the Universal Chronicle the following advertisement; in which there is, perhaps, more pomp of words than the occasion demanded:

"London, Jan. 8, 1792. ADVERTISEMENT. The proprietors of the paper entitled 'The Idler,' having found that those articles which are inserted in the newspapers and magazines with so little regard to justice or decency, that the Universal Chronicle, in which they first appear, is not always men-he was also proceeding, though slowly, in his edition of Shakspeare. He, however, from that liberality which never failed, when called upon to assist other labourers in literature, found time to translate, for Mrs. Lenox's Enlish version of Brumoy, "A Dissertation on the Greek Comedy," and "The General Conclusion of the Book." An inquiry into the state of foreign countries was an object that seems at all times to have interested Johnson. Hence Mr. Newbury found no great difficulty in persuading him to write the Introduction* to a collection of voyages and travels published by him under the title of "The World Displayed:" the first volume of which appeared this year, and the remaining volumes in subsequent years.

I would ascribe to this year the following letter to a son of one of his early friends at Lichfield, Mr. Joseph Simpson, barrister, and author of a tract entitled "Reflections on the Study of the Law."

JOHNSON TO SIMPSON.

"Dear Sir,—Your father's inexpressibility not only grieves but amazes me: he is your father; he was always accounted a wise man; nor do I remember any thing to the disadvantage of his good nature; but in his refusal to assist you there is neither good nature, fatherhood, nor wisdom. It is the practice of good nature to overlook faults which have already, by the consequences, punished the delinquent. It is natural for a father to think more favourably than others of his children; and it is always wise to give assistance, while a little help will prevent the necessity of greater.
"If you married imprudently, your marriage has misaccompanied you. Your own health, at an age when you had a right of choice. It would be hard if the man might not choose his own wife, who has a right to plead before the judges of this country.
"If your imprudence has increased difficulties and inconveniences, you are yourself to support them, and with the help of a little better health, you would support them and conquer them.
Surely, that want which accident and sickness produce is to be supported in every region of humanity, though there were neither friends nor fathers in the world. You have certainly from your father the highest claim of charity, though none of right; and therefore I would counsel you to omit no decent or manly degree of importunity. Your debts in the whole are not large, and of the whole but a small part is troublesome. Small debts are like small shot; they are rattling on every side, and can scarcely be escaped without a wound; great debts are like cannon; of loud noise, but little danger. You must, therefore, be enabled to discharge petty debts, that you may have leisure, with security, to struggle with the rest. Neither the great nor little debts disgrace you. I am sure you have my esteem for the courage which you contracted them, and the spirit in which you endure them. I wish my esteem could be of more use. I have been invited, or have invited myself, to several parts of the kingdom; and will not incommode my dear Lucy by coming to Lichfield, while her present lodging is of any use to her. I hope, in a few days, to be at leisure, and to make visits. Whither I shall fly is matter of no importance. A man unconnected is at home every where, unless he may be said to be at home no where. I am sorry, dear Sir, that where you have parents, the man of your merits should not have a home. I wish I could give it you. I am, my dear Sir, affectionately yours,
S. J. JOHNSON.

He now refreshed himself by an excursion to Oxford, of which the following short characteristical notice, in his own words, is pres-served:

"— I am now making tea for me. I have been in my gown ever since I came here. It was at my first coming, quite new and handsomer. I have worn thrice, which I had disused for many years. I have proposed to Vansittart* climbing over the wall, but he has refused me. And I have clapped my hands till they are sore, at Dr. King's speech." His negro servant, Francis Barber, having left him, and been some time at sea, not pressed as has been supposed, but with his own consent, it appears from a letter to John Wilkes, Esq., from Dr. Smollett, that his master kindly interested himself in procuring his re-nvestment from a state of life of which Johnson always expressed the utmost abhorrence.
He once said, "No man will be a sailor who has contrivance enough to get himself into a jail; for being in a ship is being in a jail, with the chance of being drowned." [August 31, 1773.
And at another time, "A man in a jail has at an humble price; yet not with a view of growing rich by con confiscations, for we think not much better of money got by punishment than by crimes. We shall therefore, when our losses are repaid, give what profit shall remain to the Mag-dan, for we know not who can be more properly taxed for the support of penitent prostitutes, than prostitutes in whom there yet appears neither penitence nor shame." — Boswell.

4 Dr. Robert Vansittart, of the ancient and respectable family of that name in Berkshire. He was eminent for learning and worth, and much esteemed by Dr. Johnson.— Boswell. Dr. Robert Vansittart, L.L.D., professor of civil law at Oxford, and recorder of Windsor. He was a senior fellow of All Souls, where, after he had given up the profession in London, he chiefly resided in a set of rooms, formerly the old library, which he had fitted up in the French style, and where he died about 1794. He was remarkable for his good humour and inoffensive wit, and a great favourite on the Oxford circuit. He was tall and very thin; and the bar gave the name of Counselor Ian to a sharp-pointed rock on the Wyke, which still retains the name. He was the elder brother of Mr. Henry Vansittart, government agent of the present Lord Bexley, to whom I am indebted for the more room, better food, and commonly better company." [September 23, 1773.] The letter was as follows:

"Chelsea, 16th March, 1759.

"DEAR SIR,—I am again your petitioner, in behalf of that great Cham 1 of literature, Samuel Johnson. His black servant, whose name is Francis Barber, has been pressed on board the Stag frigate, Captain Angel, and our lexicographer is in great distress. He says the hay is a sickly lad, in a delicate frame, and particularly subject to a malady in his throat, which renders him very unfit for his Majesty's service. You know what matter of animosity the said Johnson has against you: and I dare say you desire no other opportunity of resenting it, than that of laying him under an obligation. He was humble enough to desire my assistance on this occasion, though he and I were never extercousins; and I gave him to understand that I would make application to my friend Mr. Wilkes, who perhaps would intercede for him. Mr. Elliot, might be able to procure the discharge of his laqucy. It would be superfluous to say more on this subject, which I leave to your own consideration; but I cannot let slip this opportunity of declaring that I am, with the most inviolable esteem and attachment, dear Sir, your affectionate, obliged, humble servant, T. Smollett." 2

Mr. Wilkes, who upon all occasions has acted, as a private gentleman, with most polite liberality, applied to his friend Sir George Hay, then one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty; and Francis Barber was discharged, as he has told me, without any wish of his own. 3 He found his old master in Chambers in the Inner Temple, and returned to his service.

What particular new scheme of life Johnson had in view this year, I have not discovered; but that he meditated one of some sort, is clear from his private deviations, in which we find [24th March] "the change of outward things which I am now to make;" and 4 "Grant the grace of the Holy Spirit, that the course which I am now beginning may proceed according to thy laws, and end in the enjoyment of thy favour." But he did not, in fact, make any external or visible change. 5

1 In my first edition this word was printed Cham, as it appears in one of Mr. Wilkes's Miscellanies, and I unactorted Dr. Smollett's ignorance; for which let me propitiate the names of that ingenious and benevolent gentleman. Cham was certainly a mistaken reading for Cham, the title of the Sovereign of Tartary, which is well applied to Johnson, the Monarch of Literature; and was an epitaph familiar to Smollett. See "Roderick Random," chap. vii. For this correction I am indebted to Lord Palmerston, whose talents and literary acquirements accord well with his respectable position of Temple, Boswell.

After the publication of the second edition of this work, the author was furnished by Mr. Abercrombie, of Philadelphia, with the copy of a letter written by Dr. John Arms-strong, the poet, to Dr. Smollett, at Leghorn, containing the following paragraph:

"As to the King's Bench, I am not likely to press this matter further. My friends express their full confidence, and I am now on board the Queen's ship, with every prospect of being acquitted. I am, therefore, under the impression that the charge against me is false. I wish to be acquitted, and not to be persecuted for my exertions in this unjust cause."—MALONE.

2 He was discharged till June 1759.

3 Dr. Johnson's acquaintance with Mrs. Montagu probably began about this period. We find, in this year, the first of

This and several other letters, which will be found in their proper places, I owe to the liberality of [the second] Lord Rockeyby, the nephew and heir of Mrs. Montagu.

It is necessary to direct the attention of the reader to the warm terms in which Johnson so frequently expresses his admiration and esteem for Mrs. Montagu, as we shall see that he afterwards took another tone. 10

At this time, there being a competition among the architects of London to be employed in the building of Blackfriars Bridge, a question was very warmly agitated whether semicircular or elliptical arches were preferable. In the design offered by Mr. Mylne the elliptical form was adopted, and therefore it was the great object of his rivals to attack it. Johnson's regard for his friend Mr. Gwyn induced him to engage in this controversy against Mr. Mylne; and after being at considerable pains to study the subject, he wrote three several letters in the Gazeteter, in opposition to his plan.

If it should be remarked that this was a controversy which lay quite out of Johnson's way, let it be remembered, that after all, his employing his powers of reasoning and eloquence upon a subject which he had studied on the moment, is not more strange than what we often observe in lawyers, who, as Quixana, aguat hominem, is the matter of their trade, are sometimes obliged to pick up a temporary knowledge of an art or science, of which they understand nothing till their brief was delivered, and appear to be much masters of it. In like manner, members of the legislature frequently introduce and expatriate upon subjects of which they have informed themselves for the occasion.

CHAPTER XIV.

In 1760 he wrote "An Address of the Painters to George III. on his Accession to the Throne of these Kingdoms," which no monarch ever ascended with more sincere congratulations from his people. Two generations of foreign princes had prepared their minds to rejoice in having again a king who gloried in being "Great." He also wrote for Mr. Baretti the Dedication of his Italian and English Dictionary, to the Marquis of Abreu, then Envoy-Extraordinary from Spain at the Court of Great Britain.

Johnson was now either very idle, or very busy with his Shakspeare; for I can find no other public composition by him except an Introduction to the Proceedings of the Committee for Clothing the French Prisoners; one of the many proofs that he was ever awake to the calls of humanity; and an account which he gave in the Gentleman's Magazine of Mr. Tytler's acute and able vindication of Mary Queen of Scots. The generosity of Johnson's feelings shines forth in the following sentence:

"It has now been fashionable, for near half a century, to defame and vilify the house of Stuart.
and to exalt and magnify the reign of Elizabeth.
The Stuarts have found few apologists, for the death cannot pay for praise; and who will, without reward, oppose the tide of popularity? Yet there remain, and will remain among us, not wholly extinguished, a zeal for truth, a desire of establishing right in opposition to fashion."

In this year I have not discovered a single private letter written by him to any of his friends. It should seem, however, that he had at this period a floating intention of writing a history of the recent and wonderful successes of the British arms in all quarters of the globe;
for among his resolutions or memorandums, September 18., there is, "Send for books for Hist. of War." 1 How much is it to be regretted that this intention was not fulfilled!
His majestic expression would have carried down to the latest posterity the glorious achievements of his country, with the same fervent glow which they produced on the mind at the time. He would have been under no temptation to deviate in any degree from truth, which he held very sacred, or to take alicence, which a learned divine told me he once seemed, in a conversation, jocularly to allow to historians. "There are (said he) inexcusable lies, and consecrated lies. For instance, we are told that on the arrival of the news of the unfortunate battle of Fontenoy, every heart beat and every eye was in tears. Now we know that no man ate his dinner the worse, but there should have been all this concern; and to say there was (smiling), may be reckoned a consecrated lie."

This year Mr. Murphy, having thought himself ill-treated by the Rev. Dr. Franklin, who was one of the writers of "The Critical Review," published an indignant vindication in "A Poetical Epistle to Samuel Johnson, A. M." in which he compliments Johnson in a just and elegant manner: —

"Transcendent Genius! whose prolific vein
Ne'er knew the frigid poet's toil and pain;

To whom Apollon opens all his store,
Murphy's and every Muse presents her sacred lore; Say, powerful Johnson, whence thy verse is sprung?
With so much grace, such energy of thought;
Whether thy Juvenal instructs the age
In chaster numbers, and new-points his rage;
Or fair Irene sees, alas! too late,
Her innocence exchanged for guilty state;
What'er you write, in every golden line
Sublimity and elegance combine;
Thy nervous phrase impresses every soul,
While harmony gives capture to the whole."

Again, towards the conclusion:

"Thou then, my friend, who see'st the dange'rous strike
In which some demon bids me plunge my life,
To the Aonian fount direct my feet,
Say, where the Nine thy lonely musings meet;
Where warbles to thy ear the sacred throng,
Whose moral sense, thy dignity of song;
Tell, for you can, by what usurning art
You wake to finer feelings every heart.
In each right page some truth important give,
And bid to future times thy Rambler live."

I take this opportunity to relate the manner in which an acquaintance first commenced between Dr. Johnson and Mr. Murphy. During the publication of "The Gray's Inn Journal," a periodical paper which was successfully carried on by Mr. Murphy alone, when a very young man, he happened to be in the country with Mr. Foote; and having mentioned that he was obliged to go to London in order to get ready for the press one of the numbers of that journal, Foote said to him, "You need not go on that account. Here is a French magazine, in which you will find a very pretty oriental tale; translate that and send it to your printer."
Mr. Murphy having read the tale, was highly pleased with it, and followed Foote's advice.
When he returned to town, this tale was pointed out to him in "The Rambler," from whence it had been translated into the French magazine. 3 Mr. Murphy then waited upon not acknowledge that this poetical epistle was an imitation of Bolzoni's Epître à Molécure. I shun two or three during from Boileau and Murphy, which will show how little the epistle of the latter is entitled to the character of originality — in fact, such an unacknowledged use of an author is almost plagiarism.

Rare et fameux esprit, dont la fertile reine
Ignore, en écrivant, le travail et la peine.
Transcendent genius! whose prolific vein
Ne'er knew the frigid poet's toil and pain.
Souvent j'ai beau rire du matin jusqu'au soir,
Quand je vous dire blanche, la claire douceur voir.
In feverish toil I pass the weary night,
And what she would say to me, I relate her white.
On puisque, enfant, tes soins y seront superbus, Molécure, enseigne moi l'art de te rimer plus.
And since I never can learn thy classic lore, Instruct me, Johnson, how to write no more.

1 The following memorandum, made on his birthday in this tions which he was in the habit of making, for the guidance of his moral conduct and literary studies:

The fourth item refers probably to some resolutions he had committed to writing after contemplating his wife's coif-fin, which had broken down before his eyes, he had not lately looked at. This is confirmed by one of his prayers on her death, (25th April 1752.) "Endeavour me to conserve the purposes which I recorded in thy sight, when she lay dead before me." — MARKLAND, 1846.

2 When Mr. Murphy first became acquainted with Dr.
Johnson he was about thirty-one years old. He died at Knutstorp, June 16, 1805, in his eighty-second year. The extraordinary paper mentioned in the text (The History of Alouezaid, the Son of Mural) is No. 38. of the second series of the [Gray's Inn Journal], published on June 15, 1754; which is a re-translation from the French version of the Rambler, No. 100. — MALONE.
Johnson, to explain this curious incident. His talents, literature, and gentleman-like manners were soon perceived by Johnson, and a friendship was formed which was never broken.

JOHNSON TO LANGTON,
At Langton. "October 18, 1760.

"Dear Sir,—You that travel about the world, have more materials for letters, than I who stay at home; and should, therefore, write with frequency equal to your industry. I should be glad to have all England surveyed by you, if you would impart your observations in narratives as agreeable as your last. Knowledge is always to be wished to those who can communicate it well. While you have been riding and running, and seeing the tombs of the learned, and the camps of the valiant, I have only staid at home, and intended to do great things, which I have not done. Beau[1] went away to Cheshire, and has not yet found his way back. Chambers passed the vacation at Oxford.

"I am very sincerely solicitous for the preservation or curing of Mr. Langton's sight, and am glad that the chirurgeon, at Coventry gives him so much hope. Mr. Sharp is of opinion that the tedious maturation of the cataract is a vulgar error,[2] and that it may be removed as soon as it is formed. This notion deserves to be considered; I doubt whether it be universally true; but if it be true in some cases, and those cases can be distinguished, it may save a long and uncomfortable delay.

"Of dear Mrs. Langton you give me no account; which is the less friendly, as you know how highly I think of her, and how much I interest myself in her health. I suppose you told her of my opinion, and likewise suppose it was not followed; however I still believe it to be right.

"Let me hear from you again, wherever you are, or whatever you are doing; whether you wander or sit still, plant trees or make Rustics,[3] play with your sisters or muse alone; and in return I will tell you the success of Sheridan[4], who at this instant is playing Cato, and has already played Richard twice. He had more company the second than the first night, and will make me believe a good figure in the whole, though his faults seem to be very many; some of natural deficiency, and some of laborious affectation. He has, I think, no power of assuming either that dignity or elegance which some men, who have little of either in common life, can exhibit on the stage. His voice when strained is unpleasing, and when low is not always heard. He seems to think too much on the audience, and turns his face too often to the galleries.

"However, I wish him well; and among other reasons, because I like his wife.[5] Make haste to write to dear Sir, your most affectionate servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."[6]

In 1761 Johnson appears to have done little. He was still, no doubt, proceeding in his edition of Shakspeare; but what advances he made in it cannot be ascertained. He certainly was at this time not active; for in his scrupulous examination of himself on Easter eve, he laments, in his too vigorous mode of censuring his own conduct, that his life, since the communion of the preceding Easter, had been "dissipated and useless." (Pr. and Med.) p. 44.) He, however, contributed this year the Preface * to "Rolt's Dictionary of Trade and Commerce," in which he displays such a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the subject, as might lead the reader to think that its author had devoted all his life to it. I asked him whether he knew much of Rolt, and of his work. "Sir, (said he) I never saw the man, and never read the book. The booksellers wanted a Preface to a Dictionary of Trade and Commerce. I knew very well what such a Dictionary should be, and I wrote a Preface accordingly." Rolt, who wrote a great deal for the booksellers, was, as Johnson told me, a singular character. Though not in the least acquainted with him, he used to say, "I am just come from Sam. Johnson." This was a sufficient specimen of his vanity and impudence. But he gave a more eminent proof of it in our sister kingdom, as Dr. Johnson informed me. When Akenside's "Pleasures of the Imagination" first came out, he did not put his name to the poem. Rolt went over to Dublin, published an edition of it, and put his own name to it. Upon the fame of this he lived for several months, being entertained at the best tables as "the ingenious Mr. Rolt."[7]

[2] Mr. Sharp seems to have once been of a different opinion on this point. See ante, p. 74, n. 2. — Croker.

[3] Essays with that title, written about this time by Mr. Langton, but not published. — Boswell.

[4] Thomas Sheridan, son of the friend of Swift, and father of Richard Brinley Sheridan, was born at Quinla, in Ireland, in 1751, and died in 1789. This was his first appearance at Drury Lane for sixteen years. — Croker.

[5] Mrs. Sheridan [Frances Chamberlain] was author of "Memoirs of Miss Sydney Biddulph," a novel of great merit, and of some other pieces. — Boswell. Her last work is, perhaps, her best. — Noufrahel, an eastern tale: in which a pure morality is incidents, and she has a great deal of fancy and considerable force. No wonder that Dr. Johnson should have liked her! Dr. Parr, in a letter to Mr. Moore, published in his Life of It. B. Sheridan (vol. 1, p. 11), thus mentions her:—"I once or twice met her mother,—she was quite eleclial! both her virtues and her genius were highly esteemed by him. He was acquainted with a celebrated woman who died at Blois, in September, 1766; though the Biographical Dictionary, and other authorities, place her death in 1767. See post, sub May 1765. — Croker.

[6] Extract from a letter of Birch to Lord Royston, dated London, October 25, 1790:—"Sam. Johnson is in treaty with certain booksellers to supply three papers a week, in the nature of Essays, like the Rambler, at the unusual rate of sixpence a paper. But I question whether the temptation of even so liberal a reward will awaken him from his natural indolence; for while his Rambler was publishing, which came out but twice a week, the proprietor of it, Cave, told me that copy was seldom sent to the press till late in the night before the day of publication." — Markland.

[7] I have had inquiry made in Ireland as to this story, but do not find it recollected there. I give it on the authority of Dr. Johnson, who said he was told that of the "Biographical Dictionary," and "Biographia Dramatica," in both of which it has stood many years. Mr. Malone observes, that the truth probably is, not that an edition was published with Rolt's name in the title-page, but that the poem being then anonymous, Rolt acquainted its being attributed to him in "the Biographical Dictionary." In the late edition of Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary, the foregoing story is indeed noticed, but with an observation that it has been refuted. Richard Rolt died in March, 1770. — Croker.
His conversation, indeed, did not discover much of the fire of a poet; but it was recollected, that both Addison and Thomson were equally dull till excited by wine. Akenside, having been informed of this imposition, vindicated his right by publishing the poem with its real author's name. Several instances of such literary fraud have been detected. The Rev. Dr. Campbell, of St. Andrew's, wrote "An Enquiry into the original of Moral Virtue," the manuscript of which he sent to Mr. Innes, a clergyman in England, who was his countryman and acquaintance. Innes published it with his own name to it; and before the imposition was discovered, obtained considerable promotion, as a reward of his merit. 1 The celebrated Dr. Hugh Blair, and his cousin Mr. George Bannatine, when students in divinity, wrote a poem, entitled "The Resurrection," copies of which were handed about in manuscript. They were, at length, very much surprised to see a pompous edition of it in folio, dedicated to the Princess Dowager of Wales, by a Dr. Douglas, as his own. Some years ago a little novel, entitled "The Man of Feeling," was assumed by Mr. Eccles, a young Irish clergyman, who was afterwards drowned near Bath. 2 He had been at the pains to transcribe the whole book, with blottings, interlineations, and corrections, that it might be shown to several people as an original. It was, in truth, the production of Mr. Henry Mackenzie, an attorney in the exchequer at Edinburgh, who is the author of several other ingenious pieces; 3 but the belief with regard to Mr. Eccles became so general, that it was thought necessary for Messieurs Strahan and Cadell to publish an advertisement in the newspapers, contradicting the report, and mentioning that they purchased the copyright of Mr. Mackenzie. I can conceive this kind of fraud to be very easily practiced with successful effrontery. The falsity of a literary performance is difficult of proof; seldom is there any witness present at its birth. A man, either in confidence or by improper means, obtains possession of a copy of it in manuscript, and boldly publishes it as his own. The true author, in many cases, may not be able to make his title clear. Johnson, indeed, from the peculiar features of his literary offspring, might bid defiance to any attempt to appropriate them to others:

"But Shakspeare's magic could not copied be; Within that circle none durst walk but he!"

[JOHN TO MISS PORTER.

"Inner Temple Lane, Jan. 13. 1761.

"Dearest Madam,—I ought to have begun the new year with repairing the omissions of the last, and to have told you sooner, what I can always tell you with truth, that I wish you long life and happiness, always increasing till it shall end at last in the happiness of heaven.

"I hope, my dear, you are well; I am at present pretty much disorder'd by a cold and cough; I have just been blooded, and hope I shall be better.

He this year lent his friendly assistance to correct and improve a pamphlet written by Mr. Gwyn, the architect, entitled "Thoughts on the Coronation of George III." 4

Johnson had now for some years admitted Mr. Baretti to his intimacy; nor did their friendship cease upon their being separated by Baretti's revisiting his native country, as appears from Johnson's letters to him.

JOHN TO JOSEPH BARETTI,

At Milan.

"You reproach me very often with parsimony of writing; but you may discover, by the extent of my paper, that I design to recompense rarity by length. A short letter to a distant friend is, in my opinion, an insult like that of a slight bow or cursory salutation;—a proof of unwillingness to do much, even where there is a necessity of doing something. Yet it must be remembered, that he who continues the same course of life in the same place, will have little to tell. One week and one year are very like one another. The silent changes made by him are not always perceived; and if they are not perceived, cannot be recounted. I have risen and lain down, talked and mused, while you have roved over a considerable part of Europe; yet I have not envied my Baretti any of his pleasures, though, perhaps, I have envied others his company; and I am glad to have other nations made acquainted with the character of the English, by a traveller who has so nicely inspected our manners, and so successfully studied our literature. I received your kind letter from Falmouth, in which you gave me notice of your departure for Lisbon; and another from Lisbon, in which you told me that you were to leave Portugal in a few days, To either of these how could any answer be returned? I have had a third from Turin, complaining that I have not answered the former.

1 I have both the books. Innes was the clergyman who brought Pissimnazar to England, and was an accomplice in his extraordinary fiction. — Boswell.

2 "Died, the Rev. Mr. Eccles, at Bath. In attempting to save a boy, whom he saw sinking in the Avon, he, together with the youth, were both drowned." — Gent. Mag. Aug. 15, 1777. And in the magazine for the next month are some verses on this event, with an epitaph, of which the first line is,

"Beneath this stone the "Man of Feeling" lies.—Croker.

3 Henry Mackenzie, Esq. died at Edinburgh, Jan. 14, 1831, in his eighty-sixth year. He was an intimate friend of Sir Walter Scott's, who has written life of, and at whose house I had the pleasure of meeting that amiable old man.—Croker, 1846.

4 The originals of Dr. Johnson's three letters to Mr. Baretti, which are among the very best he ever wrote, were communicated to the proprietors of that instructive and elegant monthly miscellanies, "The European Magazine," in which they first appeared. — Boswell.
Your English style still continues in its purity and vigour. With vigour your genius will supply it; but its purity must be continued by close attention. To use two languages familiarly, and without contaminating one by the other, is very difficult; and to use more than two, is hardly to be hoped. The praises which some have received for their multiplicity of languages, may be sufficient to excite industry, but can hardly excite confidence.

I know not whether I can heartily rejoice at the kind reception which you have found, or at the popularity to which you are exalted. I am willing that your merit should be distinguished; but cannot wish that your affections may be gained. I would have you happy wherever you are: yet I would have you wish to return to England. If ever you visit us again, you will find the kindness of your friends undiminished. To tell you how many inquiries are made after you, would be tedious, if not tedious, would be vain; because you may be sure that all who knew you wish you well; and that all that you embraced at your departure, will caress you at your return: therefore do not let Italian academicians nor Italian ladies drive us from your thoughts. You may find among us what you will leave behind, soft smiles and easy sonnets. Yet I shall not wonder if all our invitations should be rejected: for there is a pleasure in being considered at home, which is not easily resisted.

By conducting Mr. Southwell to Venice, you fulfilled, I know, the original contract: yet I would wish you not wholly to lose him from your notice, but to recommend him to such acquaintance as may best secure him from suffering by his own follies, and to take such general care both of his safety and his interest as may come within your power. His relations will thank you for any such gratuitous attention at least, they will not blame you for any evil that may happen, whether they thank you or not for any good.

You know that we have a new king and a new parliament. Of the new parliament Fitzherbert is a member. We were so weary of our old king, that we were much pleased with his new successor, whom we are so much inclined to hope great things, that most of us begin already to believe them. The young man is hitherto blameless; but he would be unreasonable to expect much from the immaturity of juvenile years, and the ignorance of princely education. He has been long in the hands of the Scots, and has already favoured them more than the English would contentedly endure. But, perhaps, he scarcely knows whom he has distinguished, or whom he has disgusted.

The artists have instituted a yearly Exhibition of pictures and statues, in imitation, as I am told, of foreign academies. This year was the second Exhibition. They please themselves much with the multitude of spectators, and imagine that the English school will rise in reputation. Reynolds is without a rival, and continues to add thousands to thousands, which he deserves, among other excellencies, by retaining his kindness for Baretti. This Exhibition has filled the heads of the artists and lovers of art. Surely life, if it be not long, is tedious, since we are forced to call in the assistance of so many trifles to rid us of our time,—of that time which never can return.2

I know my Baretti will not be satisfied with a letter in which I give him no account of myself; yet what account shall I give him? I have not, since I last saw him, studied anything or done anything considerable. The only change in my way of life is, that I have frequented the theatre more than in former seasons. But I have gone thither only to escape from myself. We have had many farces, and the comedy called 'The Jealous Wife,'3 which, though not written with much genius, was yet so well adapted to the stage, and so well exhibited by the actors, that it was crowded for near twenty nights. I am digressing from myself to the playhouse; but a barren plan must be filled with episodes. Of myself I have nothing to say, but that I have hitherto lived without the concurrence of my own judgment; yet I continue to flatter myself, that, when you return, you will find me mended. I do not wonder that, where the monastic life is permitted, every order finds votaries, and every monastery inhabitants. Men will submit to any rule, by which they may be exempted from the tyranny of caprice and of chance. They are glad to supply by external authority their own want of constancy and resolution, and court the government of others, when long experience has convinced them of their own inability to govern themselves. I was so desirous to visit Italy, my curiosity would be more attracted by convents than by palaces; though I am afraid that I should find expectation in both places equally disappointed, and life in both places supported with impatience and quitted with reluctance. That it must be so soon quitted, is a powerful remedy against impatience; but what shall free us from reluctance?

1 Probably the Hon. Thomas Arthur Southwell, afterwards second Lord Southwell, who was born in 1742, and succeeded his father in 1789. — Croker.

2 This classification of the art of painting and the exhibition of its productions among the futile trifles by which mankind endeavour to get rid of time, will excite some surprise, but Hawkins tells us that "of the beauties of painting, notwithstanding the many elusions on that art which, after the commencement of his friendship with Sir Joshua Reynolds, he inserted in his writings, Johnson had not the least concept of this defect led me to mention the following fact. One evening, at the club, I came in with a small roll of prints, which, in the afternoon, I had picked up; I told them what I had. They were much pleased with his waxed plates. He viewed the prints several with great attention, and asked me what sort of pleasure such things could afford me: I replied that, as representations of nature, containing an assemblage of such particulars as render rural scenes delightful, they presented to my mind the objects themselves, and that my imagination realised the prospect before me. He said, that was more than his would do, for that in his whole life he was never so much as conscious of the least resemblance of any kind between the picture and the subject it was intended to represent. To the delights of music he was equally insensible: neither voice nor instrument, nor the harmony of concordant sounds, had power over his affections, or even to engage his attention. Of music in general, he has been heard to say, "it excites in my mind no ideas, and hinders me from contemplating my own," and of a fine singer, or instrumental performer, that "he had the merit of a Canary-bird." Not that his hearing was so delicate as to account for this insensibility, but he laboured under the misfortune which he has noted in the Life of Barret. It is common to pay more attention to this musical age are willing to confess it, of wanting that additional sense in society, which renders music grateful to the human ear." — Croker.

3 Colman's comedy of the Jealous Wife came out in February, 1761. The characters of Mr. Oukly and Mrs. Oukly were performed by Garrick and Mrs. Pritchard, and Mr. Cline was the Lady Freelove. — Wright.
The following letter, which, on account of its intrinsic merit, it would have been unjust both to Johnson and the public to have withheld, was obtained for me by the solicitation of my friend Mr. Seward:—

JOHN TO DR. STAUNTON.1

"June 1, 1762.

"Dear Sir,—I make haste to answer your kind letter, in hope of hearing again from you before you leave us. I cannot but regret that a man of your qualifications should find it necessary to seek an establishment in Guadaloupe, which if a peace should restore to the French, I shall think it some alleviation of the loss, that it must restore likewise Dr. Staunton to the English.

"It is a melancholy consideration, that so much of our time is necessarily to be spent upon the care of living, and that we can seldom obtain ease in one respect but by resigning it in another; yet I suppose we are by this dispensation not less happy in the whole, than if the spontaneous bounty of Nature poured all that we want into our hands. A few, if they were left thus to themselves, would, perhaps, spend their time in laudable pursuits; but the greater part would prey upon the quiet of each other, or, in the want of other objects, would prey upon themselves.

"This, however, is our condition, which we must improve and solace as we can; and though we cannot choose always our place of residence, we may in every place find rational amusements, and possess in every place the comforts of piety and a pure conscience.

"In America there is little to be observed except natural curiosities. The new world must have many vegetables and animals with which philosophers are but little acquainted. I hope you will furnish yourself with some books of natural history, and some glasses and other instruments of observation. Trust as little as you can to report; examine all you can by your own senses. I do not doubt but you will be able to add much to knowledge, and, perhaps, to medicine. Wild nations trust to simples; and, perhaps, the Peruvian bark is not the only specific which those extensive regions may afford us.

"Wherever you are, and whatever be your fortune, be certain, dear Sir, that you carry with you my kind wishes; and that whether you return hither, or stay in the other hemisphere, to hear that you are happy will give pleasure to, Sir, your most affectionate humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

A lady having at this time solicited him to obtain the Archbishop of Canterbury's patronage, he wrote to the Earl of Middlesex of Mrs. Lenox's "Female Quixote," and the Preface to the "Catalogue of the Artists' Exhibition."+

1 George Leonard Staunton was born in Galway, in Ireland, 1737, and having adopted the profession of medicine, which he studied in France, he came to London in 1760, where he wrote for the periodical publications of the day, and formed an acquaintance with Dr. Johnson. In 1762 he went to the West Indies, where he practised as a physician for a short time, and by that and some civil offices, accumulated a considerable fortune, which he invested in estates in the island of Granada. He returned to England in 1770; but, in 1774, again went to Guadaloupe, where he was appointed attorney-general, and made the valuable acquaintance of Lord Macartney, who became governor of that island in 1774. By the capture of Granada by the French, in 1779, Lord Macartney lost his government, and Staunton his property. He returned to England with it, is supposed, little of the wreck of his fortune. He, however, had acquired Lord Macartney's friendship, and he accompanied his lordship to Madras in 1781; and for his distinguished services during his official residence there had a pension of 500L. per annum settled on him, in 1784, by the East India Company, and was created a baronet. When Lord Macartney was selected for the celebrated embassy to China, Sir George was named to accompany him as secretary and minister plenipotentiary. His splendid account of that embassy is well known. He died in London, January 14, 1801, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. CROKER.
Johnstone to Mrs. —

"June 8, 1762.

"Madam,—I hope you will believe that my delay in answering your letter would proceed only from my unwillingness to destroy any hope that you had formed. Hope is itself a species of happiness, and, perhaps, the chief happiness which this world affords: but, like all other pleasures improperly indulged, the excesses of hope must be expiated by pain; and expectations improperly raised, must end in disappointment. If it be asked, then, why the improper expectation which it is dangerous to indulge, experience will quickly answer, that it is such expectation as is dictated, not by reason, but by desire; expectation raised, not by the common occurrences of life, but by the wants of the expectant; an expectation that requires the common course of things to be changed, and the general rules of action to be broken.

"When you made your request to me, you should have considered, Madam, what you were asking. You ask me to solicit a great man, to whom I never spoke, for a young person whom I had never seen, upon a supposition which I had no means of knowing to be true. There is no reason why, amongst all the great, I should choose to suplicate the Archbishop, nor why, among all the possible objects of his bounty, the Archbishop should choose your son. I know, Madam, how unwillingly conviction is admitted, when interest opposes it; but surely, Madam, you must allow, that there is no reason why that should be done by me, which every other man may do with equal reason, and which, indeed, no man can do properly, without some very particular relation both to the Archbishop and to you. If I could help you in this exigence by any proper means, it would give me pleasure; but this proposal is so very remote from usual methods, that I cannot comply with it, but at the risk of such answer and suspicions as I believe you do not wish me to undergo.

"I have seen your son this morning; he seems a pretty youth, and will, perhaps, find some better friend than I can procure him; but though he should at last miss the university, he may still be wise, useful, and happy. I am, Madam, your most humble servant,

San. Johnson."

Johnstone to Baretti,

At Milan

"London, July 20, 1762.

"Sir,—However justly you may accuse me for want of punctuality in correspondence, I am not so far lost in negligence as to omit the opportunity of writing to you, which Mr. Beauceker's passage through Milan affords me.

"I suppose you received the Idlers, and I intend that you shall soon receive Shakespear, that you may explain his works to the ladies of Italy, and tell them the story of the editor, among the other strange narratives with which your long residence in this unknown region has supplied you.

"As you have now been long away, I suppose your curiosity may pant for some news of your old friends. Miss Williams and I live much as we did. Miss Cotterell still continues to cling to Mrs. Porter, and Charlotte is now big of the fourth child. Mr. Reynolds gets six thousands a year. Levett is lately married, not without much suspicion that he has been wretchedly cheated in his match. Mr. Chambers is gone this day, for the first time, the circuit with the Judges. Mr. Richardson is dead of an apoplexy, and his second daughter has married a merchant.

"My vanity, or my kindness, makes me flatter myself, that you would rather hear of me than of those whom I have mentioned; but of myself I have very little which I care to tell. Last winter I went down to my native town, where I found the streets much narrower and shorter than I thought. I had left them, inhabited by a new race of people, to whom I was very little known. My playfellows were grown old, and forced me to suspect that I was no longer young. My only remaining friend has changed his principles, and was become the tool of the predominant faction. My daughter-in-law, from whom I expected most, and whom I met with sincere benevolence, has lost the beauty and gaiety of youth, without having gained much of the wisdom of age. I wandered about for five days, and took the first convenient opportunity of returning to a place, where, if there is not much happiness, there is, at least, such a diversity of good and evil, that slight vexations do not fix upon the heart.

"I think in a few weeks to try another excursion; though to what end? Let me know, my action, the Arabian Nights seemed familiar occurrences. Never was hero more completely duped. He had not been married four months before a writing was taken out against him, for debts contracted by his wife. He was secreted, and his friend then procured him a protection from a foreign minister. In a short time afterwards she ran away from him, and was tried for picking pockets at the Old Bailey. She pleaded her own cause, and was acquitted; a separation took place; and Johnson then took Levett home, where he continued till his death." — Steevens. — Croker.

Johnson used to say, that, compared with the marvels of this trans-

The grant last Such be your, they have been borrowed. that he is confessed the political tracts which Johnson afterwards did write, as they were entirely consonant with his own opinions, would have been written by him, though no pension had been granted to him.

Mr. Thomas Sheridan and Mr. Murphy, who then lived a good deal both with him and Mr. Wedderburne, told me, that they previously talked with Johnson upon this matter, and that it was perfectly understood by all parties that the pension was merely honorary. Sir Joshua Reynolds told me, that Johnson called on him after his Majesty's intention had been notified to him, and said he wished to consult his friends as to the propriety of his accepting this mark of the royal favour, after the definitions which he had given in his Dictionary of pension and pensioners. He said he should not have Sir Joshua's answer till next day, when he would call again, and desired he might think of it. Sir Joshua answered that he was clear to give his opinion then, that there could be no objection to his receiving from the King a reward for literary merit; and that certainly the definitions in his Dictionary were not applicable to him. Johnson, it should seem, was satisfied, for he did not call again till he had accepted the pension, and had waited on Lord Bute to thank him. He then told Sir Joshua that Lord Bute said to him expressly, "It is not given you for any thing you are to do, but for what you have done." His Lordship, he said, behaved in the handsomest manner. He repeated the words twice, that he might be sure Johnson heard them, and thus set his mind perfectly at ease. This nobleman, who has been so virulently abused, acted with great honour in this instance, and displayed a mind truly liberal. A minister of a more narrow and selfish disposition would have availed himself of such an opportunity to fix an implied obligation on a man of Johnson's powerful talents to give him his support.

Mr. Murphy and the late Mr. Sheridan severally contended for the distinction of having been the first who mentioned to Mr. Wedderburn that Johnson ought to have a pension.
When I spoke of this to Lord Loughborough, wishing to know if he recollected the prime mover in the business, he said, "All his friends assisted;" and when I told him that Mr. Sheridan strenuously asserted his claim to it, his Lordship said, "He rang the bell." And it is but just to add, that Mr. Sheridan told me, that when he communicated to Dr. Johnson that a pension was to be granted him, he replied in a fervour of gratitude, the English language does not afford me terms adequate to my feelings on this occasion. I must have recourse to the French. I am pénétré with his Majesty's goodness. When I repeated this to Dr. Johnson, he did not contradict it.

His definitions of pension and pensioner, partly founded on the satirical verses of Pope, which he quotes, may be generally true; and yet every body must allow, that there may be, and have been, instances of pensions given and received upon liberal and honourable terms. Thus, then, it is clear, that there was nothing inconsistent or humiliating in Johnson's acceptance of a pension so unconditionally and so honourably as a future.

But I shall not detain my readers longer by any words of my own, on a subject on which I am happily enabled, by the favour of the Earl of Bute, to present them with what Johnson himself wrote; his Lordship having been pleased to communicate to me a copy of the following letter to his late father, which does great honour both to the writer, and to the noble person to whom it is addressed:

JOHNSON TO THE EARL OF BUTE.

"July 20, 1762.

"My Lord,—When the bills were yesterday delivered to me by Mr. Wedderburne, I was informed by him of the future favours which his Majesty has, by your Lordship's recommendation, been induced to intend for me.

"Bounty always receives part of its value from the manner in which it is bestowed: your Lordship's kindness includes every circumstance that can gratify delicacy, or enforce obligation. You have conferred your favours on a man who has neither alliance nor interest, who has not merited them by services, nor courted them by officiousness; you have spared him the shame of solicitation, and the anxiety of suspense scientific benefaction.

"What has been thus elegantly given, will, I hope, not be reproachfully enjoyed; I shall endeavour to give your Lordship the only recompence which generosity desires,—the gratification of finding that your benefits are not improperly bestowed. I am, my Lord, your Lordship's most obliged, most obedient, and most humble servant, — SAM. JOHNSON.""

This year his friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, paid a visit of some weeks to his native county, Devonshire, in which he was accompanied by Johnson, who was much pleased with this jaunt, and declared he had derived from it a great accession of new ideas. He was entertained at the seats of several noblemen and gentlemen in the west of England; but the greatest part of this time was passed at Plymouth, where the magnificence of the navy, the ship-building and all its circumstances, afforded him a grand subject of contemplation.

The Commissioner of the Dock-yard [Captain Francis Rogers] paid him the compliment of ordering the yacht to convey him and his friend to the Eddystone, to which they accordingly sailed. But the weather was so tempestuous that they could not land.

Reynolds and he were at this time the guests of Dr. Mudge, the celebrated surgeon, and now physician, of that place, not more distinguished for quickness of parts and variety of knowledge, than loved and esteemed for his amiable manners; and here Johnson formed an acquaintance with Dr. Mudge's father, that very eminent divine, the Rev. Zachariah Mudge, Prebendary of Exeter, who was idolised in the west, both for his excellence as a preacher and the uniform perfect propriety of his private life, reckoned too coarse for our own acceptance. Life is a pill which none of us can bear to swallow without gilding; yet for the poor we delight in stripping it still barer, and are not ashamed to show even visible displeasure, if ever the bitter taste is taken from their mouths. In pursuance of these principles he nursed whole nests of people in his house, where the lame, the blind, the sick, and the sorrowful found a sure retreat from all the evils whence his little income could secure them."—Piozzi.

"When visiting Lichfield, towards the latter part of his life, he was accustomed, on his arrival, to deposit with Miss Porter as much cash as would pay his expenses back to London. He could not trust himself with his own money, as he felt himself unable to resist the imaginary claims on his benevolence."—Harwood.

"At one of these seats Dr. Amyat, physician in London, told me he had happened to meet him. In order to amuse him till dinner should be ready, he was taken out to walk in the garden. The master of the house, thinking it proper to introduce some of his scientific inquiries into conversation, addressed him thus: "Are you a botanist, Dr. Johnson?"

"No, Sir, (answered Johnson) I am not a botanist; and, (falling into a jesting manner,) shallon be obliged to become a botanist, I must first turn myself into a reptile."— Boswell.

Dr. John Mudge died in 1791. He was the father of Colonel William Mudge, distinguished by his trigonometrical survey of England and Wales, carried on by order of the Ordnance,—Wharton.
conduct. He preached a sermon purposely that Johnson might hear him; and we shall see afterwards that Johnson honoured his memory by drawing his character. While Johnson was at Plymouth, he saw a great many of its inhabitants, and was not sparing of his very entertaining conversation. It was here that he made that frank and truly original confession, that "ignorance, pure ignorance," was the cause of a wrong definition in his Dictionary of the word pattern, to the no small surprise of the lady who put the question to him. Having the most profound reverence for his character, so as almost to suppose him endowed with infallibility, expected to hear an explanation (of what, to be sure, seemed strange to a common reader,) drawn from some deep-learned source with which she was unacquainted.

Sir Joshua Reynolds, to whom I was obliged for my information concerning this excursion, mentions a very characteristical anecdote of Johnson while at Plymouth. Having observed, that in consequence of the Dock-yard a new town had arisen about two miles off as a rival to the old; and knowing from his sagacity, and just observation of human nature, that it is certain, if a man hates at all, he will hate his next neighbour; he concluded that this new and rising town could not but excite the envy and jealousy of the old, in which conjecture he was very soon confirmed; he therefore set himself resolutely on the side of the old town, the established town, in which his lot was cast, considering it as a kind of duty to stand by it. He accordingly entered warmly into its interests, and upon every occasion talked of the Dockers, as the inhabitants of the new town were called, as upstarts and aliens. Plymouth is very plentifully supplied with water by a river brought into it from a great distance, which is so abundant that it runs to waste in the town. The Dock, or New-town, being totally destitute of water, petitioned Plymouth that a small portion of the conduit might be permitted to go to them, and this was now under consideration. Johnson, affecting to entertain the passions of the place, was violent in opposition; and half laughing at himself for his pretended zeal, where he had no concern, exclaimed, "No, no! I am against the Dockers; I am a Plymouth-man. Rogues! let them die of thirst. They shall not have a drop!"

Lord Macartney obligingly favoured me with a copy of the following letter, in his own handwriting, from the original, which was found, by the present Earl of Bute, among his father's papers.

1 See post, March, 1791. "I have heard Sir Joshua declare, that Mr. Z. Mudge, was, in his opinion, the wisest man he ever met with, and that he had intended to have republished his Sermons, and written a sketch of his life and character." —Northcote. He died in 1794. —Croker. One of Reynolds's best portraits is a head of Zachariah Mudge, and one of Chantrey's best busts a translation of it into marble, part of a monument to Mudge's memory, erected in the church of St. Andrew's, Plymouth. —P. JOHNSON TO THE EARL OF BUTE.

"Temple Lane, Nov. 3. 1762.

"My Lord,—That generosity, by which I was recommended to the favour of His Majesty, will not be offended at a solicitation necessary to make that favour permanent and effectual.

"The pension appointed to be paid me at Michaelmas I have not received, and know not where or from whom I am to ask it. I beg, therefore, that your Lordship will be pleased to supply Mr. Wedderburne with such directions as may be necessary, which, I believe, his friendship will make him think it no trouble to convey to me.

"To interrupt your Lordship, at a time like this, with such petty difficulties, is improper and unseasonable; but your knowledge of the world has long since taught you, that every man's affairs, however little, are important to himself. Every man hopes that he shall escape neglect; and with reason may every man, whose vices do not preclude his claim, expect favour from that beneficence which has been extended to, my Lord, your Lordship's most obliged and most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO BARETTI,

At Milan.

"Sir,—You are not to suppose, with all your conviction of my idleness, that I have passed all this time without writing to my Baretti. I gave a letter to Mr. Beauclerk, who in my opinion, and in his own, was hastening to Naples for the recovery of his health; but he has stopped at Paris, and I know not when he will proceed. Langton is with him.

"I will not trouble you with speculations about peace and war. The good or ill success of battles and embassies extends itself to a very small part of domestic life: we all have good and evil, which we feel more sensibly than our petty part of public miscarriage or prosperity. I am sorry for your disappointment, with which you seem more touched than I should expect a man of your resolution and experience to have been, did I not know that general truths are seldom applied to particular occasions; and that the fallacy of our self-love extends itself as wide as our interest or affections. Every man believes that mistresses are unfaithful, and patrons capricious; but he excepts his own mistress, and his own patron. We have all learned that greatness is negligent and contemptuous, and that in courts life is often languished away in ungratified expectation; but he that approaches greatness, or glitters in a court, imagines that destiny has at last exempted him from the common lot.

"Do not let such evils overwhelm you as thousands have suffered, and thousands have surmounted; but turn your thoughts with vigour to some other plan of life, and keep always in your mind, that, with due submission to Providence, a man of genius has been seldom ruined but by himself.
self. Your patron's weakness or insensibility will finally do you little hurt, if he is not assisted by your own passions. Of your love I know not the propriety, nor can estimate the power; but in love, as in every other passion of which hope is the essence, we ought always to remember the uncertainty of events. There is, indeed, nothing that so much seduces reason from vigilance, as the thought of passing life with an amiable woman; and if all would happen that a lover fancies, I know not what other terrestrial happiness would deserve pursuit. But love and marriage are different states. Those who are to suffer the evils together, and to suffer often for the sake of one another, soon lose that tenderness of look, and that benevolence of mind, which arose from the partitipation of unmingled pleasure and successive amusement. A woman, we are sure, will not be always fair; we are not sure she will always be virtuous; and man cannot sustain through life that respect and avidity by which any thing we do last not. A month do not, however, pretend to have discovered that life has any thing more to be desired than a prudent and virtuous marriage; therefore know not what counsel to give you.

"If you can quit your imagination of love and greatness, and leave your hopes of preferment and bridal raptures to try once more the fortune of literature and industry, the way through France is now open. We flatter ourselves that we shall cultivate, with great diligence, the arts of peace; and every man will be welcome among us who can teach us what we do not know. For your part, you will find all your old friends willing to receive you."

"Reynolds still continues to increase in reputation and in riches. Miss Williams, who very much loves you, goes on in the old way. Miss Cotterel is still with Mrs. Porter. Miss Charlotte is married to Dean Lewis, and has three children. Mr. Levett has married a street-walker. But the gazette of my narration must now arrive to tell you, that Bathurst went physician to the army, and died at the Havannah."

"I have now not sent you word that Huggins[1] and Richardson are both dead. When we see our enemies and friends gliding away before us, let us not forget that we are subject to the general law of mortality, and shall soon be where our doom will be fixed for ever. I pray God to bless you, and am, Sir, your most affectionate humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

"Write soon."

[JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.]

"21st Dec. 1762.

"DEAR MADAM,—If Mr. Mudge should make the offer you mention, I shall certainly comply with him, for I cannot offer myself unasked. I am much pleased to find myself so much esteemed by a man whom I so much esteem.

"Mr. Tolcher[2] is here; full of life, full of talk, and full of enterprise. To see brisk young fellows of seventy-four, is very surprising to those who begin to suspect themselves of growing old.

"You may tell at Torrington that whatever they may think, I have not forgot Mr. Johnson's widow[3], nor school,—Mr. Johnson's salmon,—nor Dr. Morison's Idler. For the widow I shall apply very soon to the Bishop of Bristol, who is now sick. The salmon I cannot yet learn any hope of making a profitable scheme, for where I have inquired, which was where I think the information very faithful, I was told that dried salmon may be bought in London for a penny a pound; but I shall not yet drop the search.

"For the school, a sister of Miss Carwithen's has offered herself to Miss Williams, who sent her to Mr. Reynolds, where the business seems to have stopped. Miss Williams thinks her well qualified, and I am told she is a woman of elegant manners, and of a lady-like appearance. Mr. Reynolds must be written to, for, as she knows more of him than of me, she will probably choose rather to treat with him.

"Dr. Morison's Books shall be sent to him with my sincere acknowledgements of all his civilities.

"I am going for a few days or weeks to Oxford, that I may free myself from a cough, which is sometimes very violent; however, if you design me the favour of any more letters, do not let the uncertainty of my abode hinder you, for they will be sent after me, and be very gladly received by Madam, your most obligd humble servant."

SAM. JOHNSON.

"I hope you read more of Nepos, or of some other book, than you construe to Mr. Bright. The more books you look into for your entertainment, with the greater variety of style you will make yourself acquainted. Turner I do not know; but think that if Clark be better, you should change it, for I shall never be willing that you should trouble yourself with more than one book to learn the government of words. What book that one shall be, Mr. Bright must determine. Be but diligent in reading and writing, and doubt not of the success. Be pleased to make my compliments to Miss Page and the gentlemen. JOHNSTON TO GEORGE STRAHAN.

"26th March, 1763."

"Dear Sir,—You did not very soon answer my letter, and therefore cannot complain that I make no great haste to answer yours. I am well enough satisfied with the proficiency that you make, and hope that you will not relax the vigour of your diligence. I hope you begin now to see that all is possible which was professed. Learning is a wide field, but six years spent in close application are a long time; and I am still of opinion, that if you continue to consider knowledge as the most pleasing and desirable of all acquisitions, and do not suffer your course to be interrupted, you may take your degree not only without deficiency, but with great distinction.

"You must still continue to write Latin. This is the most difficult part, indeed the only part that is very difficult of your undertaking. If you can exemplify the rules of syntax, I know not whether it will be worth while to trouble yourself with any more translations. You will more increase your number of words, and advance your skill in phraseology, by making a short theme or two every day; and when you have construed properly a stated number of verses, it will be pleasing to go from reading to composition, and from composition to reading. But do not be very particular about method; any method will do, if there be but diligence. Let me know, if you please, once a week what you are doing. I am, dear George, your humble servant,

JOHNSTON TO MISS PORTER.

"My Dear,—The newspaper has informed me of the death of Captain Porter. I know not what to say to you, condolent or consolatory, beyond the common considerations which I suppose you have proposed to others, and know how to apply to yourself. In all afflictions the first relief is to be asked of God.

"To the Queen."

"Madam,—To the present high and illustrious has been in all ages the privilege of poets; and though translators cannot justly claim the same honour, yet they naturally follow their authors as attendants; and I hope that in return for having enabled Tasso to diffuse his fame through the British dominions, I may be introduced by him to the presence of your Majesty.

"Tasso has a peculiar claim to your Majesty's favour, as follower and panegyrist of the house of Este, which has one common ancestor with the house of Hanover; and in reviewing his life, it is not easy to forbear a wish that he had lived in a happier time, when he might among the descendants of Johnson."—Pearson MSS.

"16th April, 1763."

"Dear Sir,—Your account of your proficiency is more nearly equal, I find, to my expectations than your own. You are angry that a theme on which you took so much pains was at last a kind of English Latin; what could you expect more? If at the end of seven years you write good Latin, you will excel most of your contemporaries: Scribendo discere scribere. It is only by writing ill that you can attain to write well. Be but diligent and constant, and make no doubt of success.

"I will allow you but six weeks for Tully's Offices. Walker's Particles I would not have you trouble yourself to learn at all by heart, but look in it from time to time, and observe his notes and remarks, and see how they are exemplified. The translation from Clark's history will improve you, and I would have you continue it to the end of the book.

"I hope you read by the way at loose hours other books, though you do not mention them; for no time is to be lost; and what can be done with a master is but a small part of the whole. I would have you now and then try at some English verses. When you find that you have mistaken any thing, review the passage carefully, and settle it in your mind.

"Be pleased to make my compliments, and those of Miss Williams, to all our friends. I am, dear Sir, yours most affectionately,

Sam. Johnson."

In 1763 he furnished to "The Poetical Calendar," published by Fawkes and Woty, a character of Collins, which he afterwards ingrafted into his entire Life of that admirable poet, in the collection of Lives which he wrote for the body of English poetry, formed and published by the booksellers of London. His account of the melancholy depression with which Collins was severely afflicted, and which brought him to his grave, is, I think, one of the most tender and interesting passages in the whole series of his writings. He also favoured Mr. Hoole with the Dedication of his translation of Tasso to the Queen,* which is so happily conceived and elegantly expressed, that I cannot but point it out to the peculiar notice of my readers. That illustrious family have found a more liberal and potent patronage.

"I cannot but observe, Madam, how unequally reward is proportioned to merit. When I reflect that the happiness which was withheld from Tasso is reserved for me; and that the poem which once hardly procured to its author the country of the princes of Ferrara, has attracted to its translator the favourable notice of a British queen.

"Had this been the fate of Tasso, he would have been able to have celebrated the condescension of your Majesty in nobler language, but could not have felt it with more ardent gratitude, than, Madam, your Majesty's most faithful and devoted servant, John Hoole."
CHAPTER XV.
1763.

Boswell becomes acquainted with Johnson. — Derrick.

—Mr. Thomas Sheridan. — Mrs. Sheridan. — Mr. Thomas Davies. — Mrs. Davies. — First Interview.

This is to me a memorable year; for in it I had the happiness to obtain the acquaintance of that extraordinary man whose memoirs I am now writing; an acquaintance which I shall ever esteem as one of the most fortunate circumstances in my life. Though then but two and twenty, I had for several years read his works with delight and instruction, and had the highest reverence for their author, which had grown up in my fancy into a kind of mysterious veneration, by figuring to myself a state of solemn elevated abstraction, in which I supposed him to live in the immense metrop-ilis of London. Mr. Gentleman, a native of Ireland, who passed some years in Scotland as a player, and as an instructor in the English language, a man whose talents and worth were depressed by misfortunes, had given me a representation of the figure and manner of DICTIONARY JOHNSON as he was then called; and during my first visit to London, which was for three months in 1760, Mr. Derrick the poet, who was Gentleman’s friend and countryman, flattered me with hopes that he would introduce me to Johnson, —an honour of which I was very ambitious. But he never found an opportunity; which made me doubt that he had promised to do what was not in his power; till Johnson some years afterwards told me, “Derrick, Sir, might very well have introduced you. I had a kindness for Derrick, and am sorry he is dead.”

In the summer of 1761, Mr. Thomas Sheridan was at Edinburgh, and delivered lectures upon the English Language and Public Speaking to large and respectable audiences. I was often in his company, and heard him frequently expatiate upon Johnson’s extraordinary knowledge, talents, and virtues, repeat his pointed sayings, describe his particularities, and boast of his being his guest sometimes till two or three in the morning. At this house I hoped to have many opportunities of seeing the sage, as Mr. Sheridan obligingly assured me I should not be disappointed.

When I returned to London in the end of 1762, to my surprise and regret I found an irrevocable difference had taken place between Johnson and Sheridan. A pension of two hundred pounds a year had been given to Sheridan by Johnson, who, as has been already mentioned, thought slightly of Sheridan’s art, upon hearing that he was also pensioned, exclaimed, “What! have I given him a pension? Then it is time for me to give you mine.” Whether this proceeded from a momentary indignation, as if it were an affront to his exalted merit that a player should be rewarded in the same manner with him, or was the sudden effect of a fit of peevishness, it was unlucky said, and, indeed, cannot be justified. Mr. Sheridan’s pension was granted to him, not as a player, but as a sufferer in the cause of government, when he was manager of the Theatre Royal in Ireland, when parties ran high in 1753.

And it must also be allowed that he was a man of literature, and had considerably improved the arts of reading and speaking with distinctness and propriety.

Besides, Johnson should have recollected that Mr. Sheridan taught pronunciation to Mr. Alexander Wedderburne, whose sister was married to Sir Ifary Erskine, an intimate friend of Lord Bute, who was the favourite of the king; and surely the most outrageous Whig will not maintain, that, whatever ought to be the principle in the disposal of offices, a pension ought never to be granted from any bias of court connection. Mr. Macklin, indeed, shared

1 Francis Gentleman was born in 1728, and educated at Dublin. His father was an officer in the army, and he, at the age of fifteen, obtained a commission in the same regiment; on the reduction, at the peace of 1748, he lost this profession, and adopted that of the stage, both as an author and an actor; in neither of which did he attain any eminence. He died in December, 1784: having, in the later course of his life, experienced “all the hardships of a wandering actor, and all the disappointments of a friendless author.” — Croker.

2 As great men of antiquity, such as Scipio Africanus, had an epithet added to their names, in consequence of some celebrated action, so my illustrious friend was often called DicTIONARY Johnson, from that wonderful achievement of genius and labour, his “Dictionary of the English Language;” the merit of which I contemplate with more and more admiration. — Boswell. Boswell himself was at one-time anxious to be called Corica Boswell. See post, September, 1769. — Croker.

3 See ante, p. 35. n. 1. — Croker.

4 Unluckily Boswell, in his tenderness to the amour pro-pre of Dr. Johnson, cannot bear to admit that Sheridan’s literary character had any thing to do with the pension, and no doubt he endeavoured to solace Johnson’s resentment by giving, as he does in the above passage, this faver a political colour; but there seems no reason to believe that Sheridan’s pension was given to him as a sufferer by a playhouse riot. It was probably granted (el kine la laeryne) on the same motive as Johnson’s own, namely, the desire of the King and Lord Bute to distinguish the commencement of the new reign by the patronage of literature. Indeed, this is rendered almost certain by various passages of the letters of Mrs. Sheridan to Mr. Whyte: e.g. “London, Nov. 29, 1762. — Mr. Sheridan is now, as I mentioned to you formerly, busied in the English Dictionary, which he is encouraged to pursue with the more alacrity as his Majesty has vouchsafed him such a mark of royal favour. I suppose you have heard that he has granted ban a pension of 200l. a year, merely as an encouragement to his undertaking, and this without solicitation, which makes it the more valuable.” Whyte’s Mis-celleana Nova, p. 104. 107. 111. Mr. Samuel Whyte, the writer of this volume, was a celebrated schoolmaster in Dublin, a relation of and much attached to the Sheridan family. Richard Brinsley Sheridan and his elder brother Charles, were placed very early under his tuition, as was, at an interval of above thirty years, my friend Thomas Moore, who, in his Life of Sheridan, pays an affectionate tribute to their common preceptor. — CRocker.

1 This is an odd coincidence. A Scotchman who wishes to learn a pure English pronunciation, employs one preceptor who happens to be an Irishman, and afterwards another, likewise an Irishman — and this Irish-taught Scot becomes — and mainly by his oratory — one of the chief ornaments of the English senate, and the first subject in the British em-pire. — CRocker.

2 But Johnson seems to have kept it alive by persecuting sacarnas. — CRocker.

3 Why should he have been? his goodness had nothing to say to the question. Sheridan's pension was given for his literary character, and Johnson's following up his attack on his talents by a supercilious acknowledgment that he was nevertheless a very good man, was an additional insult. See above, p. 121. CRocker.

4 Dr. Johnson had depreciated the talents and character of Dr. Swift, not merely in conversation, but in his Lives of the Poets. Sheridan, in his Life of Swift, advocated the cause of the dean, for whom he had a natural and hereditary veneration; and though he observed on Johnson's criticisms upon Swift that he had never been so dejected in his personal feelings, he treated him on all other points with moderation and respect. — CRocker.

5 See ante, p. 121, n. 5.

6 My position has been very well illustrated by Mr. Bel- sham, of Bedford, in his Essay on Dramatic Poetry: —

"The fashionable doctrine (says he) both of moralists and critics in these times is, that virtue and happiness are con- stant concomitants; and it is regarded as a kind of dramatic impolicy to maintain that virtue should not be rewarded, nor vice punished, in the last scene of the last act of every tragedy. This conduct in our modern poets is, however, in my opinion, extremely injudicious; for it labours in vain to inculeate a doctrine in theory, which every one knows to be false in fact, viz. that virtue in real life is always productive of happiness; and vice of misery. Thus Congreve concludes the tragedy of "The Mourning Bride" with the following foolish couplet: —"

"For blessings ever wait on virtuous deeds, And, though a late, a sure reward succeeds."

"When a man eminently virtuous, a Brutus, a Cato, or a Socrates, finally sinks under the pressure of accumulated misfortune, we are not only led to entertain a more indulgent hatred of vice, than if he rose from his distress, but we are inevitably induced to cherish the hope that future retribution will arrive, when he shall receive not merely poetical, but real and substantial justice." — Essays Historical, Historical, and Literary, London, 1791, seq. vol. ii. p. 317.

This is well reasoned and well expressed. I wish, indeed, that this author had not thought it necessary to introduce any instance of "a man eminently virtuous:" as he would then have avoided mentioning such a rurhan as Brutus under that description. Mr. Belsham discovers in his Essays so much reading and thinking, and good com- position, that I regret his not having been fortunate enough to be educated a member of our excellent national establish-mind by a series of as deep distress as can affect humanity, in the amiable and pious heroine, who goes to her grave unrelieved, but resigned, and full of hope of "heaven's mercy." Johnson paid her this high compliment upon it: "I know not, Madam, that you have a right, upon moral principles, to make your readers suffer so much."

Mr. Thomas Davies the actor, who then kept a bookseller's shop in Russell-Street, Covent Garden 1, told me that Johnson was very much his friend, and came frequently to his house, where he more than once invited me to meet him; but by some unlucky accident or other he was prevented from coming to us.

Mr. Thomas Davies was a man of good understanding and talents, with the advantage of a liberal education. Though somewhat pompous, he was an entertaining companion; and his literary performances have not incon siderably shed light on his character. He was a friendly and very hospitable man. Both he and his wife (who has been celebrated 2 for her beauty), though upon the stage for many years, maintained an uniform decency of character; and Johnson esteemed them, and lived in as easy an intimacy with them as with any family which he used to visit. Mr. Davies recollected several of Johnson's remarkable sayings, and was one of the best of the many imitators of his voice and manner, while relating them. He increased my impatience more and more to see the extraordinary man whose works I highly valued, and whose conversation was reported to be so peculiarly excellent.

At last, on Monday, the 16th of May, when I was sitting in Mr. Davies's back parlour, after having drunk tea with him and Mrs. Davies, Johnson unexpectedly came into the shop; 3 and Mr. Davies having perceived him through the glass-door in the room in which we were sitting, advancing toward us, he announced his awful approach to me, somewhat in the manner of an actor in the part of Hamlet, when he addresses Hamlet on the appearance of his father's ghost, "Look, my lord, it comes!" I found that I had a very perfect idea of Johnson's figure, from the portrait of him painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds soon after he had published his Dictionary, in the attitude of sitting in his easy chair in deep meditation; which was the first picture his friend did for him, which Sir Joshua very kindly presented to me, and from which an engraving has been made for this work. Mr. Davies mentioned my name, and respectfully introduced me to him. I was much agitated; and recollecting his prejudice against the Scotch, of which I had heard much, I said to Davies, "Don't tell where I come from." — "From Scotland," cried Davies, roguishly. "Mr. Johnson," said I, "I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it." I am willing to flatter myself that I meant this as light pleasantry to soothe and conciliate him, and not as an humiliating abasement at the expense of my country. But however that might be, this speech was somewhat unlucky; and with that quickness of wit for which he was so justly celebrated he seized the expression "come from Scotland," which I used in the sense of being of that country, and said, "I had said that I had come away from it, or left it, retorted, "That, Sir, I find, is what a very great many of your countrymen cannot help."

This stroke stunned me a good deal; and when we had sat down, I felt myself not a little embarrassed, and apprehensive of what might come next. He then addressed himself to Davies: "What do you think of Garrick? He has refused me an order for the play for Miss Williams, because he knows the house will be full, and that an order would be worth three shillings." Eager to take any opening to get into conversation with him, I ventured to say, "O Sir, I cannot think Mr. Garrick would grudge such a trifle to you." "Sir," said he, with a stern look, "I have known David Garrick longer than you have done: and I know no right you have to talk to me on the subject." Perhaps I deserved this check; for it was rather presumptuous in me, an entire stranger, to express any doubt of the justice of his animadversion upon his old acquaintance and pupil. 4 I now felt myself much mortified, and began to think that the hope which I had long indulged of obtaining his acquaintance was blasted. And, in truth, had not my ardour been uncommonly strong, and my resolution uncommonly persevering, so rough a reception might have deterred me for ever from making any further attempts. Fortunately, however, I remained upon the field not wholly discomfited; and was soon rewarded by hearing some of his conversation, of which I preserved the following short minute, without marking the questions and observations by which it was produced.

1 BOSWELL's book.

2 Mr. Murphy, in his "Essay on the Life and Genius of Dr. Johnson," [first published after the first edition of this work] has given an account of this meeting considerably different from mine. I am persuaded without any consciousness of error. His memory, at the end of near thirty years, has undoubtedly deceived him, and he supposes himself to have been present at a scene which he has probably heard inaccurately described by others. In my note taken on the very day, in which I am confident I marked every thing material that passed, no mention is made of this gentleman; and I am sure that I should not have omitted one so well known in the literary world. It may easily be imagined that this my first interview with Dr. Johnson, with all its circumstances, made a strong impression on my mind, and would be registered with peculiar attention. — BOSWELL.

"People," he remarked, "may be taken in once, who imagine that an author is greater in private life than other men. Uncommon parts require uncommon opportunities for their exertion."

"In barbarous society, superiority of parts is of real consequence. Great strength or great wisdom is of much value to an individual. But in more polished times there are people to do every thing for money; and then there are a number of other superiorities, such as those of birth, and fortune, and rank, that dissipate men's attention, and leave no extraordinary share of respect for personal and intellectual superiority. This is wisely ordered by Providence, to preserve some equality among mankind."

"Sir, this book (The Elements of Criticism: 1) which he had taken up) is a pretty essay, and deserves to be held in some estimation, though much of it is chimerical."

Speaking of one 2 who with more than ordinary boldness attacked public measures and the royal family, he said, "I think he is safe from the law, but he is an abusive scoundrel; and instead of applying to my Lord Chief Justice to punish him, I would send half a dozen footmen and have him well ducked."

"The notion of liberty amuses the people of England, and helps to keep off the tetrarch vice. When a butcher tells you that his heart bleeds for his country, he has, in fact, no uneasy feeling."

"Sheridan will not succeed at Bath with his oratory. Ridicule has gone down before him, and, I doubt, Derrick is his enemy." 3

"Derrick may do very well, as long as he can outrun his character; but the moment his character gets up with it, he is all over."

It is, however, but just to record, that some years afterwards, when I reminded him of this sarcasm, he said, "Well, but Derrick has now got a character that he need not run away from."

I was highly pleased with the extraordinary vigour of his conversation, and regretted that I was drawn away from it by an engagement at another place. I had, for a part of the evening, been left alone with him, and had ventured to make an observation now and then, which he received very civilly: so that I was satisfied that though there was a roughness in his manner, there was no ill-nature in his disposition. Davies followed me to the door, and when I complained to him a little of the hard blows which the great man had given me, he kindly took upon him to console me by saying, "Don't be uneasy, I can see he likes you very well."

A few days afterwards I called on Davies, and asked him if he thought I might take the liberty of waiting on Mr. Johnson at his chambers in the Temple. He said I certainly might, and that Mr. Johnson would take it as a compliment. So upon Tuesday the 24th of May, after having been enlivened by the witty sallies of Messieurs Thornton 4, Wilkes, Churchill, and Lloyd, with whom I had passed the morning, I boldly repaired to Johnson. His chambers were on the first floor of No. 1. Inner Temple Lane, and I entered them with an impression given me by the Rev. Dr. Blair of Edinburgh, who had been introduced to me not long before, and described his having "found the Giant in his den;" an expression which, when I came to be pretty well acquainted with Johnson, I repeated to him, and he was diverted at this picturesque account of himself. Dr. Blair 4 had been presented to him by Dr. James Fordyce. 5 At this time the controversy concerning the pieces published by Mr. James Macpherson, as translations of Ossian, was at its height. Johnson had all along denied their authenticity; and, what was still more provoking to their admirers, maintained that they had no merit. The subject having been introduced by Dr. Fordyce, Dr. Blair, relying on the internal evidence of their antiquity, asked Dr. Johnson whether he thought any man of a modern age could have written such poems? Johnson replied, "Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children." Johnson, at this time, did not know that Dr. Blair had just published a Dissertation, not only defending their authenticity, but seriously railing them with the poems of Homer and Virgil; and when he was afterwards informed of this circumstance, he expressed some displeasure at Dr. Forbice's having suggested the topic, and said, "I am not sorry that they got thus much for their pains. Sir, it was like leading one to talk of a book when the author is concealed behind the door."

He received me very courteously; but it must be confessed, that his apartment, and furniture, and morning dress, were sufficiently uncouth. His brown suit of clothes looked very rusty; he had on a little old shrivelled unpowdered wig, which was too small for his head; his shirt-neck and knees of his breeches were loose; his black worsted stockings ill drawn up; and he had a pair of unbuttoned shoes by way of slippers. But all these slovenly particularities were forgotten the moment that he began to talk. Some gentlemen, whom I do not recollect, were sitting with him; and when they went away, I also rose; but he said to me, "Nay, don't go."— "Sir," said I, "I am afraid this intrudes upon you. It is benevolent to allow me to sit and hear you." He seemed pleased with this compliment, which I sincerely paid him, and answered, "Sir, I am obliged to any man who visits me."—I have preserved the following short minute of what passed this day.

"Madness frequently discovers itself merely by unnecessary deviation from the usual modes of the world. My poor friend Smart showed the disturbance of his mind by falling upon his knees and saying his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place. Now, although, rationally speaking, it is greater madness not to pray at all, than to pray as Smart did, I am afraid there are so many who do not pray, that their understanding is not called in question."

Concerning this unfortunate poet, Christopher Smart, who was confined in a madhouse, he had, at another time, the following conversation with Dr. Burney.—Burney. "How does poor Smart do, Sir? is he likely to recover?"—Johnson. "It seems as if his mind had ceased to struggle with the disease; for he grows fat upon it."—Burney. "Perhaps, Sir, that may be from want of exercise."—Johnson. "No, Sir; he has partly as much exercise as he used to have, for he digs in the garden. Indeed, before his confinement, he used for exercise to walk to the ale-house; but he was carried back again. I did not think he ought to be shut up. His infirmities were not noxious to society. He insisted on people praying with him; and I'd as lief pray with Kit Smart as any one else. Another charge was, that he did not love clean linen: and I have no passion for it."

Johnson continued. "Mankind have a great aversion to intellectual labour; but even supposing knowledge to be easily attainable, more people would be content to be ignorant than would take even a little trouble to acquire it."

"The morality of an action depends on the motive from which we act. If I fling half a crown to a beggar with intention to break his head, and he picks it up and buys victuals with it, the physical effect is good; but, with respect to me, the action is very wrong. So, religions exercises, if not performed with an intention to please God, avail us nothing. As our Saviour says of those who perform them from other motives, 'Verily they have their reward.'"

"The Christian religion has very strong evidences. It, indeed, appears in some degree strange to reason; but in History we have undoubted facts, against which, in reasoning a priori, we have more arguments than we have for them; but then, testimony has great weight, and casts the balance. I would recommend to every man whose faith is yet unsettled, Grotius, Dr. Pearson, and Dr. Clarke."

Talking of Garrick, he said, "He is the first man in the world for sprightly conversation."

When I rose a second time, he again pressed me to stay, which I did.

He told me, that he generally went abroad at four in the afternoon, and seldom came home till two in the morning. I took the liberty to ask if he did not think it wrong to live thus, and not make more use of his great talents. He owned it was a bad habit. On reviewing, at the distance of many years, my journal of this period, I wonder how, at my first visit, I ventured to talk to him so freely, and that he bore it with so much indulgence. Before we parted, he was so good as to promise to favour me with his company one evening at my lodgings; and, as I took my leave, shook me cordially by the hand. It is almost needless to add, that I felt no little elation at having now so happily established an acquaintance of which I had been so long ambitious.

My readers will, I trust, excuse me for 1 It has been wondered why Johnson, who obtained a place in the edition of British Poets for Yarrow, Poole, Watts, and Blackmore, did not do as much for his friend Smart, a better poet than any of them, and not less pious. Perhaps he was deferred by the irregularity of poor Smart's mind and life, in connection with which he probably thought that his pious poems would rather scandalize than edify; or there may have been some difficulty about the copyright of his poems, as there was, we know, about those of Goldsmith. See post, July 9, 1770.Smart's are to be found, with a Life, in Anderson's Poets. Smart died in 1770, &t. 70.—Croker.

being thus minutely circumstantial, when it is considered that the acquaintance of Dr. Johnson was to me a most valuable acquisition, and laid the foundation of whatever instruction and entertainment they may receive from my collections concerning the great subject of the work which they are now pursuing.

I did not visit him again till Monday, June 12th, at which time I recollect no part of his conversation, except that when I told him I had been to see Johnson ride upon three horses, he said, "Such a man, Sir, should be encouraged; for his performances show the extent of the human powers in one instance, and thus tend to raise our opinion of the faculties of man. He shows what may be attained by persevering application; so that every man may hope, that by giving as much application, although perhaps he may never ride three horses at a time, or dance upon a wire, yet he may be equally expert in whatever profession he has chosen to pursue." 1

He again shook me by the hand at parting, and asked me why I did not come oftener to him. Trusting that I was now in his good graces, I answered, that he had not given me much encouragement, and reminded him of the cheek I had received from him at our first interview. "Poh poh!" said he, with a complacent smile, "never mind these things. Come to me as often as you can. I shall be glad to see you."

I had learnt that his place of frequent resort was the Mitre Tavern in Fleet Street, where he loved to sit up late, and I begged I might be allowed to pass an evening with him there soon, which he promised I should. A few days afterwards I met him near Temple Bar, about one o'clock in the morning, and asked if he would then go to the Mitre. "Sir," said he, "it is too late; they won't let us in. But I'll go with you another night with all my heart."

A revolution of some importance in my plan of life had just taken place; for instead of procuring a commission in the foot-guards, which was my own inclination, I had, in compliance with my father's wishes, agreed to study the law, and was soon to set out for Utrecht, to hear the lectures of an excellent civilian in that University, and then to proceed on my travels. Though very desirous of obtaining Dr. Johnson's advice and instructions on the mode of pursuing my studies, I was at this time so occupied, shall I call it? or so dissipated, by the amusements of London, that our next meeting was not till Saturday, June 25th, when, happening to dine at Clifton's eating-house, in Butcher Row, 2 I was surprised to perceive Johnson come in and take his seat at another table. The mode of dining, or rather being fed, at such houses in London, is well known to many to be particularly unsocial, as there is no Ordinary, or united company, but each person has his own mess, and is under no obligation to hold any intercourse with any one. A liberal and full-minded man, however, who loves to talk, will break through this churlish and unsocial restraint. Johnson and an Irish gentleman got into a dispute concerning the cause of some part of mankind being black. "Why, Sir," said Johnson, "it has been accounted for in three ways: either by supposing that they are the posterity of Ham, who was cursed; or that God at first created two kinds of men, one black and another white; or that by the heat of the sun the skin is scorched, and so acquires a sooty hue. This matter has been much canvassed among naturalists, but has never been brought to any certain issue." What the Irishman said is totally obliterated from my mind; but I remember that he became very warm and intemperate in his expressions: upon which Johnson rose, and quietly walked away. When he had retired, his antagonist took his revenge, as he thought, by saying, "He has a most ungainly figure, and an affectation of pomposity, unworthy of a man of genius."

Johnson had not observed that I was in the room. I followed him, however, and he agreed to meet me in the evening at the Mitre. I called on him, and we went thither at nine. We had a good supper, and port wine, of which he then sometimes drank a bottle. The orthodox high-church sound of the Mitre, 3 the figure and manner of the celebrated Samuel Johnson, — the extraordinary power and precision of his conversation, and the pride arising from finding myself admitted as his companion, produced a variety of sensations, and a pleasing elevation of mind, beyond what I had ever before experienced. I find in my Journal the following minute of our conversation, which, though it will give but a very faint notion of what passed, is, in some degree, a valuable record; and it will be curious in this view, as showing how habitual to his mind were some opinions which appear in his works.

"Colley Cibber, 4 Sir, was by no means a blockhead: but by arrogating to himself too

3 Colley Cibber was born in 1671, bore arms in favour of the revolution, and, soon after went on the stage as an actor. In 1695 he appeared as a writer of comedies with great and deserved success. He quitted the stage in 1730, on being appointed poet laureate, and died in 1757. much, he was in danger of losing that degree of estimation to which he was entitled. His friends gave out that he intended his birth-day Odes should be bad: but that was not the case, Sir; for he kept them many months by him, and a few years before he died he showed me one of them, with great solicitude to render it as perfect as might be, and I made some corrections, to which he was not very willing to submit. I remember the following couplet in allusion to the King and himself: —

1 Perch'd on the eagle's soaring wing,
The lowlin hemet loves to sing.'

Sir, he had heard something of the fabulous tale of the wren sitting upon the eagle's wing, and he had applied it to a hemlet. Cibber's familiar style, however, was better than that which Whitehead has assumed.

Graul nonsense is insupportable. Whitehead is but a little man to inscribe verses to players."

I did not presume to controvert this censure, which was tinctured with his prejudice against players; but I could not help thinking that a dramatic poet might with propriety pay a compliment to an eminent performer, as Whitehead has very happily done in his verses to Mr. Garrick.

"Sir, I do not think Gray a first-rate poet. He has not a bold imagination, nor much command of words. The obscurity in which he has involved himself will not persuade us that he is sublime. His Elegy in a Churchyard has a happy selection of images, but I don't like what are called his great things. His ode which begins —

Ruin seize thee, ruthless King, Confusion on thy banners wait!'

has been celebrated for its abruptness, and plunging into the subject all at once. But such arts as these have no merit, unless when they are original. We admire them only once; and this abruptness has nothing new in it. We have had it often before. Nay, we have it in the old song of Johnny Armstrong: —

'Is there ever a man in all Scotland, From the highest estate to the lowest degree, &c.

And then, Sir,

'Yes, there is a man in Westmorland,
And Johnny Armstrong they do him call.'

There, now, you plunge at once into the subject. You have no previous narration to lead you to it. The two next lines in that Ode are, I think, very good: —

'Though fann'd by Conquest's crimson wing, They mock the air with idle state.'

Here let it be observed, that although his opinion of Gray's poetry was widely different from mine, and, I believe, from that of most men of taste, by whom it is with justice highly admired, there is certainly much absurdity in the clamour which has been raised, as if he had been culpably injurious to the merit of that bard, and had been actuated by envy. Alas! ye little short-sighted critics, could Johnson be envious of the talents of any of his contemporaries? That his opinion on this subject was what in private and in public he uniformly expressed, regardless of what others might think, we may wonder, and perhaps regret; but it is shallow and unjust to charge him with expressing what he did not think.

Finding him in a placid humour, and wishing to avail myself of the opportunity which I fortunately had of consulting a sage, to hear whose wisdom, I conceived, in the ardour of youthful imagination, that men filled with a noble enthusiasm for intellectual improvement would gladly have resorted from distant lands, I opened my mind to him ingenuously, and gave him a little sketch of my life, to which he was pleased to listen with great attention.

I acknowledged, that though educated very strictly in the principles of religion, I had for some time been misled into a certain degree of infidelity; but that I was come now to a better way of thinking, and was fully satisfied of the truth of the Christian revelation, though I was not clear as to every point considered to be orthodox. Being at all times a curious examiner of the human mind, and pleased with an undisguised display of what had passed in it, he called to me with warmth, —

"Give me your hand; I have taken a liking to you." He then began to descant upon the force of testimony, and the little we could know of final causes; so that the objections of Why was it so? or, Why was it not so? ought not to disturb us: adding, that he himself had at one period been guilty of a temporary neglect of religion; but that it was not the result of argument, but mere absence of thought.

After having given credit to reports of his bigotry, I was agreeably surprised when he expressed the following very liberal sentiment, which has the additional value of obviating an objection to our holy religion, founded upon the discordant tenets of Christians themselves:

1 This was a sneer aimed, it is to be feared, more at Garrick (to whom the verses were inscribed) than at Whitehead. As to Whitehead, see ante, p. 96. n. 2. — Croker.
2 And surely a happy selection of expressions. What does it then want? As to the criticism and quotations which follow, they might be pardonable in loose conversation; but Johnson, unkindly for his own reputation, has preserved them in his criticism on Gray in the Lives of the Poets. There seems to have been some kind of personal pique between Johnson and Gray, for Mr. Norton Nicholls (ante, p. 127. n. 2) says, "Gray disliked Johnson and declined his acquaintance, though he respected his understanding, and still more his goodness of heart." — Croker.

4 Gray had already pointed out his oblation to Shakespeare's King John, in his notes to the poem. — P. Cunningham.

"For my part, Sir, I think all Christians, whether Papists or Protestants, agree in the essential articles, and that their differences are trivial, and rather political than religious."

We talked of belief in ghosts. He said, "Sir, I make a distinction between what a man may experience by the mere strength of his imagination, and what imagination cannot possibly produce. Thus, suppose I should think that I saw a form, and heard a voice cry, 'Johnson, you are a very wicked fellow, and unless you repent you will certainly be punished:' my own unworthiness is so deeply impressed upon my mind, that I might imagine I thus saw and heard, and therefore I should not believe that an external communication had been made to me. But if a form should appear, and a voice should tell me that a particular man had died at a particular place, and a particular hour, a fact which I had no apprehension of, nor any means of knowing, and this fact, with all its circumstances, should afterwards be unquestionably proved, I should in that case be persuaded that had supernatural intelligence imparted to me."

I was pleased to hear it in proper order, once for all, to give a true and fair statement of Johnson's way of thinking upon the question, whether departed spirits are ever permitted to appear in this world, or in any way to operate upon human life. He has been ignorantly misrepresented as weakly credulous upon that subject; and therefore, though I feel an inclination to dislair, and treat with silent contempt, so foolish a notion concerning my illustrious friend, yet, as I find it has gained ground, it is necessary to refute it. The real fact then is, that Johnson had a very philosophical mind, and such a rational respect for testimony, as to make him submit his understanding to what was authentically proved, though he could not comprehend why it was so. Being thus disposed, he was willing to inquire into the truth of any relation of supernatural agency, a general belief of which has prevailed in all nations and ages. But so far was he from being the dupe of implicit faith, that he examined the matter with a jealous attention, and no man was more ready to refute its falsehood when he had discovered it. Churchill, in his poem entitled "The Ghost," availed himself of the absurd credulity imputed to Johnson, and drew a caricature of him under the name of "Fomoro," representing him as one of the believers of the story of a ghost in Cock-lane, which, in the year 1762, had gained very general credit in London. Many of my readers, I am convinced, are to this hour under an impression that Johnson was thus foolishly deceived. If it should surprise them a good deal when they are informed there was undoubted authority, that Johnson was one of those by whom the imposture was detected. The story had become so popular, that he thought it should be investigated; and in this research he was assisted by the Rev. Dr. Douglas, now Bishop of Salisbury, the great detector of impostures; who informs me, that after the gentlemen who went and examined into the evidence were satisfied of its falsity, Johnson wrote in their presence an account of it, which was published in the newspapers and Gentleman's Magazine, and undisputed the world.

Our conversation proceeded. "Sir," said he, "I am a friend to subordination, as most 1 There needed no apology for this; 'tis the ground of all reasoning; the debatable question is as to the authentic proof.

2 No rational man doubted that inquiry would lead to detection; men only wondered, and do still wonder, that Dr. Johnson should so far give countenance. The spirit was imposition as to think a solemn inquiry necessary. - Creuxn.

3 The account was as follows: - On the night of the 1st of February, many gentlemen, eminent for their rank and character, were, by the invitation of the Rev. Mr. Aldrich, of Clerkenwell, assembled at his house, for the examination of the noises supposed to be made by a departed spirit, for the detection of some enormous crime. - About ten at night the gentlemen met in the chamber in which the girl, supposed to be disturbed by a spirit, had with proper caution, been put to bed by several ladies. They sat rather more than an hour, and at length had thought they heard an intimation that there was an imposture; and one of them supposed the father of the girl, who denied, in the strongest terms, any knowledge or belief of fraud. - The supposed spirit had before publicly promised, by an affirmative knock, that it would attend one of the gentlemen into the vault under the church of St. John, Clerkenwell, where the body is deposited, and give the knock upon her coffin, and she would knock upon her coffin; it was therefore determined to make this trial of the existence or veracity of the supposed spirit.

- While they were inquiring and deliberating, they were summoned into the girl's chamber by some ladies who were near her bed, and who had heard knocks and scratches. When the gentlemen entered, the girl declared that she felt the spirit like a mouse upon her back, and was required to hold her hands out of bed. From that time, though the spirit was very solemnly required to manifest its existence by appearance, by impression on the hand or body of any present, by scratches, knocks, or any other agency, no evidence of its presence could be elicited. But the voice of the spirit was then very seriously advertised, that the person to whom the promise was made of striking the coffin was then about to visit the vault, and that the performance of the promise was then claimed. The company at one o'clock went into the church, and the gentleman to whom the promise was made went with another into the vault. The spirit was solemnly required to perform its promise, but nothing more than silence ensued. In the vault, the spirit then dwelt down with several others, but no effect was perceived. Upon their return they examined the girl, but could draw no confession from her. Between two and three she desired and was permitted to go home with her father. It is, therefore, the opinion of the whole assembly, that the girl has some art of making or counterfeiting a particular noise, and that there is no agency of any higher cause." - Boswell.

Hawkins tells us that "Mr. Saunders Welch, Johnson's intimate friend, would have dissuaded him from his purpose of visiting the place, urging that it would expose him to ridicule; but all his arguments had no effect. What Mr. Welch foretold was verified; he was censured for his credulity, his wish was arranged, and his religious opinions resolved into superstition. Nor was this all: that facetious gentleman, Foote, who had assumed the name of the modern Aristotle, without a subject, or a character, had the town with caricatures of living persons, thought that at this time a drama, in which himself should represent Johnson, and in his mien, his garb, and his speech, should display all his comic powers, would yield him a golden harvest. Johnson was apprised of his intention; and gave Mr. Foote to understand, that the licence under which he was permitted to entertain the town would not justify the liberties he was accustomed to take with private characters, and that if he persisted in his design, he would, by a severe chastisement of his representative on the stage, and in the face of the whole audience, convince the world, that, whatever were his talents in the article of satire, he had no other, or any regard to the interests of the public, or the means of gain to any one of his profession. Foote, upon this intimation, had discretion enough conducive to the happiness of society. There is a reciprocal pleasure in governing and being governed."

"Dr. Goldsmith is one of the first men we now have as an author, and he is a very worthy man too. He has been loose in his principles, but he is coming right."

I mentioned Mallet's tragedy of "Elvira," which had been acted the preceding winter at Drury-lane, and that the Hon. Andrew Erskine, Mr. Dempster, and myself, had joined in writing a pamphlet, entitled "Critical Strictures," against it; that the mildness of Dempster's disposition had, however, reeled; and he had candidly said, "We have hardly a right to abuse this tragedy; for, bad as it is, how vain should either of us be to write one not near so good!" Johnson. "Why no, Sir; this is not just reasoning. You may abuse a tragedy, though you cannot write one. You may scold a carpenter who has made you a bad table, though you cannot make a table. It is not your trade to make tables."

When I talked to him of the paternal estate to which I was heir, he said, "Sir, let me tell you, that to be a Scotch landlord, where you have a number of families dependent upon you, and attached to you, is, perhaps, as high a situation as humanity can arrive at. A merchant upon the 'Change of London, with a hundred thousand pounds, is nothing; an English Duke, with an immense fortune, is nothing: he has no tenants who consider themselves as under his patriarchal care, and who will follow him to the field upon an emergency."

His notion of the dignity of a Scotch landlord had been formed upon what he had heard of the Highland chiefs; for it is long since a Lowland landlord has been so curtailed in his feudal authority, that he has little more influence over his tenants than an English landlord; and of late years most of the Highland chiefs have destroyed, by means too well known, the princely power which they once enjoyed.

He proceeded: — "Your going abroad, Sir, and breaking off idle habits, may be of great importance to you. I would go where there are courts and learned men. There is a good deal of Spain that has not been perambulated. I would have you go thither. A man of inferior talents to yours may furnish us with useful observations upon that country." His supposing me, at that period of life, capable of writing an account of my travels that would deserve to be read, elated me not a little.

I appeal to every impartial reader whether this faithful detail of his frankness, complacency, and kindness to a young man, a stranger, and a Scotchman, does not refute the unjust opinion of the harshness of his general demeanour. His occasional reproofs of folly, impudence, or impiety, and even the sudden sallies of his constitutional irritability of temper, which have been preserved for the poignancy of their wit, have produced that opinion among those who have not considered that such instances, though collected by Mrs. Piozzi into a small volume, and read over in a few hours, were, in fact, scattered through a long series of years: years, in which his time was chiefly spent in instructing and delighting mankind by his writings and conversation, in acts of piety to God, and good-will to men.

I complained to him that I had not yet acquired much knowledge, and asked his advice as to my studies. He said, "Don't talk of study now. I will give you a plan; but it will require some time to consider of it." "It is very good in you," I replied, "to allow me to be with you thus. Had it been foretold to me some years ago that I should pass an evening with the author of the Rambler, how should I have exulted!" What I then expressed, was sincerely from the heart. He was satisfied that it was, and cordially answered, "Sir, I am glad we have met. I hope we shall pass many evenings, and mornings too, together." We finished a couple of bottles of port, and sat till between one and two in the morning.

He wrote this year in the Critical Review, the account of "Telemachus, a Mask," by the Rev. George Graham, of Eton College. The subject of this beautiful poem was particularly interesting to Johnson, who had much experience of "the conflict of opposite principles," which he describes as "the contention between pleasure and virtue; a struggle which will always be continued while the present system of nature shall subsist; nor can history or poetry exhibit more than pleasure to desist from his purpose. Johnson entertained no resentment against him, and they were ever after friends." — CROKER.

3 Third son of the fifth Earl of Kellie, born in 1730, died 1793. He published in 1763 some letters and poems addressed to Mr. Boswell. — CROKER.

4 George Dempster, of Dunbinnie, secretary to the Order of the Thistle, and long M. P. for the Fife district of burroughs. Burns mentions him more than once with enly. Mr. Dempster retired from parliament in 1730, and died in 1813, in his 85th year. — CROKER.

5 The Critical Review, in which Mallet himself sometimes wrote, characterized this pamphlet as "the crude efforts of envy, petulance, and self-assertion." There being thus three epithets, we, the three authors, had a humorous contention how each should be appropriated. — BOSWELL.

6 Boswell alludes, principally at least, to the substitution of sheep farming for the old black-cattle system in the Highlands and islands of Scotland, in consequence of which, fewer hands being required on the chief's estates, a large portion of their clansmen were driven into exile in America. We shall hear more of these affairs in the course of the Hebriden Journal, post, Lockhart.

7 Mr. Boswell here, and elsewhere, hints blame against Mrs. Piozzi for repenting Johnson's conversational aspersities. Any one who examines the two works will find that Boswell relates ten times as many as the lady. No one would honestly relate Johnson's conversation without giving such sallies. — CROKER.

triumphing over virtue, and virtue subjugating pleasure."

As Dr. Oliver Goldsmith will frequently appear in this narrative, I shall endeavour to make my readers in some degree acquainted with his singular character. He was a native of Ireland, and a contemporary with Mr. Burke, at Trinity College, Dublin, but did not then give much promise of future celebrity. He, however, observed to Mr. Malone, that "though he made no great figure in mathematics, which was a study in much repute there, he could turn an Ode of Horace into English better than any of them." He afterwards studied physic at Edinburgh, and upon the continent; and, I have been informed, was enabled to pursue his travels on foot, partly by demanding at Universities to enter the lists as a disputant, by which, according to that custom of many of the universities, he was entitled to the premium of a crown, when, luckily for him, his challenge was not accepted; so that, as I once observed to Dr. Johnson, he disputed his passage through Europe. He then came to England, and was employed successively in the capacities of an usher to an academy, a corrector of the press, a reviewer, and a writer for a newspaper. He had sagacity enough to cultivate assiduously the acquaintance of Johnson, and his faculties were gradually enlarged by the contemplation of such a model. To me and many others it appeared that he studiously copied the manner of Johnson, though, indeed, upon a smaller scale.

At this time I think he had published nothing with his name, though it was pretty generally known that one Dr. Goldsmith was the author of "An Inquiry into the present State of Polite Learning in Europe," and of "The Citizen of the World," a series of letters supposed to be written from London by a Chinese. No man had the art of displaying with more advantage, as a writer, whatever literary acquisitions he made. "Nil quod tetigit non ornavit." His mind resembled a fertile, but thin soil. There was a quick, but not a strong vegetation, of whatever chance to be thrown upon it. No deep root could be struck. The oak of the forest did not grow there; but the elegant shrubbery and the fragrant panterre appeared in gay succession. It has been generally circulated and believed that he was a mere fool in conversation; but, in truth, this has been greatly exaggerated. He had, no doubt, a more than common share of that hurry of ideas which we often find in his countrymen, and which sometimes produces a laughable confusion in expressing them. He was very much what the French call unourd; and from vanity and an eager desire of being considered whenever he was, he frequently talked carelessly without knowledge of the subject, or even without thought. His person was short, his countenance coarse and vulgar, his deportment that of a scholar awkwardly affecting the easy gentleman. Those who were in any way distinguished, excited envy in him to so ridiculous an excess, that the instances of it are hardly credible.

When accompanying two beautiful young ladies with their mother on a tour in France, he was seriously angry that more attention was paid to them than to him; and once, at the exhibition of the Fantocci in London, when those who sat next him observed with what dexterity a puppet was made to toss a pike, he could not bear that it should have such praise, and exclaimed with some warmth, "Pshaw! I can do it better myself!"

He, I am afraid, had no settled system of 1 Goldsmith got a premium at a Christmas examination in Trinity College, Dublin, which I have seen.—Kearney. The Christmas premium is the most honourable, being the first of the series. He carries the premium with him through all his travels. The one who has already had a premium can only have a certificate that he had been the best answerer.—Malone. Dr. Kearney must have been under some misconception; as it seems certain that Oliver Goldsmith never obtained any premium.—Croker.

4 He had also published in 1759, "The Bee; being Essays on the most interesting Subjects."—Malone. See his Epitaph in Westminster Abbey, written by Dr. Johnson.—Bowell.

5 In allusion to this, Mr. Horace Walpole, who admired his writings, said he was "an inspired idiot," and Garrick described him as one "for shortness call'd Noll, Who wrote like an angel, and talk'd like poor Poll." Sir Joshua Reynolds mentioned to me, that he frequently heard Goldsmith talk warmly of the pleasure of being liked, and observe how hard it would be if literary excellence should be publish'd in a manner from that satisfaction, which he perceived it often did, from the envy which attended it; and therefore Sir Joshua was convinced that he was intentionally more pleased in order to lessen himself in social inferiors, trusting that his character would be sufficiently supported by his works. If it indeed was his intention to appear absurd in company, he was often very successful. But, with due deference to Sir Joshua's ingenuity, I think the conjecture too refined.—Bowell.

6 Miss Blamee, one of whom is now married to Henry Bundeburg, Esq., and the other to Colonel Gwyn.—Bowell. Mrs. Gwyn survived to favour my first edition with some communications, and died in 1840, within a few days of having completed her 88th year. Mr. Prior, with his usual good-natured anxiety to whitewash Goldsmith, tells us that he has the authority of one of the ladies (no doubt Mrs. Gwyn) for saying that Goldsmith's alleged jealousy of the attention paid to them was a mere pleasantry. I cannot, however, think that he makes out his case. The fact of Goldsmith's having made the absurd complaint is admitted—but, says Mr. Prior's informant, "it was in mere playfulness, and I was shocked at his afterwards to see it in print, as a proof of his envious disposition." The good-natured construction which the kind old lady was willing, after a lapse of above sixty years, to put on Goldsmith's behaviour, she did not express in her previous communication with me, though I had afforded so obvious an opportunity of correcting the alleged injustice; and after all, it can be only matter of opinion whether the vexation so seriously exhibited by Goldsmith was ever communicated; and the lady spoke on, according to Mr. Prior, to state another circumstance, which proves Goldsmith's absurd vanity almost as strongly as the fact which she states. "(Of Parsey,)" said she, "he soon grew tired, the celebrity of his name not ensuring him that attention from its literary circles which the dead Mr. Prior used to bestow on him to excess." Prior's Life, ii, 291.—Croker, 1846.

any sort, so that his conduct must not be strictly scrutinised; but his affections were social and generous, and when he had money he gave it away very liberally. His desire of imaginary consequence predominated over his attention to truth. When he began to rise into notice he said he had a brother who was Dean of Durham; a fiction so easily detected, that it is wonderful how he should have been so inconsiderate as to hazard it. He boasted to me at this time of the power of his pen in commanding money, which I believe was true in a certain degree, though in the instance he gave he was by no means correct. He told me that he had sold a novel for four hundred pounds. This was his "Vicar of Wakefield." But Johnson informed me, that he had made the bargain for Goldsmith, and the price was sixty pounds. "And, Sir," said he, "it was said for them the first of Goldsmith had not been elevated, as it afterwards was, by his 'Traveller;' and the bookseller had such faint hopes of profit by his bargain, that he kept the manuscript by him a long time, and did not publish it till after the 'Traveller' had appeared. Then, to be sure, it was accidentally worth more money."

1 I am willing to hope that there may have been some mistake in the story of how Johnson dined at the expense of the church. Dr. Isaac Goldsmith, his near relation, was Dean of Clony in 1747— Boswell.

2 It may be improper to annex here Mrs. Piozzi's account of this transaction, in her own words, as a specimen of the extreme inaccuracy with which all her anecdotes of Dr. Johnson are related, or rather discoloured and distorted:—

I have forgotten the year, but it could scarcely, I think, be later than 1765 or 1766, that he was called "absolutely by our house after dinner, and, returning in about three hours, said he had been with an enraged author, whose landlady complained to him of the distress caused by his absences from the house without; that he was drinking himself drunk with Madder, to drown care, and fretting over a novel, which, with before and after he wrote, which he could not be persuaded to go down to do for distraction, nor could he step out of doors to offer it for sale. Mr. Johnson, therefore, sent away the landlady, and took the manuscript with him, and the pupil, performance, and desiring some immediate relief; which when he brought back to the writer, he called the woman of the house directly to partake of punch, and pass their time in merriment." Anecdotes, p. 119. — Boswell.

3 Johnson sometimes repeated the same anecdote with different circumstances. Here the greatest discrepancy between the two stories is the time of the day at which it happened; and, unhappily, the admitted fact of the bottle of Madder seems to render Mrs. Piozzi's version the more probable of the two. If, according to Mr. Boswell's account, Goldsmith had, in the morning, charged Johnson's charitable guinea for the purpose of getting a bottle of Madder, we cannot wonder that Mrs. Piozzi represents him as "drinking himself drunk with Madder, to drown care, and fretting over a novel, which he wrote before, and after, and which he could not be persuaded to go down to do for distraction, nor could he step out of doors to offer it for sale. Mr. Johnson, therefore, sent away the landlady, and took the manuscript with him, and the pupil, performance, and desiring some immediate relief; which when he brought back to the writer, he called the woman of the house directly to partake of punch, and pass their time in merriment." Anecdotes, p. 119. — Boswell.

Mrs. Piozzi and Sir John Hawkins have strangely mis-stated the history of Goldsmith's situation and Johnson's friendly interference, when this novel was sold. I shall give it authentically from Johnson's own exact narration:—

"I received one morning a message from poor Goldsmith that he was in great distress, and, as it was not in his power to come to me, begging that I would come to him as soon as possible. I sent him a guinea, and promised to come to him directly. I accordingly went as soon as I was dressed, and found that his landlady had arrested him for his rent, at which he was in a violent passion. I perceived that he had already changed my guinea, and had got a bottle of Madeira and a glass before him. I put the cork into the bottle, desired he would be calm, and began to talk to him of the means by which he might be extricated. He then told me that he had a novel ready for the press, which he produced to me. I looked into it, and saw it merit; told the landlady I should soon return; and having gone to a bookseller, sold it for sixty pounds. I brought Goldsmith the money, and he discharged his rent, not without rating his landlady in a high tone for having used him so ill." — Croker.

4 Goldsmith was small of stature, and of mean aspect. Miss Reynolds says that the greatest triumph of her brother's pencil was in giving something, of an inferior air to Goldsmith, but even this portrait seems mean and vulgar. Hawkins and other writers tell a variety of anecdotes of Goldsmith's impropriety, and say he did not know his own place. Prior, is, with an amiable partiality, disposed to question; whereas the substantial truth of which there can be, I think, no reasonable doubt.

Colonel O'Moor, of Cloghan Castle in Ireland, told me an amusing anecdote of Mr. Johnson, the mingled vanity and simplicity of Goldsmith, which (though the anecdote itself, and anecdotes too often are) is characteristic at least of the opinion which his best friends entertained of Goldsmith. One afternoon, as Colonel O'Moor and Mr. Burke were walking to dine with Sir Joshua Reynolds, they observed Goldsmith (also on his way to Sir Joshua's) standing near a crowd of people, who were staring and shouting at some foreign women in the windows of one of the hotels in Leicester Square. "Observe Goldsmith," said Mr. Burke to O'Moor, "and mark what passes between him and me; and-by-and at Sir Joshua's. They passed on, and arrived before Goldsmith, who came up smilingly and said, 'I am otherwise engaged.' After a little discourse, and as if he would not complying with his acquiescence, the Traveller, Steevens tells a not dissimilar story of Johnson himself, who "confessed to have been apprehended in the power of buffy. Richardson, the author of Clarissa, was his constant friend on such occasions. I remember writing to him," said Johnson, "from a spawning-hill, would say, 'I am sure of my deliverance through his kindness and liberality, that, before his reply was brought, I knew enough to address to the rascal who had me in custody, and did not say, 'Will you give me money for which, at that instant, I had no money to pay.'" London Magazine, vol. vii, p. 259. — Croker.

Anecdotes, p. 115. Life, 420. Boswell. How Mr. Boswell, who affects such extreme accuracy, should say that Hawkins has strangely mis-stated this affair, is very surprising; what Hawkins says is also, that the writer of a pressing necessity, wrote the Vicar of Wakefield, and sold it to Newberry for 48. Hawkins's account is not in any respect inconsistent with Boswell's; and the difference between the prices stated, even if Hawkins be in error, is surely not sufficient to justify the charge of a strange mis-statement. — Croker.

CHAPTER XVI.

Suppers at the Mitre. — Dr. John Campbell. — Warton's Essay on Pope. — Sir James Macaldonald. — Projected Tour to the Hebrides. — School-boy Happiness.

My next meeting with Johnson was on Friday the 1st of July, when he and I and Dr. Goldsmith supped at the Mitre. I was before this time pretty well acquainted with Goldsmith, who was one of the brightest ornaments of the Johnsonian school. Goldsmith's respectful attachment to Johnson was then at its height; for his own literary reputation had not yet distinguished him so much as to excite a vain desire of competition with his great master. He had increased my admiration of the goodness of Johnson's heart, by incidental remarks in the course of conversation; such as, when I mentioned Mr. Levett, whom he entertained under his roof, "He is poor and honest, which is recommendation enough to Johnson;" and when I wondered that he was very kind to a man of whom I had heard a very bad character, "He is now become miserable, and that insures the protection of Johnson."

Goldsmith attempting this evening to maintain, I suppose from an affectation of paradox, "that knowledge was not desirable on its own account, for it often was a source of unhappiness;" Johnson. "Why, Sir, that knowledge may in some cases produce unhappiness, I allow. But, upon the whole, knowledge, per se, is certainly an object which every man would wish to attain, although, perhaps, he may not take the trouble necessary for attaining it."

Dr. John Campbell, the celebrated political and biographical writer, being mentioned, Johnson said, "Campbell is a man of much knowledge, and has a good share of imagination. His 'Hercipppus Redivivus' is very entertaining, as an account of the Hermetic philosophy, and as furnishing a curious history of the extravagancies of the human mind. If it were merely imaginary, it would be nothing at all. Campbell is not always rigidly careful of truth in his conversation; but I do not believe there is any thing of this carelessness in his books. Campbell is a good man, a pious man. I am afraid he has not been in the inside of a church for many years; but he never passes a church without pulling off his hat. This shows that he has good principles. I used to go pretty often to Campbell's on a Sunday evening, till I began to consider that the shoals of Scotchmen who flocked about him might probably say, when any thing of mine was well done, 'Ay, ay, he has learnt this of Cawbell!'"

He talked very contemptuously of Churchill's poetry, observing, that "it had a temporary currency, only from its audacity of abuse, and being filled with living names, and that it would sink into oblivion." I ventured to hint that he was not quite a fair judge, as Churchill had attacked him violently. Johnson. "Nay, Sir, I am a very fair judge. He did not attack me violently till he found I did not like his poetry; and his attack on me shall not prevent me from continuing to say what I think of him, from an apprehension that it may be ascribed to resentment. No, Sir, I called the fellow a blockhead at first, and I will call him a blockhead still. However, I will acknowledge that I have a better opinion

1 This is so ambiguously worded, that it is necessary to observe, that the "bad character" was not Levett. — Crotts.

2 I am inclined to think that he was misinformed as to this circumstance. I own I am jealous for my worthy friend Dr. John Campbell. For though Milton could without remorse absent himself from public worship, I cannot. On the contrary, I have the same habitual impressions upon my mind, with those of a truly venerable judge, who said to Mr. Langton, "Friend Langton, if I have not been at church on Sunday, I do not feel myself easy." Dr. Campbell was a sincerely religious man. Lord Macartney, who is eminent for his variety of knowledge, and attention to men of talents, and knew him well, told me, that when he called on him in a morning, he found him reading a chapter in the Greek New Testament, which he informed his lordship was his constant practice. The quantity of Dr. Campbell's composition is almost incredible, and his labours brought him large profits. Dr. Joseph Warton told me that Johnson said of him, "He is the richest author that ever graced the common of literature."

— Boswell.

Mr. Boswell quotes this dictum as if it was evidence only of Dr. Campbell's wealth; he probably did not see that it characterised his celebrated friend, by no very complimentary allusion, as grazing the common of literature. The strange story of Campbell's "pulling off his hat whenever he passed a church, though he had not been for many years inside one," must have arisen from some error. Johnson could hardly have seriously entertained such an absurdity. It is well known, that the members of the kirk of Scotland do not think it necessary to uncover on entering places of worship, though the lower classes sometimes show a kind of superstition venerating for burial-places; perhaps Dr. Campbell may, in conversation with Johnson, have alluded to those circumstances, and thus given occasion to this misconception. His "Lives of the Admirals" is the only one of his almost innumerable publications that is now called for. He was born in 1708, and died in 1779. — Crotts.

3 Campbell's residence for some years before his death was the large new-built house situate at the north-west corner of Queen Square, Bloomsbury, whither, particularly on a Sunday evening, great numbers of persons of the first eminence for science and literature are accustomed to resort for the enjoyment of conversation." of him now than I once had; for he has shewn more fertility than I expected. To be sure, he is a tree that cannot produce good fruit: he only bears crabs. But, Sir, a tree that produces a great many crabs is better than a tree which produces only a few."

In this depreciation of Churchill's poetry I could not agree with him. It is very true that the greatest part of it is upon the topics of the day, on which account, as it brought him great fame and profit at the time, it must proportionally slide out of the public attention as other occasional objects succeed. But Churchill had extraordinary vigour both of thought and expression. His portraits of the players will ever be valuable to the true lovers of the drama; and his strong caricatures of several eminent men of his age, will not be forgotten by the curious. Let me add, that there is in his works many passages which are of a general nature; and his "Prophecy of Famine" is a poem of no ordinary merit. It is, indeed, falsely injurious to Scotland; but therefore may be allowed a greater share of invention.

Bonnell Thornton had just published a burlesque "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," adapted to the ancient British music, viz. the salt-box, the Jew's harp, the narrow-bones and cleaver, the hum-strum or hurdy-gurdy, &c. Johnson praised its humour, and seemed much diverted with it. He repeated the following passage:

"In strains more exalted the salt-box shall join, And clattering and battering and clapping combine; With a rap and a tap, while the hollow side sounds, Up and down leaps the flap, and rattling rebounds." 1

I mentioned the periodical paper called "The Connoisseur." He said it wanted matter.

— No doubt it had not the deep thinking of Johnson's writings; but surely it has just views of the surface of life, and a very sprightly manner. His opinion of "The World" 2 was not much higher than of "The Connoisseur."

Let me here apologise for the imperfect manner in which I am obliged to exhibit Johnson's conversation at this period. In the early part of my acquaintance with him, I was so wrapt in admiration of his extraordinary colloquial talents, and so little accustomed to his peculiar mode of expression, that I found it extremely difficult to recollect and record his conversation with its genuine vigour and vivacity. In progress of time, when my mind was, as it were, strongly impregnated with the Johnsonian aether, I could, with much more facility and exactness, carry in my memory and commit to paper the exuberant variety of his wisdom and wit.

At this time Miss Williams, as she was then called, though she did not reside with him in the Temple under his roof, but had lodgings in Bolt-court, Fleet-street, had so much of his attention, that he every night drank tea with her before he went home, however late it might be, and she always sat up for him. This, it may be fairly conjectured, was not alone a proof of his regard for her; but of his own unwillingness to go into solitude, before that unsseasonal hour at which he had habituated himself to expect the oblivion of repose. Dr. Goldsmith, being a privileged man, went with him this night, strutting away, and calling to me with an air of superiority, like that of an esoteric over an exoteric disciple of a sage of antiquity, "I go to Miss Williams." I confess, I then envied him this mighty privilege, of which he seemed so proud; but it was not long before I obtained the same mark of distinction.

On Tuesday the 5th of July, I again visited Johnson. He told me he had looked into the poems of a pretty voluminous writer, Mr. (now Dr.) John Ogilvie, one of the Presbyterian ministers of Scotland, which had lately come out, but could find nothing in them. Boswell. "Is there not imagination in them, Sir?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, there is in them, what was imagination, but it is no more imagination, in him, than sound is sound in the echo. And his diction, too, is not his own. We have long ago seen white-robed innocence, and flower-bespangled meads."

Talking of London, he observed, "Sir, if you wish to have a just notion of the magnitude of this city, you must not be satisfied with seeing its great streets and squares, but must survey the innumerable little lanes and courts. It is not in the showy evolutions of buildings, but in the multiplicity of human habitations which are crowded together, that the wonderful immensity of London consists." — I have often amused myself with thinking how different a place London is to different people. They, whose narrow minds are contracted to the consideration of some one particular pursuit, view it only through that medium. A politician thinks of it merely as the seat of go-

1 In 1789 I set for Smart and Newbery, Thornton's burlesque Ode on St. Cecilia's day. It was performed at Ranadagh in masks, to a very crowded audience, as I was told, for I then resided in Norfolk. Bead sang the salt-box song, which was admirably accompanied on that instrument by Brent, the fencing-master and father of Miss Brent, the celebrated singer Skegg on the broumstick, as bassoon; and a remarkable performer on the Jew's harp. "Buzzing twangs the iron lyre." Cleavers were cast in bell-metal for this entertainment. All the performers of the old woman's Oratory, employed by Foote, were. I believe, employed at Ranadagh on this occasion. — BURNEY. In the original edition of this ode now before me, the date on the title-page is 1769, a mistake, no doubt, for 1769. For the use to which Dr. Burney put it, as a burlesque vehicle for music, it is very well; but as a literary production, it seems without object or meaning. It has not even the low merit of being a parody; the best line is that on the Jew's harp, above quoted—"Buzzing twangs the iron lyre." — CROKER.

vernment in its different departments; a grazier, as a vast market for cattle; a mercantile man, as a place where a prodigious deal of business is done upon 'Change; a dramatic enthusiast, as the grand scene of theatrical entertainments; a man of pleasure, as an assemblage of taverns, and the great emporium for ladies of easy virtue. But the intellectual man is struck with it, as comprehending the whole of human life in all its variety, the contemplation of which is inexhaustible.

[JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.]

"July 5, 1763.

"My dearest Dear,—I am extremely glad that so much prudence and virtue as yours is at last awarded with so large a fortune; and doubt not that the excellence which you have shewn in circumstances of difficulty will continue the same in the convenience of wealth.

"I have not written to you sooner, having nothing to say, which you would not easily suppose—nothing but that I love you and wish you happy; of which you may be always assured, whether I write or not.

"I have had an inflammation in my eyes; but it is much better, and will be, I hope, soon quite well.

"Be so good as to let me know whether you design to stay at Lichfield this summer; if you do, I purpose to come down. I shall bring Frank with me; so that Kitty must contrive to make two beds, or get a servant's bed at the Three Crowns, which may be as well. As I suppose she may want sheets, and table linen, and such things, I have sent ten pounds, which she may lay out in conveniences. I will pay her for our board what you think proper; I think a guinea a week for me and the boy.

"Be pleased to give my love to Kitty.—I am, my dearest love, your most humble servant,

On Wednesday, July 6, he was engaged to sup with me at my lodgings in Downing-street, Westminster. But on the preceding night my landlord having behaved very rudely to me and some company who were with me, I had resolved not to remain another night in his house. I was exceedingly uneasy at the awkward appearance I supposed I should make to Johnson and the other gentlemen whom I had invited, not being able to receive them at home, and being obliged to order supper at the Mitre. I went to Johnson in the morning, and talked of it as of a serious distress. He laughed, and said, "Consider, Sir, how insignifi-

2 Certainly not; you must use them according to the contract, expressed or implied, under which you have hired them. If a landlord breaks his part of the contract, the law will relieve the other party; but the latter is not at liberty to take such violent and illegal steps as Johnson suggests.—Croker.

4 The northern bird mentioned page 143. When I asked Dr. Johnson's permission to introduce him, he obligingly agreed; adding, however, with a slight parenthesis, "but I must give us none of his poetry." It is remarkable that Johnson and Churchill, however much they differed in other points, agreed on this subject. See Churchill's "Journey." It is, however, but justice to Dr. Ogilvie to observe, that his "Day of Judgement" has no inconsiderable share of merit.—Boswell.

Boswell's naivety in thinking it remarkable that two persons should agree in disliking the poetry of his northern bard is amusing; it might have been more remarkable if two had agreed in liking it.—Croker.
that we hold the king can do no wrong; that whatever may happen to be wrong in government may not be above our reach, by being ascribed to Majesty. Redress is always to be had against oppression, by punishing the immediate agents. The king, though he should command, cannot force a judge to condemn a man unjustly; therefore it is the judge whom we prosecute and punish. Political institutions are formed upon the consideration of what will most frequently tend to the good of the whole, although now and then exceptions may occur. Thus it is better in general that a nation should have a supreme legislative power, although it may at times be abused. And then, Sir, there is this consideration, that if the abuse be enormous, Nature will rise up; and, claiming her original rights, overturn a corrupt political system. I mark this animated sentence with peculiar pleasure, as a noble instance of that truly dignified spirit of freedom which ever glowed in his heart, though he was charged with slavish tenets by superficial observers; because he was at all times indignant against that false patriotism, that pretended love of freedom, that unruly restlessness, which is inconsistent with the stable authority of any good government.

This generous sentiment, which he uttered with great fervour, struck me exceedingly, and stirred my blood to that pitch of fancied resistance, the possibility of which I am glad to keep in mind, but to which I trust I never shall be forced.

"Great abilities," said he, "are not requisite for an historian; for in historical composition all the greatest powers of the human mind are quiescent. He has facts ready to his hand; so there is no exercise of invention. Imagination is not required in any high degree; only about as much as is used in the lower kinds of poetry. Some penetration, accuracy, and colouring, will fit a man for the task, if he can give the application which is needful."

"Baylie. Dictionary is a very useful work for those to consult who love the biographical part of literature, which is what I love most."

Talking of the eminent writers in Queen Anne's reign, he observed, "I think Dr. Arbuthnot the first man among them. He was the most universal genius, being an excellent physician, a man of deep learning, and a man of much humour. Mr. Addison was to be sure, a great man: his learning was not profound; but his morality, his humour, and his elegance of writing, set him very high."

Mr. Ogilvie was unlucky enough to choose for the topic of his conversation the praises of his native country. He began with saying, that there was very rich land around Edinburgh. Goldsmith, who had studied physic there, contradicted this, very untruly, with a sneering laugh. Disconcerted a little by this, Mr. Ogilvie then took new ground, where I suppose, he thought himself perfectly safe; for he observed, that Scotland had a great many noble wild prospects. JOHNSON. "I believe, Sir, you have a great many. Norway, too, has noble wild prospects; and Lapland is remarkable for prodigious noble wild prospects. But, Sir, let me tell you, the noblest prospect which a Scotman ever sees, is the high road that leads him to England!" This unexpected and pointed salvo produced a roar of applause. After all, however, those who admire the rude grandeur of Nature cannot deny it to Caledonia.

On Saturday, July 9., I found Johnson surrounded with a numerous leuva, but have not preserved any part of his conversation.

JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.

"July 12. 1763.

"My dearest Love,—I had forgot my debt to poor Kitty; pray let her have the note, and do what you can for her, for she has been always very good. I will help her to a little more money if she wants it, and will write. I intend that she shall have the use of the house as long as she and I live.

"That there should not be room for me at the house is some disappointment to me, but the matter is not very great. I am sorry you have had your head filled with building, for many reasons. It was not necessary to settle immediately for life at any one place; you might have staid and seen more of the world. You will not have your work done, as you do not understand it, but at twice the value. You might have hired a house at half the interest of the money for which you build it, if your house cost you a thousand pounds. You might have the Palace for twenty pounds, and make forty of your thousand pounds; so in twenty years you would have the truth." adds Mrs. Piozzi, "he hated to hear about prospects and views, and laying out ground, and taste in gardening:—"That was the best garden (he said) which produced most roots and fruits; and that water was most to be prized which contained most fish." He used to laugh at Shenstone most unmercifully for not caring whether there was any thing good to eat in the streams he was so fond of. Walking in a wood when it rained was, I think, the only rural image which pleased his fancy. He loved the sight of fine forest-trees, however, and deserted Brighthelmstone Downs, because it was a country so truly desolate (he said), that if one had a mind to hang one's self for desperation at being obliged to live there, it would be difficult to find a tree on which to fasten the rope." — Croker.

JOHNSON TO GEORGE STRAHAN.

"Dear George,—To give pain ought always to be painful, and I am sorry that I have been the occasion of any uneasiness to you, to whom I hope never to [do] anything but for your benefit or your pleasure. Your uneasiness was without any reason on your part, as you had written with sufficient frequency to me, and I had only neglected to answer them, because as nothing now had been proposed to your study, no new direction or incitement could be offered you. But if it had happened that you had omitted what you did not omit, and that I had for an hour, or a week, or a much longer time, thought myself put out of your mind by something to which presence gave that prevalence, which presence will sometimes give even where there is the most prudence and experience, you are not to imagine that my friendship is light enough to be blown away by the first cross blast, or that my regard or kindness hangs by so slender a hair as to be broken off by the unfelt weight of a petty offence. I love you, and hope to love you long. You have hitherto done nothing to diminish my good will, and though you had done much more than you have supposed imputed to you, my good will would not have been diminished.

"I write thus largely on this suspicion, which you have suffered to enter into your mind, because in youth we are apt to be too rigorous in our expectations, and to suppose that the duties of life are to be performed with unfailling exactness and regularity; but in our progress through life we are forced to abate much of our demands, and to take friends such as we can find them, not as we would make them.

"These concessions every wise man is more ready to make to others, as he knows that he shall often want them for himself; and when he remembers how often he fails in the observance of a cultivation of his best friends, is willing to suppose that his friends may in their turn neglect him, without any intention to offend him.

"When therefore it shall happen, as happen it will, that you or I have disappointed the expectation of the other, you are not to suppose that you have lost me, or that I intended to lose you; nothing will remain but to repair the fault, and to go on as if it never had been committed. I am, Sir, your affectionate servant, Sam. Johnson."—Rose MSS.

On the 14th we had another evening by ourselves at the Mitre. It happening to be a rainy night, I made some common-place observations on the relaxation of nerves and depression of spirits which such weather occa-

by pretty good arguments. The French are a much more numerous people than we; and it is not likely that they would allow us to take it. 'But the ministry have assured us, in all the formality of the Gazette, that it is taken.' — Very true. But the ministry have put us to an enormous expense by the war in America, and it is their interest to persuade us that we have got something for our money. — 'But the fact is confirmed by thousands of men who were at the taking of it.' — Ay, but these men have still more interest in deceiving us. They don't want that you should think the French have beat them, but that they have beat the French. Now suppose you should go over and find that it really is taken; that would only satisfy yourself; for when you come home we will not believe you. We will say, you have been bribed. — Yet, Sir, notwithstanding all these plausible objections, we have no doubt that Canada is really ours. Such is the weight of common testimony. How much stronger are the evidences of the Christian religion!''

"Illness is a disease which must be combatted; but I would not advise a rigid adherence to a particular plan of study. I myself have never persisted in any plan for two days together. A man ought to read just as inclination leads him; for what he reads as a task will do him little good. A young man should read five hours in the day, and so may acquire a great deal of knowledge."

To a man of vigorous intellect and ardent curiosity like his own, reading without a regular plan may be beneficial; though even such a man must submit to it, if he would attain a full understanding of any of the sciences.

To such a degree of unrestrained frankness has he now accustomed me, that in the course of this evening I talked of the numerous reflections which had been thrown out against him on account of his having accepted a pension from his present Majesty. "Why, Sir, (said he, with a hearty laugh,) it is a mighty foolish noise that they make. I have accepted of a pension as a reward which has been thought due to my literary merit; and now that I have this pension, I am the same man in every respect that I have ever been; I retain the same principles. It is true, that I cannot now curse (smiling) the house of Hanover; nor would it be decent for me to drink King James's health in the wine that King George gives me money to pay for. But, Sir, I think that the pleasure of cursing the house of Hanover, and drinking King James's health, are amply overbalanced by three hundred pounds a year."

There was here, most certainly, an affectation of more Jacobitism than he really had; and indeed an intention of admitting, for the moment, in a much greater extent than it really existed, the charge of disaffection imputed to him by the world, merely for the purpose of showing how dexterously he could repel an attack, even though he were placed in the most disadvantageous position; for I have heard him declare, that if holding up his right hand would have secured victory at Culloden to Prince Charles's army, he was not sure he would have held it up; so little confidence had he in the right claimed by the house of Stuart, and so fearful was he of the consequences of another revolution on the throne of Great Britain; and Mr. Topham Beaufeck assured me, he had heard him say this before he had his pension. At another time he said to Mr. Langton, "Nothing has ever offered that has made it worth my while to consider the question fully." He, however, also said to the same gentleman, talking of King James the Second, "It was become impossible for him to reign any longer in this country." He no doubt had an early attachment to the house of Stuart; but his zeal had cooled as his reason strengthened. Indeed, I heard him once say, "that after the death of a violent Whig, with whom he used to contend with great eagerness, he felt his Toryism much abated." I suppose he meant Mr. Walmsley. 3

Yet there is no doubt that at earlier periods he was wont often to exercise both his pleasantry and ingenuity in talking Jacobitism. My much respected friend, Dr. Douglas, now Bishop of Salisbury, has favoured me with the following admirable instance from his Lordship's own collection: One day when dining at old Mr. Langton's, whose Miss Roberts, his niece, was one of the company, Johnson, with his usual complacent attention to the fair sex, took her by the hand and said, "My dear, I hope you are a Jacobite." Old Mr. Langton, who, though a high and steady Tory, was attached to the present royal family, seemed offended, and asked Johnson with great warmth, what he could mean by putting such a question to his niece? "Why, Sir," said Johnson, "I meant no offence to your niece; I meant her a great compliment. A Jacobite, Sir, believes in the divine right of kings. He that believes in the divine right of kings believes in a Divinity. A Jacobite believes in the divine right of bishops. He that believes in the

2 When I mentioned the same idle clamour to him several years afterwards, he said, with a smile, "I wish my pension were twice as large, that they might make twice as much noise." — Boswell.

3 It seems unlikely that he and Mr. Walmsley could have had much intercourse since 1757, when Johnson removed to London: Mr. Walmsley continuing to reside in Lichfield, where he died in 1781: it was more probably some member of theivy-lane club, perhaps McGhie, who was a strong Whig; as indeed was Dyer, but he survived to 1772. — C. 1781. I cannot but believe that the events of 1745 had some influence on Dr. Johnson personally, to the diminution of his Jacobite feelings. See ante, p. 54. n. 2. The battle of Culloden was fought some months after the Pretender's retreat out of England, when, if at all, the occasion of Johnson's disgust must have happened. — Croker, 1846.
The right of bishops believes in the divine authority of the Christian religion. Therefore, Sir, a Jacobite is neither an atheist nor a deist. That cannot be said of a Whig; for Whiggism is a negation of all principle. He advised me, when abroad, to be as much as I could with the professors in the universities, and with the clergy; for from their conversation I might expect the best accounts of everything, in whatever country I should be, with the additional advantage of keeping my learning alive.

It will be observed, that when giving me advice as to my travels, Dr. Johnson did not dwell upon cities, and palaces, and pictures, and shows, and Arcadian scenes. He was of Lord Essex’s opinion, who advises his kinsman, Roger Earl of Rutland, “rather to go a hundred miles to speak with one wise man, than five miles to see a fair town.”

I described to him an impudent fellow from Scotland, who affected to be a savage, and railed at all established systems. Johnson, “There is nothing surprising in this, Sir. He wants to make himself conspicuous. He would tumble in a hogstye, as long as you looked at him and called to him to come out. But let him alone, never mind him, and he’ll soon give it over.”

I added, that the same person maintained that there was no distinction between virtue and vice. Johnson. “Why, Sir, if the fellow does not think as he speaks, he is lying; and I see not what honour he can propose to himself from having the character of a liar. But if he does really think that there is no distinction between virtue and vice, why, Sir, when he leaves our houses let us count our spoons.”

Sir David Dalrymple, now one of the Judges of Scotland by the title of Lord Hailes, had contributed much to increase my high opinion of Johnson, on account of his writings, long before I attained to a personal acquaintance with him: I, in return, had informed Johnson of Sir David’s eminent character for learning and religion; and Johnson was so much pleased, that at one of our evening meetings he gave him for his toast. I at this time kept up a very frequent correspondence with Sir David; and I read to Dr. Johnson to-night the following passage from the letter which I had last received from him:

“Boswell’s and He and He and He raised. But he looked would Scotland, man, Lord Johnson, and having advice with me, I thought to have the best accounts of everything in whatever country I should be, with the additional advantage of keeping my learning alive.

I at this time kept up a very frequent correspondence with Sir David; and I read to Dr. Johnson to-night the following passage from the letter which I had last received from him:

He used to tell, with great humour, from my relation to him, the following little story of my early years, which was literally true:—”Boswell, in the year 1745, was a fine boy, wore a white cockade, and prayed for King James, till one of his uncles (General Cochran) gave him a shilling on condition that he would pray for King George, which he accordingly did. So you see (says Boswell) that Whigs of all ages are made the same way.”—Boswell.

The celebrated and unfortunate Earl of Essex.—Croker, 1846.

Croker, 1846.

This learned and excellent person was born in 1726; educated at Eton, and afterwards at Utrecht; called to the Scotch bar in 1748; a lord of session in 1766. He died in 1792. He wrote some papers in the World and Mirror, and published several original tracts on religious, historical, and antiquarian subjects, and republished a great many more.—Croker.

The elder brother of the first Lord Rokeby, called Lord Thomas Robinson, on account of his height, and to distinguish him from Sir Thomas Robinson, first Lord Grantham. He was a familiar acquaintance of Lord Chesterfield, and by him, as Raskins relates, employed as a mediator with Johnson, who, on his first visit, treated him very indifferently. It was on his request for an epigram that Lord Chesterfield made thedistinction.

“Tale my subject will I make my song, It shall be witty and it shan’t be long.”

and to whom he said in his last illness, “Ah, Sir Thomas,
"Pretty well, Sir, for one man. As to his being an author, I have not looked at his poetry; but his prose is poor stuff. He writes just as you may suppose Voltaire's footboy to do, who has been his amanuensis. He has such parts as the valet might have, and about as much of the colouring of the style as might be got by transcribing his works." When I was at Ferney, I repeated this to Voltaire, in order to persuade him somewhat to Johnson, whom he, in affecting the English mode of expression, had previously characterised as "a superstitious dog;" but after hearing such a criticism on Frederick the Great, with whom he was then on bad terms, he exclaimed, "An honest fellow!"

But I think the criticism much too severe; for the "Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg" are written as well as many works of that kind. His poetry, for the style of which he himself makes a frank apology, "jargonnant un Français barbare," though fraught with pernicious ravings of infidelity, has, in many places, great animation, and in some a pathetic tenderness.

Upon this contemptuous animadversion on the King of Prussia, I observed to Johnson, "It would seem then, Sir, that much less parts are necessary to make a king, than to make an author; for the king of Prussia is confessedly the greatest king now in Europe, yet you think he makes a very poor figure as an author."

Mr. Levett this day showed me Dr. Johnson's library, which was contained in two garrets over his chambers, where Lintot, son of the celebrated bookseller of that name, had formerly his warehouse. I found a number of good books, but very dusty and in great confusion. The floor was strewed with manuscript leaves, in Johnson's own handwriting, which I beheld with a degree of veneration, supposing they perhaps might contain portions of the Rambler, or of Rasselas. I observed an apparatus for chemical experiments, of which Johnson was all his life very fond. The place seemed to be very favourable for retirement and meditation. Johnson told me, that he went up thither without mentioning it to his servant when he wanted to study, secure from interruption; for he would not allow his servant to say he was not at home when he really was. "A servant's strict regard for truth," said he, "must be weakened by such a practice. A philosopher may know that it is merely a form of denial; but few servants are such nice distinguishers. If I accustom a servant to tell a lie for me, have I not reason to apprehend that he will tell many lies for himself?" I am, however, satisfied that every servant, of any degree of intelligence, understands saying his master is not at home, not at all as the affirmation of a fact, but as customary words, indicating that his master wishes not to be seen; so that there can be no bad effect from it.

Mr. Temple, now vicar of St. Giles, Cornhall, who had been my intimate friend for many years, had at this time chambers in Farrar's Buildings, at the bottom of Inner Temple Lane, which he kindly lent me upon my quitting my lodgings, he being to return to Trinity Hall, Cambridge. I found them particularly convenient for me, as they were so near Dr. Johnson's.

On Wednesday, July 20, Dr. Johnson, Mr. Dempster, and my uncle Dr. Boswell, who happened to be now in London, supped with me at these chambers. Johnson. "Pity is not natural to man. Children are always cruel. Savages are always cruel. Pity is acquired and improved by the cultivation of reason." We may have uneasy sensations from seeing a creature in distress, without pity; for we have not pity unless we wish to relieve them. When I am on my way to dine with a friend, and finding it late, have bid the coachman make haste, if I happen to attend when he whips his horses, I may feel unpleasantly that the animals are put to pain, but I do not wish him to desist: no, Sir, I wish him to drive on."

Mr. Alexander Donaldson, bookseller of Edinburgh, had for some time opened a shop in London, and sold his cheap editions of the most popular English books, in defiance of the supposed common-law right of Literary Property. Johnson, though he concurred in the opinion which was afterwards sanctioned by a judgment of the House of Lords, that there was no such right, was at this time very angry that the booksellers of London, for whom he uniformly professed much regard, should suffer from an invasion of what they had ever considered to be secure; and he was loud and violent against Mr. Donaldson. "He is a fellow who takes advantage of the law to injure his brethren; for notwithstanding that the statute secures only fourteen years of exclusive right, it has always been understood by the trade, that he who buys it will, be sooner over with me than it would be with you, for I am dying by inches. Lord Chesterfield was very short. Sir Thomas did not long survive his witty friend, and died in 1777. — CROKER.

1. William Johnson Temple, LL D, of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. Boswell had formed an intimacy with this gentleman at the University of Glasgow. Temple's sketch of Gray's character, adopted both by Mason and Johnson, has transmitted his name to posterity. For some particulars of his preferment and works, see Mitford's "Gray," p. 111. He died Aug. 8, 1796. — MARKLAND.

2. Johnson's antithesis between pity and cruelty is not exact, and the argument (such as it is) drawn from it is therefore inconclusive. Pity is as natural to man as any other emotion of the mind. Bishop Elrington observed to me, that children are said to be cruel, when it would be more just to say that they are ignorant — they do not know that they give pain. Nor are savages cruel in the sense here used, for cruelty's sake; they use cruel means to attain an object, because they know no other mode of accomplishing the object: and so far is pity from being acquired solely by the cultivation of reason, that reason is one of the checks upon the pity natural to mankind. — CROKER.

the copyright of a book from the author obtains a perpetual property; and upon that belief, numberless bargains are made to transfer that property after the expiration of the statutory term. Now, Donaldson, I say, takes advantage here, of people who have really an equitable title from usage; and if we consider how few of the books, of which they buy the property, succeed so well as to bring profit, we should be of opinion that the term of fourteen years is too short; it should be sixty years." Dempster. "Donaldson, Sir, is anxious for the encouragement of literature. He reduces the price of books, so that poor students may buy them." Johnson (laughing). "Well, Sir, allowing that to be his motive, he is no better than Robin Hood, who robbed the rich in order to give to the poor."

It is remarkable, that when the great question concerning literary property came to be ultimately tried before the supreme tribunal of this country, in consequence of the very spirited exertions of Mr. Donaldson, Dr. Johnson was jealous about a perpetuity; but he thought that the term of the exclusive right of authors should be considerably enlarged. He was then for granting a hundred years.

The conversation now turned upon Mr. David Hume's style. Johnson. "Why, Sir, his style is not English; the structure of his sentences is French. Now the French structure and the English structure may, in the nature of things, be equally good. But if you allow that the English language is established, he is wrong. My name might originally have been Nicholson, as well as Johnson; but were you to call me Nicholson now, you would call me very absurdly."

Rousseau's treatise on the inequality of mankind was at this time a fashionable topic. It gave rise to an observation by Mr. Dempster, that the advantages of fortune and rank were nothing to a wise man, who ought to value only merit. Johnson. "If man were a savage, living in the woods by himself, this might be true; but in civilised society we all depend upon each other, and our happiness is very much owing to the good opinion of mankind. Now, Sir, in civilised society, external advantages make us more respected. A man with a good coat upon his back meets with a better reception than he who has a bad one. Sir, you may analyse this, and say, What is there in it? But that will avail you nothing, for it is a part of a general system. Pound St. Paul's church into atoms, and consider any single atom; it is, to be sure, good for nothing; but, put all these atoms together, and you have St. Paul's church. So it is with human felicity, which is made up of many ingredients, each of which may be shown to be very insignificant. In civilised society, personal merit will not serve you so much as money will. Sir, you may make the experiment. Go into the street, and give one man a lecture on morality, and another a shilling, and see which will respect you most. If you wish only to support nature, Sir, William Petty fixes your allowance at three pounds a year; but as times are much altered, let us call it six pounds. This sum will fill your belly, shelter you from the weather, and even get you a strong lasting coat, supposing it to be made of good bull's hide. Now, Sir, all beyond this is artificial, and is desired in order to obtain a greater degree of respect from our fellow creatures. And, Sir, if six hundred pounds a year procure a man more consequence, and of course, more happiness, than six pounds a year, the same proportion will hold as to six thousand, and so on, as opulence can be carried. Perhaps he who has a large fortune may not be so happy as he who has a small one; but that must proceed from other causes than from his having the large fortune: for, ceteris paribus, he who is rich, in civilised society, must be happier than he who is poor; as riches, if properly used, (and it is a man's own fault if they are not,) must be productive of the highest advantages. Money, to be sure, of itself is of no use; for its only use is to part with it. Rousseau, and all those who deal in paradoxes, are led away by a childish desire of novelty. When I was a boy, I used always to choose the wrong side of a debate, because most ingenious things, that is to say, most new things, could be said upon it. Sir, there is nothing for which you may not muster up more plausible arguments, than those which are urged against wealth and other external advantages. Why, now, there is stealing; why should it be thought a crime? When we consider by what unjust methods property has been often acquired, and that what was unjustly got it, must be unjust to keep, where is the harm in one man's taking the property of another from him? Besides, Sir, when we consider the bad use that many people make of their property, and how much better use the thief may make of it, it may be defended as a very allowable practice. Yet, Sir, the experience of mankind has discovered stealing to be so very bad a thing, that they make no scruple to hang a man for it. When I was running about this town a very poor 1. fellow, I was a great arguer for the advantages of poverty; but I was, at the same time, very sorry to be poor. Sir, all the arguments which are brought to represent poverty as no evil, show it to be evidently a great evil. You never find people labouring to convince you that you may live very happily upon a plentiful fortune. So you hear people talking how miserable a king must be; and yet they all wish to be in his place.”

It was suggested, that kings must be unhappy, because they are deprived of the greatest of all satisfactions, easy and unreserved society. Johnson. “That is an ill-founded notion. Being a king does not exclude a man from such society. Great kings have always been social. The king of Prussia, the only great king at present, is very social. Charles the Second, the last king of England who was a man of parts, was social; and our Henrys and Edwards were all social.”

Mr. Dempster having endeavoured to maintain that intrinsic merit ought to make the only distinction amongst mankind. Johnson. “Why, Sir, mankind have found that this cannot be. How shall we determine the proportion of intrinsic merit? Were that to be the only distinction amongst mankind, we should soon quarrel about the degrees of it. Were all distinctions abolished, the strongest would not long acquiesce, but would endeavour to obtain a superiority by their bodily strength. But, Sir, as subordination is very necessary for society, and contentions for superiority very dangerous, mankind, that is to say, all civilised nations, have settled it upon a plain invariable principle. A man is born to hereditary rank; or his being appointed to certain offices gives him a certain rank. Subordination tends greatly to human happiness. Were we all upon an equality, we should have no other enjoyment than mere animal pleasure.”

I said, I consider distinction of rank to be of so much importance in civilised society, that if I were asked on the same day to dine with the first duke in England, and with the first man in Britain for genius, I should hesitate which to prefer. Johnson. “To be sure, Sir, if you were to dine only once, and it were never to be known where you dined, you would choose rather to dine with the first man for genius; but to gain most respect, you should dine with the first duke in England. For nine people in ten that you meet with, would have a higher opinion of you for having dined with a duke; and the great genius himself would receive you better, because you had been with the great duke.”

He took care to guard himself against any possible suspicion that his settled principles of reverence for rank, and respect for wealth, were at all owing to mean or interested motives; for he asserted his own independence as a literary man. “No man,” said he, “who ever lived by literature, has lived more independently than I have done.” He said he had taken longer time than he needed to have done in composing his Dictionary. He received our compliments upon that great work with complacency, and told us that the Academy della Crusca could scarcely believe that it was done by one man.

Next morning I found him alone, and have preserved the following fragments of his conversation. Of a gentleman who was mentioned, he said, “I have not met with any man for a long time who has given me such general displeasure. He is totally unfixed in his principles, and wants to puzzle other people.” I said his principles had been poisoned by a noted infidel writer, but that he was, nevertheless, a benevolent good man. Johnson. “We can have no dependence upon that instinctive, that constitutional goodness, which is not founded upon principle. I grant you that such a man may be a very amiable member of society. I can conceive him placed in such a situation that he is not much tempted to deviate from what is right; and as every man prefers virtue, when there is not some strong incitement to transgress its precepts, I can conceive him doing nothing wrong. But if such a man stood in need of money, I should not like to trust him; and I should certainly not trust him with young ladies, for there there is always temptation. Hume, and other sceptical innovators, are vain men, and will gratify themselves at any expense. Truth will not afford sufficient food to their vanity; so they have betaken themselves to error. Truth, Sir, is a cow which will yield such people no more milk, and so they are gone to milk the bull. If I could have allowed myself to gratify my vanity at the expense of truth, what fame might I have acquired! Every thing which Hume has advanced against Christianity had passed through my mind long before he wrote. Always remember this, that after a system is well settled upon positive evidence, a few partial objections ought not to shake it. The human mind is so limited, that it cannot take in all the parts of a subject, so that there may be objections raised against anything. There are objections against a plenum, and objections against a vacuum; yet one of them must certainly be true.”

1 This opinion received strong confirmation from George the Fourth, whose natural affabilities were undoubtedly very considerable. A prayer was earnestly glorious, and his private life was in a high degree amiable and social; but after all, the dullest people must be social in their own way, and George I. was probably as social in the Duchess of Kendal’s circle as Charles II. in the Duchess of Cleveland’s—Choker.

2 Probably Mr. Dempster, whose share in the preceding conversation—and it is, I dare say, not fully reported by his friend Hume—was very likely to have displeased Johnson. The “infidel writer” is no doubt their countryman, Hume. — Choker.
I mentioned Hume's argument against the belief of miracles, that it is more probable that the witnesses to the truth of them are mistaken, or speak falsely, than that the miracles should be true. Johnson. "Why, Sir, the great difficulty of proving miracles should make us very cautious in believing them. But let us consider; although God has made Nature to operate by certain fixed laws, yet it is not unreasonable to think that he may suspend those laws, in order to establish a system highly advantageous to mankind. Now the Christian religion is a most beneficial system, as it gives us light and certainty where we were before in darkness and doubt. The miracles which prove it are attested by men who had no interest in deceiving us; but who, on the contrary, were told that they should suffer persecution, and did actually lay down their lives in confirmation of the facts which they asserted. Indeed, for some centuries the heathens did not pretend to deny the miracles; but said they were performed by the aid of evil spirits. This is a circumstance of great weight. Then, Sir, when we take the proofs derived from prophecies which have been so exactly fulfilled, we have most satisfactory evidence. Supposing a miracle possible, as to which, in my opinion, there can be no doubt, we have as strong evidence for the miracles in support of Christianity as the nature of the thing admits."

At night, Mr. Johnson and I supped in a private room at the Turk's Head coffee-house, in the Strand. "I encourage this house," said he, "for the mistress of it is a good civil woman, and has not much business."

"Sir, I love the acquaintance of young people; because, in the first place, I don't like to think myself growing old. In the next place, young acquaintances must last longest, if they do last; and then, Sir, young men have more virtue than old men; they have more generous sentiments in every respect. I love the young dogs of this age; they have more wit and humour and knowledge of life than we had; but then the dogs are not so good scholars. Sir, in my early years I read very hard. It is a sad reflection, but a true one, that I knew almost as much at eighteen as I do now. My judgment, to be sure, was not so good; but I had all the facts. I remember very well, when I was at Oxford, an old gentleman said to me, 'Young man, ply your book diligently now, and acquire a stock of knowledge; for when years come unto you, you will find that poring upon books will be but an irksome task.'"

This account of his reading, given by himself in plain words, sufficiently confirms what I have already advanced upon the disputed question as to his application. It reconciles any seeming inconsistency in his way of talking upon it at different times; and shows that idleness and reading hard were with him relative terms, the import of which, as used by him, must be gathered from a comparison with what scholars of different degrees of ardour and assiduity have been known to do. And let it be remembered, that he was now talking spontaneously, and expressing his genuine sentiments; whereas at other times he might be induced, from his spirit of contradiction, or more properly from his love of argumentative contest, to speak lightly of his own application to study. It is pleasing to consider that the old gentleman's gloomy prophecy as to the irksomeness of books to men of an advanced age, which is too often fulfilled, was so far from being verified in Johnson, that his avour for literature never failed, and his last writings had more ease and vivacity than any of his earlier productions.

He mentioned it to me now, for the first time, that he had been distressed by melancholy, and for that reason had been obliged to fly from study and meditation, to the dissipating variety of life. Against melancholy he recommended constant occupation of mind, a great deal of exercise, moderation in eating and drinking, and especially to shun drinking at night. He said melancholy people were apt to fly to intemperance for relief, but that it sunk them much deeper in misery. He observed, that labouring men, who work hard, and live sparingly, are seldom or never troubled with low spirits.

He again insisted on the duty of maintaining subordination of rank. "Sir, I would no more deprive a nobleman of his respect, than of his money. I consider myself as acting a part in the great system of society, and I do to others as I would have them to do to me. I would behave to a nobleman as I should expect he would behave to me, were I a nobleman and he Sam. Johnson. Sir, there is one Mrs. Macaulay, in this town, a great republican. One day when I was at her house, I put on a very grave countenance, and said to her, 'Madam, I am now become a convert to your way of thinking. I am convinced that all mankind are upon an equal footing; and to give you an unquestionable proof, Madam, that I am in earnest, here is a very sensible, civil, well-behaved fellow citizen, your footman; I desire that he may be allowed to sit down and dine with us.' I thus, that of eighteen; as he told Mr. Langton, who gave me this information—Malone. He went to Oxford in his nineteenth year, and produced, if he had not previously made, his translation of the Messiah before he had been there quite three months. —Croker.

4 This "one Mrs. Macaulay" was the same personage, who afterwards made herself so much known as "the celebrated female historian." — Boswell. See ante, p. 78. n. 3. — C.
Sir, showed her the absurdity of the levelling doctrine. She has never liked me since. Sir, your levellers wish to level down as far as themselves; but they cannot bear levelling up to themselves. They would all have some people under them; why not then have some people above them? I mentioned a certain author who disgrusted me by his forwardness, and by showing no deference to noblemen into whose company he was admitted.

Johnson. Suppose a shoemaker should claim an equality with him, as he does with a lord: how would he stare! "Why, Sir, do you stare? (says the shoemaker.) I do great service to society. "Tis true, I am paid for doing it; but so are you, Sir: and, I am sorry to say it, better paid than I am, for doing something not so necessary. For mankind could do better without your books, than without my shoes." Thus, Sir, there would be a perpetual struggle for precedence, were there no fixed invariable rules for the distinction of rank, which creates no jealousy, as it is allowed to be accidental.

He said, Dr. Joseph Warton was a very agreeable man, and his "Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope" a very pleasing book. I wondered that he delayed so long to give us the continuation of it. Johnson. "Why, Sir, I suppose he finds himself a little disappointed, in not having been able to persuade the world to be of his opinion as to Pope."

We have now been favoured with the concluding volume, in which, to use a parliamentary expression, he has explained, so as not to appear quite so adverse to the opinion of the world, concerning Pope, as was at first thought; and we must all agree, that his work is a most valuable accession to English literature.

A writer of deserved eminence being mentioned, Johnson said, "Why, Sir, he is a man of good parts, but being originally poor, he has got a love of mean company, and low jocularity; a very bad thing, Sir. To laugh is good, as to talk is good. But you ought no more to think it enough if you laugh, than you are to think it enough if you talk. You may laugh in as many ways as you talk; and surely every way of talking that is practised cannot be esteemed."

I spoke of Sir James Macdonald as a young man of most distinguished merit, who united the highest reputation at Eton and Oxford, with the patriarchal spirit of a great Highland chieftain. I mentioned that Sir James had said to me, that he had never seen Mr. Johnson, but he had a great respect for him, though at the same time it was mixed with some degree of terror. Johnson. "Sir, if he were to be acquainted with me, it might lessen both."

The mention of this gentleman led us to talk of the Western Islands of Scotland, to visit which he expressed a wish, that then appeared to me a very romantic fancy, which I little thought would be afterwards realised. He told me, that his father had put Martin's account of those islands into his hands when he was very young, and that he was highly pleased with it; that he was particularly struck with the St. Kilda man's notion that the high church of Glasgow had been hollowed out of a rock; a circumstance to which old Mr. Johnson had directed his attention. He said, he would go to the Hebrides with me, when I returned from my travels, unless some very good companion should offer when I was absent, which he did not think probable; adding, "There are few people to whom I take so much as to you." And when I talked of my leaving England, he said with a very affectionate air, "My dear Boswell, I should be very unhappy at parting, did I think we were not to meet again." I cannot too often remind my readers, that although such instances of his kindness are doubtless very flattering to me, yet I hope my recording them will be ascribed to a better motive than to vanity; for they afford unquestionable evidence of his tenderness and complacency, which some, while they were forced to acknowledge his great powers, have been so strenuous to deny.

He maintained, that a boy at school was the happiest of human beings. I supported a different opinion, from which I have never yet varied, that a man is happier: and I enlarged upon the anxiety and sufferings which are endured at school. Johnson. "Ah! Sir, a boy's being flogged is not so severe as a man's having the hiss of the world against him. Men have a solicitude about fame; and the greater share they have of it, the more afraid they are of losing it." I silently asked myself, "Is it possible that the great Samuel Johnson really entertains any such apprehension, and is not confident that his exalted fame is established upon a foundation never to be shaken?"

He this evening drank a bumper to Sir David Dalrymple, "as a man of worth, a

1 It is not easy to say who was here meant. Murphy, who was born poor, was distinguished for elegance of manners and conversation; and Fielding, who could not have been spoken of as alive in 1753, was born to better prospects, though he kept low company; and had it been Goldsmith, Boswell would probably have had no scruple in naming him. — C., 1830. The neighbouring mention of the name of Joseph Warton, and the allusion to "a fondness for low company," with which he has been often reproached (though Dr. Mant says unjustly), creates a suspicion that he is the person meant. The Quarterly Review (1831) suggests Smollett; who had left London for Italy the month before this conversation occurs, and might naturally be talked of; but, on the whole, I believe Warton was meant. — CROKER.

2 A young baronet of great promise, whom Mr. Boswell called the Marcellus of Scotland, and whom the concurrent testimony of his contemporaries proves to have been a very extraordinary young man. 1763.

Table-Talk. — Influence of the Weather. — Swift.

On Tuesday, July 26, I found Mr. Johnson alone. It was a very wet day, and I again complained of the disagreeable effects of such weather. Johnson. "Sir, this is all imagination, which physicians encourage; for man lives in air, as a fish lives in water; so that, if the atmosphere press heavy from above, there is an equal resistance from below. To be sure, bad weather is hard upon people who are obliged to be abroad; and men cannot labour so well in the open air in bad weather, as in good: but Sir, a smith or tailor, whose work is within doors, will surely do much as in rainy weather as in fair. Some very delicate frames indeed may be affected by wet weather; but not common constitutions."

We talked of the education of children; and I asked him what he thought was best to teach them first. Johnson. "Sir, it is no matter what you teach them first, any more than what leg you shall put into your breeches first. Sir, you may stand disputing which is best to put in first, but in the mean time your breech is bare. Sir, while you are considering which of two things you should teach your child first, another boy has learnt them both."

On Thursday, July 28, we again supped in private at the Turk's Head coffee-house. Johnson. "Swift has a higher reputation than he deserves. His excellence is strong sense, for his humour, though very well, is not remarkably good. I doubt whether the "Tale of a Tub" be his; for he never owned it, and it is much above his usual manner."

"Thomson, I think, had as much of the poet about him as most writers. Every thing appeared to him through the medium of his favourite pursuit. He could not have viewed those two candles burning but with a poetical eye."

"Has not 2 a great deal of wit, Sir?" Johnson. "I do not think so, Sir. He is, indeed, continually attempting wit, but he fails. And I have no more pleasure in hearing a man attempting wit and failing, than in seeing a man trying to leap over a ditch and tumbling into it."

He laughed heartily when I mentioned to him a saying of his concerning Mr. Thomas Sheridan, which Foote took a wicked pleasure to circulate. "Why, Sir, Sherry is dull, naturally dull; but it must have taken him a great deal of pains to become what we now see him. Such an excess of stupidity, Sir, is not in Nature." — "So," said he, "I allowed him all his own merit."

He now added, "Sheridan cannot bear me. I bring his declamation to a point. I ask him a plain question, 'What do you mean to teach?'" Besides, Sir, what influence can Mr. Sheridan have upon the language of this great country, by his narrow exertions? Sir, it is burning a farthing candle at Dover, to show light at Calais."

Talking of a young man 4 who was uneasy from thinking that he was very deficient in learning and knowledge, he said, "A man has no reason to complain who holds a middle place, and has many below him; and perhaps he has not six of his years above him; — perhaps not one. Though he may not know anything perfectly, the general mass of knowledge that he has acquired is considerable. Time will do for him all that is wanting."

The conversation then took a philosophical turn. Johnson. "Human experience, which is constantly contradicting theory, is the great test of truth. A system built upon the discoveries of a great many minds, is always of more strength than what is produced by the mere workings of any one mind, which, of itself, can do little. There is not so poor a book in the world that would not be a prodigious effort were it wrought out entirely by a single mind, without the aid of prior investigators. The French writers are superficial, because they are not scholars, and so proceed upon the mere power of their own minds; and we see how very little power they have."

1 This opinion was given by him more at large at a subsequent period. See part, Aug. 15. 1773. — Boswell. How could Johnson doubt that Swift was the author of the Tale of a Tub, when, as he himself relates in his Life of Swift, "no other claimant can be produced; and when Archbishop Sharp and the Duches of Somerset, by showing it to Queen Anne, debarred Swift of a bishoprick, he did not deny it." We have, moreover, Swift's own acknowledgment of it, in his letter to Ben. Tooke, the printer, June 29. 1710. — Croker.

2 There is no doubt that this blank must be filled with the name of Mr. Burke. See part, Aug. 15. and Sept. 19. 1773, and April 23. 1778. — Croker.

3 He endeavours to assign a reason for Sheridan's dissatisfaction to every element of the true one; there is even reason to suppose, from Mr. Boswell's own account, that Johnson and Sheridan never met after Johnson's insults to Sheridan on the subject of the pension. — Croker.

4 No doubt Boswell himself, now about twenty-two. — Croker.
“As to the Christian religion, Sir, besides the strong evidence which we have for it, there is a balance in its favour from the number of great men who have been convinced of its truth, after a serious consideration of the question. Grotius was an acute man, a lawyer, a man accustomed to examine evidence, and he was convinced. Grotius was not a recluse, but a man of the world, who certainly had no bias to the side of religion. Sir Isaac Newton set out an infidel, and came to be a very firm believer.”

He this evening again recommended to me to perambulate Spain. I said it would amuse him to get a letter from me dated at Salamanca. Johnson. “I love the university of Salamanca; for when the Spaniards were in doubt as to the lawfulness of their conquering America, the university of Salamanca gave it as their opinion that it was not lawful.” He spoke this with great emotion, and with that generous warmth which dictated the lines in his “London,” against Spanish encroachment.

I expressed my opinion of my friend Derrick as but a poor writer. Jonsson. “To be sure, Sir, he is: but you are to consider that his being a literary man has got for him all that he has. It has made him King of Bath. Sir, he has nothing to say for himself but that he is a writer. Had he not been a writer, he must have been sweeping the crossings in the streets, and asking alms from everybody that passed.”

In justice, however, to the memory of Mr. Derrick, who was my first tutor in the ways of London, and showed me the town in all its variety of departments, both literary and sportive, the particulars of which Dr. Johnson advised me to put in writing, it is proper to mention what Johnson, at a subsequent period [27th August, 1773], said of him, both as a writer and an editor: “Sir, I have often said, that if Derrick’s letters had been written by one of a more established name, they would have been thought very pretty letters.” And [22d September, 1773], “I sent Derrick to Dryden’s relations to gather materials for his life; and I believe he got all that I myself should have got.”

Poor Derrick! I remember him with kindness. Yet I cannot withhold from my readers a pleasant humorous sally which could not have hurt him had he been alive, and now is perfectly harmless. In his collection of poems, there is one upon entering the harbour of Dublin, his native city, after a long absence. It begins thus:

“Eblana! much loved city, hail! Where first I saw the light of day.”

And after a solemn reflection on his being numbered with forgotten dead, there is the following stanza:

“Unless my lines protract my fame, And those who chance to read them, cry, I knew him! Derrick was his name, In yonder tomb his ashes lie;”— which was thus happily parodied by Mr. John Home, to whom we owe the beautiful and pathetic tragedy of “Douglas”:

“Unless my deeds protract my fame, And he who passes sadly sings, I knew him! Derrick was his name, On yonder tree his carcose swings!”

I doubt much whether the amiable and ingenious author of these burlesque lines will recollect them; for they were produced extempore one evening while he and I were walking together in the dining-room at Eglingtone Castle, in 1760, and I have never mentioned them to him since.

Johnson said once to me, “Sir, I honour Derrick for his presence of mind. One night, when Floyd, another poor author, was wandering about the streets in the night, he found Derrick fast asleep upon a bulk: upon being suddenly waked, Derrick started up, ‘My dear Floyd, I am sorry to see you in this destitute state: will you go home with me to my lodgings?’”

I again begged his advice as to my method of study at Utrecht. “Come,” said he, “let us make a day of it. Let us go down to Greenwich and dine, and talk of it there.” The following Saturday was fixed for this excursion.

As we walked along the Strand to-night, arm in arm, a woman of the town accosted us, in the usual enticing manner. “No, no, my girl,” said Johnson, “it won’t do.” He, however, did not treat her with harshness; and we talked of the wretched life of such women, and agreed, that much more misery than happiness, upon the whole, is produced by illicit commerce between the sexes.

1 Where, Bishop Elrington asked, did Johnson learn this? It is true that Dr. Horsley declined publishing some papers on religious subjects which Newton left behind him—some have suspected that they were tinted with Unitarianism; others (probably from a consideration of his work on the Revolutions) believed that they were in a strain of mysticism not (in the opinion of his friends) worthy of so great a genius; and the recent publication of his two letters to Locke, in a style of infantine simplicity (See Lord King’s Life of Locke), gives additional colour to this latter opinion; but for Johnson’s assertion that he set out an infidel, there appears no authority, and all the inferences are the other way. CROKER.

2 I fully intended to have followed advice of such weight; but having staid much longer both in Germany and Italy than I proposed to do, and having also visited Corsica, I found that I had exceeded the time allowed me by my father, and hastened to France in my way homewards—BOSWELL.

3 “Has Heaven reserved, in pity to the poor, No pathless waste, or undrak’d shore? No secret island in the boundless main? No peaceful desert yet unclim’d by Spain?” CROKER.

4 Thomas Floyd published, in 1760, “Bibliotheca Biographica; a Synopsis of Universal Biography,” in three volumes. V. H.—BOSWELL.

5 No great presence of mind; for Floyd would have naturally accepted such a proposal, and then Derrick would have been doubly exposed.—CROKER.
On Saturday, July 30, Dr. Johnson and I took a sculler at the Temple-stairs, and set out for Greenwich. I asked him if he really thought a knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages was an essential requisite to a good education.

JOHNSON. "Most certainly, Sir; for those who know them have a very great advantage over those who do not. Nay, Sir, it is wonderful what a difference learning makes upon people even in the common intercourse of life, which does not appear to be much connected with it. And yet," said I, "people go through the world very well, and carry on the business of life to good advantage, without learning." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, that may be true in cases where learning cannot possibly be of any use; for instance, this boy rows us as well without learning as if he could sing the song of Orpheus to the Argonauts, who were the first sailors." He then called to the boy, "What would you give, my lad, to know about the Argonauts?" "Sir," said the boy, "I would give what I have." Johnson was much pleased with his answer, and we gave him a double fare. Dr. Johnson then turning to me, "Sir," said he, "a desire of knowledge is the natural feeling of mankind; and every human being, whose mind is not debauched, will be willing to give all that he has, to get knowledge."¹

We landed at the Old Swan², and walked to Billingsgate, where we took oars and moved smoothly along the silver Thames. It was a very fine day. We were entertained with the immense number and variety of ships that were lying at anchor, and with the beautiful country on each side of the river.

I talked of preaching, and of the great success which those called methodists³ have. JOHNSON. "Sir, it is owing to their expressing themselves in a plain and familiar manner, which is the only way to do good to the common people, and which clergymen of genius and learning ought to do from a principle of duty, when it is suited to their congregations; a practice, for which they will be praised by men of sense. To insist against drunkenness as a crime, because it debases reason, the noblest faculty of man, would be of no service to the common people: but to tell them that they may die in a fit of drunkenness, and show them how dreadful that would be, cannot fail to make a deep impression. Sir, when your Scotch clergy give up their homely manner, religion will soon decay in that country." Let this observation, as Johnson meant it, be ever remembered.

I was much pleased to find myself with Johnson at Greenwich, which he celebrates in his "London" as a favourite scene. I had the poem in my pocket, and read the lines aloud with enthusiasm:

"On Thames's banks in silent thought we stood, Where Greenwich smiles upon the silver flood: Struck with the seat that gave Eliza birth, We kneel and kiss the consecrated earth."

He remarked that the structure of Greenwich Hospital was too magnificent for a place of charity, and that its parts were too much detached, to make one great whole.

Buchanan, he said, was a very fine poet; and observed, that he was the first who complimented a lady, by ascribing to her the different perfections of the heathen goddesses;⁴ but that Johnson⁵ improved upon this, by making his lady, at the same time, free from their defects.

He dwelt upon Buchanan's elegant verses to Mary Queen of Scots, Nymphæa Caledonica, &c., and spoke with enthusiasm of the beauty of Latin verse. "All the modern languages," he said, "are by nature sanguine and thirsty of the mind as well as of the body: mark the intellectual voracity of children, who are so eager to learn, and so much inclined to beauty, in whatever form it is presented. The difference of the ebb-tide and the flood-tide was innumerable. It was a great fortune to be able to go on board the Argonauts; such were the beautiful lines of the beautiful Buchanan! But I am anxious how much better Johnson is; for he is the fashion to ridicule, without any knowledge of their tenets; and this I can do by quoting a passage from one of their best apologists, Mr. Miller, who thus expresses their doctrine upon this subject: — "Justified by faith, renewed in his faculties, and constrained by the love of Christ, the believer moves in the sphere of love and gratitude, and all his duties flow more or less from this principle. And though they are accumulating for him in heaven a treasure of bliss proportioned to his faithfulness and activity, and it is by no means inconsistent with his principles to feel the force of this consideration, yet love itself sweetens every duty to his mind; and he thinks there is no absurdity in his feeling the love of God as the grand commanding principle of his life."⁶ — Essays on religious Subjects, &c., by Joseph Milner, A.M., Master of the Grammar School of Kingston-upon-Thames, 1789, p. 11. — BOSWELL. Joseph Milner was brother of the better known Dr. Isaac Milner, who died Dean of Carlisle. — CROKER.

² The erection of a new London Bridge may render it useful to observe, that with the flood-tide it was impossible, and with the ebb-tide dangerous, to pass through, or stop at, the arches of the old bridge: in the latter case, prudent passengers, therefore, landed above the bridge, and walked to some wharf below it. — C. I had once the honour of attending the Duke and Duchess of York on a party of pleasure down the river, and we were about to land to allow the barge to shoot the bridge. The Duchess asked "why?" and being told that it was on account of the danger, positively refused to get out of the boat, and insisted on shooting, which we reluctantly did; but we shipped a good deal of water, and all got very wet; Her Royal Highness showing not the least alarm or regret. — CROKER.

³ All who are acquainted with the history of religion, (the most important, surely, that concerns the human mind,) know that the appellation of Methodists was first given to a society of students in the University of Oxford, who, about the year 1730, were distinguished by an earnest and methodical attention to devout exercises. This disposition of mind, and the practice which arose from it, spread into all parts of the United Kingdom, and still may be, found in many Christians of every denomination. It is a devout and useful methodist. In his Rambler, No. 110, he mentions with respect "the whole discipline of regulated pieté;" and in his "Prayers and Meditations," many instances occur of his anxious examination into his spiritual state. That this religious earnestness, and in particular an observation of the individual precepts of the Bible, has been highly lauded, is fully, and sometimes been counter-acted for base purposes, cannot be denied. But it is not, therefore, fair to decry it when genuine. The principal argument, in reason and good sense, against methodism is, that it tends to debase human nature, and prevent the generous exertions of goodness, by an unholy devotion, their system [?] regard to them; although it is positively said in the scriptures, that he "will reward every man according to his works." But I am happy to have it in my power to do justice to them whom it is the fashion to ridicule, without any knowledge of their tenets; and this I can do by quoting a passage from one of their best apologists, Mr. Milner, who thus expresses their doctrine upon this subject: — "Justified by faith, renewed in his faculties, and constrained by the love of Christ, the believer moves in the sphere of love and gratitude, and all his duties flow more or less from this principle. And though they are accumulating for him in heaven a treasure of bliss proportioned to his faithfulness and activity, and it is by no means inconsistent with his principles to feel the force of this consideration, yet love itself sweetens every duty to his mind; and he thinks there is no absurdity in his feeling the love of God as the grand commanding principle of his life." — Essays on religious Subjects, &c., by Joseph Milner, A.M., Master of the Grammar School of Kingston-upon-Thames, 1789, p. 11. — BOSWELL. Joseph Milner was brother of the better known Dr. Isaac Milner, who died Dean of Carlisle. — CROKER.

said he, "cannot furnish so melodious a line as—

Formosum resonare dores Amaranthi silvis." 1

Afterwards he entered upon the business of the day, which was to give me his advice as to a course of study. And here I am to mention, with much regret, that my record of what he said is miserably scanty. I recollect with admiration an animating blaze of eloquence, which roused every intellectual power in me to the highest pitch, but must have dazzled me so much, that my memory could not preserve the substance of his discourse; for the note which I find of it is no more than this:—

"He ran over the grand scale of human knowledge; advised me to select some particular branch to excel in, but to acquire a little of every kind." The defect of my minutes will be fully supplied by a long letter upon the subject, which he favoured me with, after I had been some time at Utrecht, and which my readers will have the pleasure to peruse in its proper place.

We walked in the evening in Greenwich Park. He asked me, I suppose by way of trying my disposition, "Is not this very fine?" Having no exquisite relish of the beauties of nature, and being more delighted with "the busy hum of men," I answered, "Yes, Sir; but not equal to Fleet-street." JOHNSON.

"You are right, Sir." I am aware that many of my readers may censure my want of taste. Let me, however, shelter myself under the authority of a very fashionable baronet 2 in the brilliant world, who, on his attention being called to the fragrance of a May evening in the country, observed, "This may be very well; but, for my part, I prefer the smell of a flameau at the playhouse."

We staid so long at Greenwich, that our sail up the river, in our return to London, was by no means so pleasant as in the morning; for the night air was so cold that it made me shiver. I was the more sensible of it from having sat up all the night before recollecting and writing in my Journal what I thought worthy of preservation; an exertion, which, during the first part of my acquaintance with Johnson, I frequently made. I remember having sat up four nights in one week, without being much incommode in the daytime.

Johnson, whose robust frame was not in the least affected by the cold, scolded me, as if my shivering had been a paltry effeminacy, saying, "Why do you shiver?" Sir William Scott 3 of the Commons, told me, that when he com-

him. Johnson. "No, Sir; not much. It may, perhaps, be mentioned at an election."

I had now made good my title to be a privileged man, and was carried by him in the evening to drink tea with Miss Williams, whom, though under the misfortune of having lost her sight, I found to be agreeable in conversation; for she had a variety of literature, and expressed herself well; but her peculiar value was the intimacy in which she had long lived with Johnson, by which she was well acquainted with his habits, and knew how to lead him on to talk.

After tea he carried me to what he called his walk, which was a long narrow paved court in the neighbourhood, overshadowed by some trees. There we sauntered a considerable time; and I complained to him that my love of London and of his company was such, that I shrank almost from the thought of going away even to travel, which is generally so much desired by young men. He roused me by manly and spirited conversation. He advised me, when settled in any place abroad, to study with an eagerness after knowledge, and to apply to Greek an hour every day; and when I was moving about, to read diligently the great book of mankind.

On Wednesday, August 3d, we had our last social evening at the Turk's Head coffee-house, before my setting out for foreign parts. I had the misfortune, before we parted, to irritate him unintentionally. I mentioned to him how common it was in the world to tell absurd stories of him, and to ascribe to him very strange sayings. Johnson. "What do they make me say, Sir?" Boswell. "Why, Sir, as an instance very strange indeed, (laughing heartily as I spoke,) David Hume told me, you said that you would stand before a battery of cannon to restore the Convocation to its full powers." Little did I apprehend that he had actually said this: but I was soon convinced of my error; for, with a determined look, he thundered out, "And would I not, Sir? Shall the Presbyterian kirk of Scotland have its General Assembly, and the Church of England be denied its Convocation?" He was walking up and down the room, while I told him the anecdote; but when he uttered this explosion of high-church zeal, he had come close to my chair, and his eyes flashed with indignation. I bowed to the storm, and diverted the force of it, by leading him to expatiate on the influence which religion derived from maintaining the church with great external respectability.

I must not omit to mention that he this year wrote "The Life of Ascham,"† and the Dedication to the Earl of Shaftesbury, † prefixed to the edition of that writer's English works, published by Mr. Bennet.‡

On Friday, August 5th, we set out early in the morning in the Harwich stage-coach. A flat elderly gentlewoman, as a young Dutchman, seemed the most inclined among us to conversation. At the inn where we dined, the gentlewoman said that she had done her best to educate her children; and particularly, that she had never suffered them to be a moment idle. Johnson. "I wish, Madam, you would educate me too: for I have been an idle fellow all my life." "I am sure, Sir," she said, "you have not been idle." Johnson. "Nay, Madam, it is very true; and that gentleman there," pointing to me, "has been idle. He was idle at Edinburgh. His father sent him to Glasgow, where he continued to be idle. He then came to London, where he has been very idle; and now he is going to Utrecht, where he will be as idle as ever." I asked him privately how he could expose me so. Johnson. "Poh, poh!" said he, "they knew nothing about you, and will think of it no more." In the afternoon the gentlewoman talked violently against the Roman Catholics, and of the horrors of the Inquisition. To the utter astonishment of all the passengers but myself, who knew that he could talk upon any side of a question, he defended the Inquisition, and maintained, that "false doctrine should be checked on its first appearance; that the civil power should unite with the church in punishing those who dare to attack the established religion, and that such only were punished by the Inquisition." He had in his pocket "Pomponius Mela de Situ Orbis," in which he read occasionally, and seemed very intent upon ancient geography. Though by no means niggardly, his attention to what was generally right was so minute, that having observed at one of the stages that I ostentatiously gave a shilling to the coachman, when the custom was for each passenger to give only sixpence, but its meeting is a mere form, and it neither does nor dares do any business. It is now a solemn farce—but its reality would probably be fatal to the Church itself, and is, indeed, in the present state of our constitution, impossible. The historical inquirer sees, in the Houses of Convocation, Lords, and Commons, a striking analogy with the three Estates of the old Etats Généraux of France. —Croker.

1 Johnson was, in fact, the editor of this work, as appears from a letter of Mr. T. Davies to the Rev. Edmund Burke, March 12, 1775:—"Reverend Sir,—I take the liberty to send you Roger Ascham’s works in English. Though Mr. Bennet’s name is prefixed to it in the title, the editor was evidently Mr. Johnson, the author of the Rambler, who wrote the life of the author, and added several notes. Mr. Johnson gave it to Mr. Bennet, for his advantage." I have not discovered why Johnson took this interest in Mr. Bennet. —Croker.

2 This probably alludes to Mr. Burke’s "Vindication of Natural Society," a work published in 1756, in a happy imitation of Lord Bolingbroke’s style, and in an ironical adoption of his principles: the whole was so well done, that it at first passed as a genuine work of Lord Bolingbroke’s, and subsequently as a serious and (as in style and imagery it certainly is) splendid exposition of the principles of one of his disciples. Lord Chesterfield and Bishop Warburton are stated to have been so deceived; and it would seem, from the passage in the text, that Johnson and Boswell were in the same error. In 1756, Mr. Burke reprinted this piece, with a preface, in which he throws off all the blame upon himself. Mr. Boswell calls him a friend of Johnson’s, for he himself had not yet met Mr. Burke. —Croker.

3 It must be confessed, that the existing practice relative to Convocation is an anomaly, that seems at first sight absurd. Convocation is still summoned to meet when Parliament does;
he took me aside and scolded me, saying that what he had done would make the coachman dissatisfied with all the rest of the passengers, who gave him no more than his due. This was a just reprimand; for in whatever way a man may indulge his generosity or his vanity in spending his money, for the sake of others he ought not to raise the price of any article for which there is a constant demand.

He talked of Mr. Blacklock's poetry, so far as it was descriptive of visible objects; and observed, that, "as its author had the misfortune to be blind, we may be absolutely sure that such passages are combinations of what he has remembered of the works of other writers who could see. That foolish fellow, Spence, has laboured to explain philosophically how Blacklock may have done, by means of his own faculties, what it is impossible he should do. The solution, as I have given it, is plain. Suppose, I know a man to be so lame that he is absolutely incapable to move himself; and I find him in a different room from that in which I left him; shall I puzzle myself with idle conjectures, that, perhaps, his nerves have by some unknown change all at once become effective? No, Sir, it is clear how he got into a different room; he was carried."

Having stopped a night at Colchester, Johnson talked of that town with veneration, for having stood a siege for Charles the First. The Dutchman alone now remained with us. He spoke English tolerably well; and, thinking to recommend himself to us by expatiating on the superiority of the criminal jurisprudence of this country over that of Holland, he inveighed against the barbarity of putting an accused person to the torture, in order to force a confession. But Johnson was as ready for this, as for the Inquisition. "Why, Sir, you do not, I find, understand the law of your own country. To torture in Holland is considered as a favour to an accused person; for no man is put to the torture there unless there is as much evidence against him as would amount to conviction in England. An accused person among you, therefore, has one chance more to escape punishment, than those who are tried among us."

At supper this night he talked of good eating with uncommon satisfaction. "Some people," said he, "have a foolish way of not minding, or pretending not to mind, what they eat.

For my part, I mind my belly very studiously, and very carefully; for I look upon it, that he who does not mind his belly will hardly mind any thing else." He now appeared to me Jean Bud, philosophe, and he was for the moment, not only serious, but vehement. Yet I have heard him, upon other occasions, talk with great contempt of people who were anxious to gratify their palates; and the 206th number of his Rambler is a masterly essay against gourmandy. His practice, indeed, I must acknowledge, may be considered as casting the balance of his different opinions upon this subject; for I never knew any man who relished good eating more than he did. When at table, he was totally absorbed in the business of the moment: his looks seemed riveted to his plate; nor would he, unless when in very high company, say one word, or even pay the least attention to what was said by others, till he had satisfied his appetite; which was so fierce, and indulged with such intenseness, that, while in the act of eating, the veins of his forehead swelled, and generally a strong perspiration was visible. To those whose sensations were delicate, this could not but be disgusting; and it was doubtless not very suitable to the character of a philosopher, who should be distinguished by self-command. But it must be owned, that Johnson, though he could be rigidly abstemious, was not a temperate man either in eating or drinking. He could refrain, but he could not use moderately. He told me, that he had fasted two days without inconvenience, and that he had never been hungry but once. They who beheld with wonder how much he ate upon all occasions, when his dinner was to his taste, could not easily conceive what he must have meant by hunger; and not only was he remarkable for the extraordinary quantity which he ate, but he was, or affected to be, a man of very nice discernment in the science of cookery. He used to descant critically on the dishes which had been at table where he had dined or supped, and to recollect very minutely what he had liked. I remember when he was in Scotland, his praising Gordon's palates (a dish of palates at the Honourable Alexander Gordon's) with a warmth of expression which might have done honour to more important subjects. "As for Maclaurin's imitation of a made dish, it was a wretched attempt." He about the same time was so much displeased with the performances of a

1 Dr. Thomas Blacklock was born in 1721; he totally lost his sight by the small-pox at the age of six years, but was, nevertheless, a descriptive poet. He died in 1751. "We may conclude," says his biographer, "with Denina, in his 'Discorso della Letteratura,' that Blacklock will appear to posterity a fable, as to us he is a prodigy. It will be thought a fiction, that a man blind from his infancy, besides having made himself master of various foreign languages, should be a great poet in his own, and without having hardly seen the light, should be so remarkably happy in description." Johnson, no doubt, gives the true solution of Blacklock's power, which was memory and not mind. (LIVES OF THE WRITERS.)

2 By a law of Holland, the criminal's confession is essential to a capital punishment; no other evidence being sufficient, and if he insists on his innocence, he is tortured till he pronounces the words of confession." — Kames's History of Man, b. III. sec. 12. — CROKER, 1835.

3 If hypercritically examined, refrain is not, perhaps, the word which exactly gives Mr. Boswell's meaning, which was, that Johnson could abstain, but found it hard to refrain. Hanish More pressed him one day, in 1782, at Bishop Porter's table, to take a little wine; he replied, "I cannot drink a little, child; therefore I never touch it. Abstinence is as easy to the temperate as to the temperous would be difficult." Life, i. 251. — CROKER.

4 On returning to Edinburgh, after the tour to the Hebrides, he dined one day at Mr. Maclaurin's, and supped at the Honourable Alexander Gordon's; the former, son of the celebrated mathematician, became in 1757, a Lord of Session, by the title of Lord Dreghorn; the latter was the third of the second Earl of Aberdeen. In 1788, he was made a Lord of Session, and took the title of Lord Rockville. —

1 Edward Allen was a very excellent printer in Bolt Court. His office united to Johnson's dwelling. He died in 1780.—Nichols.

2 Johnson's notions about eating, says Mrs. Piozzi, however, were nothing less than delicate: a leg of pork boiled till it dropped from the bone, a real pie with plums and sugar, or the outside cut of a salt buttire of beef, were his favourite dainties: with regard to drink, his bisking was for the strongest, as it was not the flavour, but the spirit, that affected him. He was so delicate that for the first year after I first knew him, he used to pour cariapple into his port wine. For the last twelve years, however, he left off all fermented liquors. To make himself some amends, indeed, he took his chocolate liberally, pouring in large quantities of cream, or even melted butter, and was so fond of fruit, that though he would eat seven or eight large peaches of a morning before breakfast began, and treated them with proportionate attention after dinner, yet I have heard him protest, that he never had quite as much as he wished of wall-fruit, except once in his life, and that was when we were all together at Omsbursley, the seat of my Lord Sandy. Amidst; and yet, when his Irish friend Grierston, [see post, sub 1770.] hearing him enumerate the qualities necessary to the formation of a poet, began a comical parody upon his ornamented language in praise of a cook, concluding with this observation, that he who dressed a good dinner was a more excellent and a more useful member of society than a poet, wrote a word to this opinion," said Mr. Johnson, in reply, "all the dogs in the town will join you." — He loved his dinner exceedingly, and has often said in my hearing, perhaps for my edification, "that wherever the dinner is lit got up, there is poverty, or there is avarice, or there is stupidity; in short, the whole thing is somehow grossly wrong: for," continued he, "a man seldom thinks with more carelessness of anything than he does of his dinner; and if he cannot get that well dressed, he should be suspected of inaccuracy in other things." One day, when he was speaking upon the subject, I asked him, if he ever bullied his wife about his dinner? "So often," replied he, "that at last she called to me, when about to say grace, and said, 'Nay, hold, Mr. Johnson, and do not make a face of thanking God for a dinner which, in a few minutes, you will pronounce not eatable.'" —

3 This advice comes directly from the writer who makes a young lady talk of "the cosmetic discipline," "a regular illustration with bean-flower water, and the use of a pomadole to discuss pimples and clear discoloration." (Rambler, No. 190.;) while a young gentleman tells us of "the faccid sides of a foot-ball having swelled out into stiffness and extension." (No. 172.) It is equally amusing to hear Mr. Boswell, after his various defences of Johnson's grandiloquence, attacking the little involutions of French conversation—"a training at a gun, after having swallowed a camel." — CROKER.

4 Dr. Johnson seems to have been imperfectly acquainted with Berkeley's doctrine; as his experiment only proves that we have the sensation of solidity, which Berkeley did not deny. He admitted that we had sensations or ideas that are usually called sensible qualities, one of which is solidity; he only denied the existence of matter, i.e., an inert senseless substance, in which they are supposed to subsist. Johnson's exemplification conveys with the vulgar notion, that solidity is matter. — KIRKE.

nobleman's French cook, that he exclaimed with vehemence, "I'd throw such a rascal into the river," and he then proceeded to alarm a lady at whose house he was to sup, by the following manifesto of his skill: "I, Madam, who live at a variety of good tables, am a much better judge of cookery than any person who has a very tolerable cook, but lives much at home; for his palate is gradually adapted to the taste of his cook; whereas, Madam, in trying by a wider range, I can more exquisitely judge." When invited to dine, even with an intimate friend, he was not pleased if something better than a plain dinner was not prepared for him. I have heard him say on such an occasion, "This was a good dinner enough, to be sure; but it was not a dinner to ask a man to." On the other hand, he was wont to express, with great glee, his satisfaction when he had been entertained quite to his mind. One day when he had dined with his neighbour and landlord in Bolt Court, Mr. Allen, the printer, whose old housekeeper had studied his taste in every thing, he pronounced this eulogize: "Sir, we could not have had a better dinner, had there been a Sympol of Cooks." 2

While we were left by ourselves, after the Dutchman had gone to bed, Dr. Johnson talked of that studied behaviour which many have recommended and practised. He disapproved of it; and said, "I never considered whether I should be a grave man, or a merry man, but just let inclination, for the time, have its course.

He flattered me with some hopes that he would, in the course of the following summer, come over to Holland, and accompany me in a tour through the Netherlands.

I teased him with fanciful apprehensions of unhappiness. A moth having fluttered round the candle, and burnt itself, he laid hold of this little incident to admonish me; saying, with a sly look, and in a solemn but a quiet tone, "That creature was its own tormentor, and I believe its name was Boswell."

Next day we got to Harwich to dinner; and my passage in the packet-boat to Helvoetsluys being secured, and my baggage put on board, we dined at our inn by ourselves. I happened to say, it would be terrible if he should not find a speedy opportunity of returning to London, and be confined in so dull a place. Johnson, "Don't, Sir, accustom yourself to use big words for little matters. It would not be terrible, though I were to be detained some time here." The practice of using words of disproportionate magnitude is, no doubt, too frequent every where; but, I think, most remarkable among the French, of which, all who have travelled in France must have been struck with innumerable instances.

We went and looked at the church, and having gone into it and walked up to the altar, Johnson, whose piety was constant and fervent, sent me to my knees, saying, "Now that you are going to have your native country, recommend yourself to the protection of your Creator and Redeemer."

After we came out of the church, we stood talking some time together of Bishop Berkeley's imposing sophistry to prove the non-existence of matter, and that every thing in the universe is merely ideal. I observed, that though we are satisfied his doctrine is not true, it is impossible to refute it. I never shall forget the anacrit which with which Johnson answered, striking his foot with mighty force against a large stone, till he rebounded from it, "I refute it thus." 4 This was a stout exemplification of the first truths of Père Bouffier, or the original principles of Reid and of Beattie; without admitting which, we can no more argue in metaphysics, than we can argue in mathematics without axioms. To me it is not conceivable how Berkeley can be answered by pure reasoning; but I know that the nice and difficult task was to have been undertaken by one of the most luminous minds of the present age, had not politics "turned him from calm philosophy aside." What an admirable display of subtility, united with brilliance, might his contending with Berkeley have afforded us! How must we, when we reflect on the loss of such an intellectual feast, regret that he should be characterized as the man,—

"Who, born for the universe, narrow'd his mind,
And to party gave up what was meant for man-kind?"

My reverend friend walked down with me to the beach, where we embraced and parted with tenderness, and engaged to correspond by letters. I said, "I hope, Sir, you will not forget me in my absence." JOHNSON, "Nay, Sir, it is more likely you should forget me, than that I should forget you." As the vessel put out to sea, I kept my eyes upon him for a considerable time, while he remained rolling his majestic frame in his usual manner; and at last I perceived him walk back into the town, and he disappeared.

Dear Sir,—I should have answered your last letter sooner if I could have given you any valuable or useful directions; but I know not any way by which the composition of Latin verses can be much facilitated. Of the grammatical part, which comprises the knowledge of the measure of the foot, and quantity of the syllables, your grammar will teach you all that you can be taught, and even of that you can hardly know any thing by rule but the measure of the foot. The quantity of syllables, even of those for which rules are given, is commonly learned by practice and retained by observation. For the poetical part, which comprises variety of expression, propriety of terms, dexterity in selecting commodious words, and readiness in changing their order, it will all be produced by frequent essays and resolute perseverance. The less help you have the sooner you will be able to go forward without help.

"I suppose you are now ready for another author. I would not have you dwell longer upon one book than till your familiarity with its style makes it easy to you. Every new book will for a time be difficult. Make it a rule to write something in Latin every day; and let me know what you are now doing, and what your scheme is to do next. Be pleased to give my compliments to Mr. Bright, Mr. Stevenson, and Miss Page. I am, dear Sir, your affectionate servant,

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"Your letter has scarcely come time enough to make an answer possible. I wish we could talk over the affair, I cannot go now. I must finish my book. I do not know Mr. Collier. I have not money beforehand sufficient. How long have you known Collier, that you should have put yourself into his hands? I once told you that ladies were timorous, and yet not cautious."

"If I might tell my thoughts to one with whom they never had any weight, I should think it best to go through France. The expense is not great; I do not much like obligation, nor think the grossness of a ship very suitable to a lady. Do not go till I see you. I will see you as soon as I can. I am, my dearest, most sincerely yours,

CHAPTER XVIII.

Utrecht seeming at first very dull to me, after the animated scenes of London, my spirits were grievously affected; and I wrote to Johnson a plaintive and desponding letter, to which he paid no regard. Afterwards, when I had acquired a firmer tone of mind, I wrote him a second letter, expressing much anxiety to hear from him. At length I received the following epistle, which was of important service to me, and I trust, will be so to many others.

[1 Mr. Burke — Croker.
2 In the latter years of his life, Mr. Burke reversed the conduct which Goldsmith so elegantly reprehended, and gave up party for what he conceived to be the good of mankind. — Croker.
3 Captain, afterwards Sir George Collier, was about to sail to the Mediterranean, and offered Miss Reynolds a passage, and she appears to have wished that Johnson might be of the party. Johnson was not aware that Captain Collier's lady was also going. Sir Joshua had gone to the Mediterranean in a similar way with Captain Keppel. — Croker.]
A. M. M. BOSWELL.

A la Cour de l'Empereur, Utrecht.

Dear Sir,—You are not to think yourself forgotten, or criminally neglected, that you have had yet no letter from me. I love to see my friends, to hear from them, to talk to them, and to talk of them; but it is not without a considerable effort of resolution that I prevail upon myself to write. I would not, however, gratify my own indolence by the omission of any important duty, or any office of real kindness.

"To tell you that I am or am not well, that I have or have not been in the country, that I drank your health in the room in which we last sat together, and that your acquaintance continue to speak of you wish their former kindness, topics with which those letters are commonly filled which are written only for the sake of writing. I seldom shall think worth communicating; but if I can have it in my power to calm any harassing disquiet, to excite any virtuous desire, to rectify any important opinion, or fortify any generous resolution, you need not doubt but I shall at least wish to prefer the pleasure of gratifying a friend much less esteemed than yourself, before the gloomy calm of idle vacancy. Whether I shall easily arrive at an exact punctuality of correspondence, I cannot tell. I shall, at present, expect that you will receive this in return for two which I have had from you. The first, indeed, gave me an account so hopeless of the state of your mind, that it hardly admitted or deserved an answer; by the second I was much better pleased; and the pleasure will still be increased by such a narrative of the progress of your studies, as may evince the continuance of an equal and rational application of your mind to some useful inquiry.

"You will, perhaps, wish to ask, what study I would recommend. I shall not speak of theology, because it ought not to be considered as a question whether you shall endeavour to know the will of God.

"I shall, therefore, consider only such studies as we are at liberty to pursue or to neglect; and of these I know not how you will make a better choice, than by studying the civil law as your father advises, and the ancient languages as you had determined for yourself: at least resolve, while you remain in any settled residence, to spend a certain number of hours every day amongst your books. The dissipation of thought of which you complain, is nothing more than the vacillation of a mind suspended between different motives, and changing its direction as any motive gains or loses strength. If you can but kindle in your mind any strong desire, if you can but keep predominant any wish for some particular excellence or attainment, the gusts of imagination will break away, without any effect upon your conduct, and commonly without any traces left upon the memory.

"There lurks, perhaps, in every human heart a desire of distinction, which inclines every man first to hope, and then to believe, that nature has given him something peculiar to himself. This vanity makes one mind nurse avarice, and another actuate desires, till they rise by art much above their original state of power; and, as affection in time improves to habit, they at last tyrannise over him who at first encouraged them only for show. Every desire is a viper in the bosom, who, while he was chill, was harmless; but when warmth gave him strength, exerted it in poison. You know a gentleman, who, when first he set his foot in the gay world, as he prepared himself to whirl in the vortex of pleasure, imagined a total indifference and universal negligence to be the most agreeable concomitants of youth, and the strongest indication of an airy temper and a quick apprehension. Vacant to every object, and sensible of every impulse, he thought that all appearance of diligence would deduct something from the reputation of genius; and hoped that he should appear to attain, amidst all the ease of carelessness, and all the tumult of diversion, that knowledge and those accomplishments which mortals of the common fabric obtain only by mute abstraction and solitary drudgery. He tried this scheme of life awhile, was made weary of it by his sense and his virtue; he then wished to return to his studies; and finding long habits of idleness and pleasure harder to be cured than he expected, still willing to retain his claim to some extraordinary prerogatives, resolved the common consequences of irregularity into an unalterable decree of destiny, and concluded that Nature had originally formed him incapable of rational employment.

"Let all such fancies, illusive and destructive, be banished henceforward from your thoughts for ever. Resolve, and keep your resolution: choose, and pursue your choice. If you spend this day in study, you will find yourself still more able to study to-morrow; not that you are to expect that you shall at once obtain a complete victory. Depravity is not very easily overcome. Resolution will sometimes relax, and diligence will sometimes be interrupted; but let no accidental surprise or deviation, whether short or long, dispose you to despondence. Consider these failings as incident to all mankind. Begin again where you left off, and endeavour to avoid the seductions that prevailed over you before.

"This, my dear Boswell, is advice which, perhaps, has been often given you, and given you without effect. But this advice, if you will not take from others, you must take from your own reflections, if you purpose to do the duties of the station to which the bounty of Providence has called you.

"Let me have a long letter from you as soon as you can. I hope you continue your journal, and enrich it with many observations upon the country in which you reside. It will be a favour if you can get me any books in the Frisick language; and can inquire how the poor are maintained in the Seven Provinces. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate servant, Sam. Johnson."

I am sorry to observe, that neither in my own minutes, nor in my letters to Johnson which have been preserved by him, can I find any information how the poor are maintained.

in the Seven Provinces. But I shall extract from one of my letters what I learnt concerning the other subject of his curiosity.

"I have made all possible inquiry with respect to the Frisick language, and find that it has been less cultivated than any other of the northern dialects; a certain proof of which is their deficiency of books. Of the old Frisick there are no remains, except some ancient laws preserved by Schottanus in his 'Beschrüninge van die Heerlijkheid van Friesland,' and his 'Historia Frisica.' I have not yet been able to find these books. Professor Trotz, who formerly was of the University of Vranyak in Friesland, and is at present preparing an edition of all the Frisick laws, gave me this information. Of the modern Frisick, or what is spoken by the boors of this day, I have procured a specimen. It is 'Gisbert Japiz's Rymerie,' which is the only book that they have. It is amazing that they have no translation of the Bible, no treatises of devotion, nor even any of the ballads and story-books which are so agreeable to country people. You shall have the privilege of the first copy of this opportunity. I doubt not to pick up Schottanus, Mynheer Trotz has promised him his assistance."

Early in 1764, Johnson paid a visit to the Langton family, at their seat of Langton in Lincolnshire, where he passed some time much to his satisfaction. His friend Bennet Langton, it will not be doubted, did every thing in his power to make the place agreeable to so illustrious a guest; and the elder Mr. Langton and his lady, being fully capable of understanding his value, were not wanting in attention. He, however, told me, that old Mr. Langton, though a man of considerable learning, had so little allowance to make for his occasional "laxity of talk," that because in the course of discussion he sometimes mentioned what might be said in favour of the peculiar tenets of the Roman church, he went to his grave believing him to be of that communion.1

Johnson, during his stay at Langton, had the advantage of a good library, and saw several gentlemen of the neighbourhood. I have obtained from Mr. Langton the following particulars of this period.

He was now fully convinced that he could not have been satisfied with a country living; for, talking of a respectable clergyman in Lincolnshire, he observed, "This man, Sir, fills up the duties of his life well. I approve of him, but could not imitate him." To a lady who endeavoured to vindicate herself from blame for neglecting social attention to worthy neighbours, by saying "I would go to them if it would do them any good;" he said, "What good, Madam, do you expect to have in your power to do them? It is showing them respect, and that is doing them good."

So socially accommodating was he, that once, when Mr. Langton and he were driving together in a coach, and Mr. Langton complained of being sick, he insisted that they should go out, and sit on the back of it in the open air, which they did. And being sensible how strange the appearance must be, observed, that a countryman whom they saw in a field would probably be thinking, "If these two madmen should come down, what would become of me?"

[JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.]

"My dear,—I was in hopes that you would have written to me before this time, to tell me that your house was finished, and that you were happy in it. I am sure I wish you happy. By the carrier of this week you will receive a box, in which I have put some books, most of which were your dear mamma's, and a diamond ring, which I hope you will wear as my new year's gift. If you receive it with as much kindness as I send it, you will not slight it; you will be very fond of it."

"Pray give my service to Kitty, who, I hope, keeps pretty well. I know not now when I shall come down; I believe it will not be very soon. But I shall be glad to hear of you from time to time."

"I wish you, my dearest, many happy years; take what care you can of your health. I am, my dear, your affectionate humble servant,"

Soon after his return to London, which was in February, was founded that Club which existed long without a name, but at Mr. Garrick's funeral became distinguished by the title of The Literary Club. Sir Joshua Reynolds had the merit of being the first proposer of it; to which Johnson acceded, and the original members were, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, Mr. Edmund Burke, Dr. Nugent, Mr. Beauclerk, Mr. Langton, Dr. Goldsmith, Mr. Chamier, and Sir John Hawkins. They met at the Turk's Head, in Gerrard Street, Soho, one evening in every week, at seven, and generally continued their conversation till a pretty late hour. This club has been gradually increased to its present

5 It was Johnson's original intention, that the number of this club should not exceed nine; but Mr. Dyer, a member of that in Ivy Lane before spoken of, and who for some years had been abroad, made his appearance among them, and was cordially received. The hours which Johnson spent in this society seemed to be the happiest of his life. He would often applaud his own sagacity in the selection of it, and was constant at its meetings as never to absent himself. It is true, he came late, but then he stayed late, for, as has been already said of him, he little regarded hours. Our evening toast was the motto of Falstaff Paulo, "Esto perpetua." A consulted me upon it: and when I could find no objection to receiving him, exclaimed, "He will disturb us by his bohionery;"—and afterwards so managed matters, that he was never formally proposed, and, by consequence, never admitted."*

In justice both to Mr. Garrick and Dr. Johnson, I think it necessary to rectify this mis-statement. The truth is, that not very long after the institution of our club, Sir Joshua Reynolds was speaking of it to Garrick. "I like it much," said he; "I think I shall be of you." When Sir Joshua mentioned this to Dr. Johnson, he was much displeased with the actor's conceit. "He'll be of us," said Johnson, "how does he know we will permit him? the first duke in England has no right to hold such language." However, when Garrick was regularly proposed some time afterwards, Johnson, though he had taken a momentary offence at his arrogance, warmly and kindly supported him, and he was accordingly elected [March, 1773], was a most agreeable member, and continued to attend our meetings to the time of his death.

Mrs. Piozzi* has also given a similar mis-representation of Johnson's treatment of Garrick in this particular, as if he had used these contemptuous expressions: "If Garrick does apply, I'll blackball him. —Surely, one ought to sit in a society like ours, "Unellow'd by a gamester, pimp, or player."* PEP.

I am happy to be enabled by such unquestionable authority as that of Sir Joshua Reynolds 4, as well as from my own knowledge, to vindicate at once the heart of Johnson and the social merit of Garrick.

In this year, except what he may have done in revising Shakspeare, we do not find that he laboured much in literature. He wrote a review of Grainger's "Sugar Cane," a poem, in the London Chronicle. He told me that Dr. Percy wrote the greatest part of this review; but, I imagine, he did not recollect it distinctly, for it appears to be mostly, if not altogether, his own. He also wrote, in the 4 It does not appear how Sir Joshua Reynolds's authority can be made available in this case. The expression is stated to have been used in Mr. Thrale's; and the apt quotation from Pope, the saucy phrase which Boswell admits that Garrick used, and the fact, that he was for near ten years excluded from the Club, seem to accord Mrs. Piozzi's anecdoté. — CROKER.

Critical Review, an account of Goldsmith's excellent poem, "The Traveller."

The case and independence to which he had at last attained by royal munificence, increased his natural indolence. In his "Meditations," [p. 58.] he thus accuses himself:

"Good Friday, April 20, 1764. — I have made no reformation; I have lived totally useless, more sensual in thought, and more addicted to wine and meat."

And next morning he thus feelingly complains:

"My indolence, since my last reception of the sacrament, has sunk into grosser sluggishness, and my dissipation spread into wilder negligence. My thoughts have been clouded with sensuality; and, except that from the beginning of this year I have, in some measure, forborne excess of strong drink, my appetites have predominated over my reason. A kind of strange oblivion has overspread me, so that I know not what has become of the last year; and perceive that incidents and intelligence pass over me without leaving any impression."

He then solemnly says, "This is not the life to which heaven is promised; and he earnestly resolves an amendment."

["Easter-day, April 22, 1764. Having, before I went to bed, composed the foregoing meditation, and the following prayer, I tried to compose myself, but slept unequitably. I rose, took tea, and prayed for resolution and perseverance. Thought on Tetty, dear poor Tetty, with my eyes full. I went to church; came in at the first of the Psalms, and endeavoured to attend the service, which I went through without perturbation. After sermon, I recommended Tetty in a prayer by herself; and my father, mother, brother, and Bathurst, in another. I did it only once, so far as it might be lawful for me."

"I then prayed for resolution and perseverance to amend my life. I received soon: the communicants were many. At the altar, it occurred to me that I ought to form some resolutions. I resolved, in the presence of God, but without a vow, to repel sinful thoughts, to study eight hours daily, and, I think, to go to church every Sunday, and read the Scriptures. I gave a shilling; and seeing a poor girl at the sacrament in a bedgown, gave her privately a crown. Though I saw Hart's Hymns in her hand. I prayed earnestly for amendment, and repeated my prayer at home. Dined with Miss Williams; went to prayers at church; went to —, spent the evening not pleasantly. Avoided wine, and tempered a very few glasses with sherbet. Came home and prayed. I saw at the sacrament a man meanly dressed, whom I have always seen there at Easter."

It was his custom to observe certain days with a pious abstraction: viz. New-year's-day, the day of his wife's death, Good Friday, Easter-day, and his own birth-day. He this year [on his birth-day] says,

"I have now spent fifty-five years in resolving: having, from the earliest time almost that I can remember, been forming schemes of a better life. I have done nothing. The need of doing, therefore, is pressing, since the time of doing is short. O God, grant me to resolve aright, and to keep my resolutions, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

Such a tenderness of conscience, such a fervent desire of improvement, will rarely be found. It is, surely, not decent in those who are hardened in indifference to spiritual improvement, to treat this pious anxiety of Johnson with contempt.

About this time he was afflicted with a very severe return of the hypochondriac disorder, which was ever lurking about him. He was so ill, as, notwithstanding his remarkable love of company, to be entirely averse to society, the most fatal symptom of that malady. Dr. Adams told me, that, as an old friend, he was admitted to visit him, and that he found him in a deplorable state, sighing, groaning, talking to himself, and restlessly walking from room to room. He then used this emphatical expression of the misery which he felt: "I would consent to have a limb amputated to recover my spirits."

Talking to himself was, indeed, one of his singularities ever since I knew him. I was certain that he was frequently uttering pious ejaculations; for fragments of the Lord's Prayer have been distinctly overheard. His friend Mr. Thomas Davies, of whom Churchill says,

"That Davies hath a very pretty wife:"
when Dr. Johnson muttered "lead us not into temptation" — used with waggish and gallant humour to whisper Mrs. Davies, "You, my dear, are the cause of this."

He had another particularity, of which none of his friends ever ventured to ask an explanation. It appeared to me some superstitious habit, which he had contracted early, and from which he had never called upon his reason to disentangle him. This was his case, for I was once, perhaps unperceived by him, writing at a table, so near the place of his retreat, that I heard him repeating some lines in an ode of Horace, over and over, again, as if by iteration to exercise the organs of speech, and fix the ode in his memory: —

"Audiet elioris acuisse ferrum Quo graves Persae melius perirent, Audiet pugnas . . . . . .

"Our sons shall hear, shall hear to latest times,
Of Roman arms with civil gore imbued,
Which better had the Persian foe subdued." — Francis.

It was during the American war. — Burney.
anxious care to go out or in at a door or passage, by a certain number of steps from a certain point, or at least so as that either his right or his left foot (I am not certain which) should constantly make the first actual movement when he came close to the door or passage. Thus I conjecture: for I have, upon innumerable occasions, observed him suddenly stop, and then seem to count his steps with a deep earnestness; and when he had neglected or gone wrong in this sort of magical movement, I have seen him go back again, put himself in a proper posture to begin the ceremony, and, having gone through it, break from his abstraction, walk briskly on, and join his companion. A strange instance of something of this nature, even when on horseback, happened when he was in the Isle of Skye [12th October, 1773]. Sir Joshua Reynolds has observed him to go a good way about, rather than cross a particular alley in Leicester Fields; but this Sir Joshua imputed to his having had some disagreeable recollection associated with it.1

That the most minute singularities which belonged to him, and made very observable parts of his appearance and manner, may not be omitted, it is requisite to mention, that, while talking, or even musing as he sat in his chair, he commonly held his head to one side towards his right shoulder, and shook it in a tremulous manner, moving his body backwards and forwards, and rubbing his left knee in the same direction, with the palm of his hand. In the intervals of articulating he made various sounds with his mouth, sometimes as if ruminating, or what is called chewing the cud, sometimes giving a half whistle, sometimes making his tongue play backwards from the roof of his mouth, as if clucking like a hen, and sometimes protruding it against his upper gums in front, as if pronouncing quickly, under his breath, too, too, too: all this accompanied sometimes with a thoughtful look, but more frequently with a smile. Generally, when he had concluded a period, in the course of a dispute, by which time he was a good deal exhausted by violence and vociferation, he used to blow out his breath like a whale. This,

1 See, ante, p. 42, his conduct at Mr. Banke's, which seems something of the same kind. Dr. Fisher, Master of the Charter House, told me, that in walking on the quadrangle of University College, he used not step on the juncture of the stones, but carefully on the centre: but this is a trick which many persons have when staggering on any kind of tessellated. Dr. Fisher adds, that he would sometimes take a phial to the college pump, and alternately fill and empty it, without any object that Dr. Fisher could discern. "Mr. Sheridan," says Mr. Whyte, "at one time lived in Bedford Street, opposite Henrietta Street, which ranges with the south side of Covent Garden, so that the prospect lies open the whole way, of instruction, were standing together at the drawing-room window, expecting Johnson, who was to dine there. Mr. Sheridan asked me could I see the length of the Garden? 'No, Sir.' [Mr. Whyte was short-sighted.] 'Take out your opera-glass, Johnson is coming; you may know him by his guilt.' I perceived him at a good distance, working along with a peculiar solemnity of deportment, and an awkward sort of measured step. At that time the broad flagging at each side the streets was not universally adopted, and stone posts were in fashion, to prevent the annoyance of carriages. Upon every post, as he passed along, I could observe, he deliberately laid his hand, but missing one of them when he had got at some distance, he seemed suddenly to recollect himself, and immediately turning back, carefully performed the ceremony, or supposed him to have done so, and resumed his former course, not omitting one till he gained the crossing. This, Mr. Sheridan assured me, however odd it might appear, was his constant practice; but why or wherefore he could not inform me." - Whyte, Miscellaneous Novas, p. 49. Mr. Samuel Whyte, the writer of this piece, was a celebrated schoolmaster in Dublin, related, I believe, and much attached to the Sheridan family. Richard Brinsley Sheridan and his elder brother Charles, were placed very early under his tuition, as was, at an interval of above thirty years, my friend Thomas Moore, who, in his Life of Sheridan, pays an affectionate tribute to his early education. - Croker.

I suppose, was a relief to his lungs; and seemed in him to be a contemptuous mode of expression, as if he had made the arguments of his opponent fly like chaff before the wind.

I am fully aware how very obvious an occasion I here give for the sneering jocularity of such as have no relish of an exact likeness; which to render complete, he who draws it must not disdain the slightest strokes. But if wittlings should be inclined to attack this account, let them have the candour to quote what I have offered in my defence.

He was for some time in the summer at Easton Maudit, Northamptonshire, on a visit to the Rev. Dr. Percy, now Bishop of Dromore. Whatever dissatisfaction he felt at what he considered as a slow progress in intellectual improvement, we find that his heart was tender, and his affections warm, as appears from the following very kind letter:—

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS,

In Leicester Fields.

"Dear Sir,—I did not hear of your sickness till I heard likewise of your recovery, and therefore escape that part of your pain, which every man must feel, to whom you are known as you are known to me.

"Having had no particular account of your disorder, I know not in what state it has left you. If the amusement of my company can exhilarate the languor of a slow recovery, I will not delay a day to come to you; for I know not how I can so effectively promote my own pleasure as by pleasing you, or my own interest as by preserving you, in whom, if I should lose you, I should lose almost the only man whom I call a friend.

"Pray, let me hear of you from yourself, or from dear Miss Reynolds. Make my compliments to Mr. Mudge. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate and most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

"At the Rev. Mr. Percy's, at Easton Maudit, Northamptonshire, (by Castle Ashby,) Aug. 19, 1764."

Early in the year 1765 he paid a short visit to the University of Cambridge, with his friend Mr. Beauclerk. There is a lively picturesque account of his behaviour on this visit.

1066 BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. 1765.
in the Gentleman's Magazine for March, 1785, being an extract of a letter from the late Dr. John Sharp.1

"Cambridge, March 1. 1765.—As to John-son, you will be surprised to hear that I have had him in the chair in which I am now writing. He has ascended my aërial citadel. He came down on a Saturday evening, with a Mr. Beauclerk, who has a friend at Trinity [Mr. Lister]. Caliban, you may be sure, was not roused from his lair before next day noon, and his breakfast probably kept him till night. I saw nothing of him, nor was he heard of by any one, till Monday afternoon, when I was sent for home to two gentlemen unknown. In conversation I made a strange faux pas about Burnaby Greene's poem2, in which Johnson is drawn at full length. He drank his large potation of tea with me, interrupted by many an indignant contradiction, and many a noble sentiment. He had on a better wig than usual, but one whose curls were not, like Sir Cloudesley's, 'formed for eternal bucker.' Our conversation was chiefly on books, you may be sure. He was much pleased with a small Milton of nine, published in the author's lifetime, and with the Greek epigram on his own effigy, of its being the picture, not of him, but of a bad painter. There are many manuscript stanzas, for aught I know, in Milton's own handwriting, and several interlined hints and fragments. We were puzzled about one of the sonnets, which we thought was not to be found in Newton's edition, and differed from all the printed ones. But Johnson cried, 'No, no!' repeated the whole sonnet instantly, memoria, and showed it us in Newton's book. After which he learnedly harangued on sonnet-writing, and its different numbers. He tells me he will come hither again quickly, and is promised 'an habitation in Emanuel College' [with Dr. Farmer]. He went back to town next morning; but as it began to be known that he was in the university, several persons got into his company the last evening at Trinity, where, about twelve, he began to be very great, stripped poor Mrs. Macaulay to the very skin, then gave her for his toast, and drank her in two barmers.3

The strictness of his self-examination, and scrupulous Christian humility, appear in his pious meditation on Easter-day this year.

“I purpose again to partake of the blessed sacra-ment; yet when I consider how vainly I have hitherto resolved, at this annual commemoration of my Saviour's death, to regulate my life by his laws, I am almost afraid to renew my resolutions.” [p. 61.]

The concluding words are very remarkable, and show that he laboured under a severe depression of spirits.

"Since the last Easter I have reformed no evil habit; my time has been unprofitably spent, and seems as a dream that has left nothing behind. My memory grows confused, and I know not how the days pass over me. Good Lord, deliver me!"

[He proceeds:—]

"I purpose to rise at eight, because, though I shall not yet rise early, it will be much earlier than I now rise, for I often lie till two, and will gain me much time, and tend to a conquest over idleness, and give time for other duties. I hope to rise yet earlier."

"I invited home with me the man whose pious behaviour I had for several years observed on this day, and found him a kind of Methodist, full of texts, but ill-instructed. I talked to him with temper, and offered him twice wine, which he refused. I suffered him to go without the dinner which I had purposed to give him. I thought this day that there was something irregular and particular in his look and gesture; but having intended to invite him to acquaintance, and having a fit opportunity by finding him near my own seat after I had missed him, I did what I at first designed, and am sorry to have been so much disappointed. Let me not be prejudiced hereafter against the appearance of piety in mean persons, who, with indeterminate notions, and perverse or inelegant conversation, perhaps are doing all they can.”]

"May 18. 1765.

DEAR SIR,—I know that great regard will be had to your opinion of an Edition of Shakspeare. I desire, therefore, to secure an honest prejudice in my favour by securing your suffrage, and that this prejudice may really be honest, I wish you would name such plays as you would see, and they shall be sent you by, Sir, your most humble servant,

—UPCOTT MSS.

SAM. JOHNSON.”

GARRICK TO JOHNSON.

"May 31. 1765.

DEAR SIR,—My brother greatly astonished me this morning, by asking me if I was a subscriber to your Shakspeare? I told him, yes, that I was one of the first, and as soon as I heard of your intention; and that I gave you, at the same time, some other names, among which were the Duke of Devonshire, Mr. Bouchedon, &c. I cannot immediately have recourse to my memorandum, though I remember to have seen it just before I left England: I hope that you will recollect it, and not think me capable of neglecting to make you so trifling a compliment, which was doubtfully due from me, not only on account of the respect I have always had for your abilities, but from the sincere regard I shall ever pay to your friendship. I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

—Davy GARRICK.”

"May 25. 1765.

"Dear Sir,—That I have answered neither of your letters you must not impute to any declension of good will, but merely to the want of something to say. I suppose you pursue your studies diligently, and diligence will seldom fail of success. Do not tire yourself so much with Greek one day as to be afraid of looking on it the next; but give it a certain portion of time, suppose four hours, and pass the rest of the day in Latin or English. I would have you learn French, and take in a literary journal once a month, which will accustom you to various subjects, and inform you what learning is going forward in the world. Do not omit to mingle some lighter books with those of more importance; that which is read remissa animo is often of great use, and takes great hold of the remembrance. However, take what course you will, if you be diligent you will be a scholar. I am, dear Sir, yours affectionately,
Sam. Johnson."

—Rose MSS.

No man was more gratefully sensible of any kindness done to him than Johnson. There is a little circumstance in his diary this year, which shows him in a very amiable light.

"July 2. I paid Mr. Simpson ten guineas, which he had formerly lent me in my necessity, and for which Tetty expressed her gratitude."

"July 8. I lent Mr. Simpson ten guineas more."

Here he had a pleasing opportunity of doing the same kindness to an old friend, which he had formerly received from him. Indeed his liberality as to money was very remarkable. The next article in his diary is, "July 16th, I received seventy-five pounds." Lent Mr. Davies twenty-five."

Trinity College, Dublin, at this time surprised Johnson with a spontaneous compliment of the highest academical honours, by creating him Doctor of Laws. The diploma, which is in my possession, is as follows:—

"OMNISUS AD quos presentes literæ pervenerunt, subtest. Nos Præpositus et Socii Seniores Collegii Sacrosanctæ et Individuæ Trinitatis Regina Elizabetæ iuxta Dublin, testanun, Samuell Johnson, Armiger, ob egressum scriptorum elegantiam et utilitatem, gratiam concessam suisse pro gradu Doctoratis in utroque iure, octavo die Julii, Anno Domini millesimo septingentesimo sexagesimo-quinto."

2 Dr. Thomas Leland, the translator of Demosthenes, and author of the History of Ireland, was born at Dublin, in 1722, and died in 1755. — Wright.

3 The same who has contributed some notes to this work, and the elder brother of our present literary friend Dr. John Keenor, sometime Provost of Dublin College, and afterwards Bishop of Ossory. Both the brothers were amiable men, and accomplished scholars. — Croker.

4 Hawkins and Murphy seem to think that this honour followed the publication of Shakspeare, but that is a mistake. The degree was in July at the annual Commencement; the publication of Shakespeare in October. Johnson's acknowledgment was postponed to the end of the academic vacation. — Croker.

5 Hawkins and Murphy thought that Johnson's attachment to Oxford prevented him from assuming the title which it conferred. The fact is true; but it is still more remarkable that he never used the title of Doctor before his name, even after his Oxford degree, (post, 20th Mar. 1757.) Hawkins says that he disliked to be called Doctor, as reminding him that he had been a schoolmaster. This seems improbable; my opinion is, that he did not use his Irish title, expecting an Oxford one, and when the Oxford one came tardily and ungraciously ten years later, he disdained to assume it. — Croker.

6 Single-speech Hamilton had been secretary to Lord Halifax, as Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and remained a short time with his successor, Lord Northumberland; but he resigned in 1764. Though he never spoke in parliament after A long acquaintance, he had a great esteem, and to whose conversation he once paid this high compliment: "I am very unwilling to be left alone, Sir, and therefore I go with my company down the first pair of stairs, in some hopes that they may, perhaps, return again; I go with you, Sir, as far as the street-door." In what particular department he intended to engage does not appear, nor can Mr. Hamilton explain. His prayer is in general terms:

"Enlighten my understanding with knowledge of right, and govern my will by thy laws, that no deceit may mislead me, nor temptation corrupt me: that I may always endeavour to do good, and hinder evil." [Amidst all the hopes and fears of this world, take not thy Holy Spirit from me.]

There is nothing upon the subject in his diary.

CHAPTER XIX.

This year was distinguished by his being introduced into the family of Mr. Thrale, one of the most eminent brewers in England, and member of Parliament for the borough of Southwark. Foreigners are not a little amazed when they hear of brewers, distillers, and men in similar departments of trade, held forth as persons of considerable consequence. In this great commercial country it is natural that a situation which produces much wealth should be considered as very respectable; and, no doubt, honest industry is entitled to esteem. But, perhaps, the too rapid advance of men of low extraction tends to lessen the value of that distinction by birth and gentility, which has ever been found beneficial to the grand scheme of subordination. Johnson used to give this account of the rise of Mr. Thrale’s father: "He worked at six shillings a week for twenty years in the great brewery, which afterwards was his own. The proprietor of it had an only daughter, who was married to a nobleman. It was not fit that a peer should continue the business. On the old man’s death, therefore, the brewery was to be sold. To find a purchaser for so large a property was a difficult matter; and, after some time, it was suggested, that it would be advisable to treat with Thrale, a sensible, active, honest man, who had been employed in the house, and to transfer the whole to him for thirty thousand pounds, security being taken upon the property. This was accordingly settled. In eleven years Thrale paid the purchase-money. He acquired a large fortune, and lived to be a member of parliament for Southwark. But what was most remarkable was the liberality with which he used his riches. He gave his son and daughters the best education. The esteem which his good conduct procured him from the nobleman who had married his master’s daughter, made him be treated with much attention; and his son, both at school and at the university of Oxford, associated with young men of the first rank. His allowance from his father, after he left college, was splendid; not less than a thousand a year. This, in a man who had risen as old Thrale did, was a very extraordinary instance of generosity. He used to say, "If this young dog does not find so much after I am gone as he expects, let him remember that he has a great deal in my own time."

The son, though in affluent circumstances, had good sense enough to carry on his father’s as is suggested in the foregoing note. From a letter to Miss Porter (post, January 14, 1766), it may be guessed, that this engagement was in some way connected with the parliamentary session; perhaps an alliance to write pamphlets or paragraphs, or to prepare speeches. Whatever it was, it may be inferred, from the obscurity in which they involved and left it, that it was something which Johnson did not choose to talk about, nor Hamilton to avow. — Croker.

1 The predecessor of old Thrale was Edmund Halser, Esq.; the nobleman who married his daughter was Lord Colman, great uncle of the first Marquis of Buckingham. But I believe Dr. Johnson may be mistaken in assigning so low an origin to Mr. Thrale. The clerk of St. Albans, a very aged man, told me, that he (the elder Thrale) married a sister of Lord Halser. It was, however, certain that the family was of some consideration in that town; in the abbey church is a handsome monument to the memory of Mr. John Thrale, late of London, merchant, who died in 1729, aged 54, Margaret his wife, and three of their children who died young, between the years 1676 and 1690. The arms upon this monument are in sight, together with those of Sir John Halser, in a coat of arms, on a chief indented vety, three wolves (or Gryphons') heads, or, couped at the neck. — Crest: on a ducal coronet, a tree, vert.

trade, which was of such extent, that I remember he once told me, he would not quit it for an annuity of ten thousand a year: "Not," he said, "that I get ten thousand a year by it, but it is an estate to a family." Having left daughters only, the property was sold for the immense sum of one hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds: a magnificent proof of what may be done by fair trade in a long period of time.

There may be some who think that a new system of gentility 1 might be established, upon principles totally different from what have hitherto prevailed. Our present heraldry, it may be said, is suited to the barbarous times in which it had its origin. It is chiefly founded upon feroceous merit, upon military excellence. Why, in civilised times, we may be asked, should there not be rank and honours, upon principles which, independent of long custom, are certainly not less worthy, and which, when once allowed to be connected with elevation and precedence, would obtain the same dignity in our imagination? Why should not the knowledge of the skill, the expertness, the assiduity, and the spirited hazards of trade and commerce, when crowned with success, be entitled to give those flattering distinctions by which mankind are so universally captivated? 2

Such are the specious, but false arguments for a proposition which always will find numerous advocates, in a nation where men are every day starting up from obscurity to wealth. To refute them is needless. The general sense of mankind cries out, with irresistible force, "Un gentilhomme est toujours gentilhomme." 3

Mr. Thrale had married Miss Hester Lynch Salusbury, of good Welsh extraction, a lady of lively talents, improved by education. That Johnson's introduction into Mr. Thrale's family, which contributed so much to the happiness of his life, was owing to her desire for his conversation, is a very probable and the general supposition: but it is not the truth. Mr. Murphy, who was intimate with Mr. Thrale, having spoken very highly of Dr. Johnson, he was requested to make them acquainted. This being mentioned to Johnson, he accepted of an invitation to dinner at Thrale's, and was so much pleased with his reception, both by Mr. and Mrs. Thrale, and they so much pleased with him, that his invitations to their house were more and more frequent, till at last he became one of the family, and an apartment was appropriated to him, both in their house at Southwark and in their villa at Streatham. 4

Johnson had a very sincere esteem for Mr. Thrale, as a man of excellent principles, a good scholar, well skilled in trade, of a sound understanding, and of manners such as presented the character of a plain independent English squire. As this family will frequently be mentioned in the course of the following pages, it will be as well to notice here and now that Mr. Thrale was inferior and in a very degree insignificant, compared with Mrs. Thrale; it may be proper to give a true state of the case from the authority of Johnson himself in his own words.

"I know no man," said he, "who is more master of his wife and family than Thrale. If he but holds up a finger, he is obeyed. It is a great mistake to suppose that she is above him in literary attainments. She is more flippant; but he has ten times her learning: he is a regular scholar; but her learning is that of a schoolboy in one of the lower forms." My readers may naturally wish for some representation of the figures of this couple. 4 Mr. Thrale was tall, well proportioned, and stately. As for Madam, or my Mistress, by which epithets Johnson used to mention Mrs. Thrale, she was short, plump, and brisk. 5 She has herself given us a lively view of the idea which Johnson had of her person, on her appearing before him in a dark-coloured gown: "You

1 Mrs. Burney informs me that she heard Dr. Johnson say, "An English merchant is a new species of gentleman." He, perhaps, had in his mind the following ingenious passage in "The Conscious Lovers," Act iv. Scene 2., where Mr. Sealand thus addresses Sir John Bevil: "Give me leave to say, that we merchants are a species of gentility that have grown into the world this last century, and are as honourable, and almost as useful, as you landed-folks, that have and have of old . . ." But a merchant of England, much above us: for your trading, forsooth, is extended no farther than a load of hay, or a fat ox. You are pleasant people indeed; because you are generally bred up lazy, therefore, I warrant you, industry is dishonourable." — Boswell.

2 It, indeed, Johnson called merchants a new species of gentlemen, and he must have forgotten not only the merchants of Tyre, who were "princes," and the Medici of Florence, but the Greshams, Cranfields, Osbornes, Duncombes, and so many others of English Credulity, who have as many as Tyre, and in a manner, more distinct, with elevation, one another, and an estate to a family. — Croker.

3 This dictum, whatever be its value, is not applicable to this question, which, is, whether a gentleman can ever cease to be one, but, whether a plebeian can ever become one. — Croker.

4 "The first time," says Mrs. Piozzi, "I ever saw this extraordinary man was in the year 1764, when Mr. Murphy, who had long been the friend and confidential intimate of Mr. Thrale, persuaded him to wish for Johnson's conversation, extolling it in terms which that of no other person could have deserved, till we were only in doubt how to obtain his company, and find an excuse for the invitation. The celebrity of Mr. Woodhouse, a shoemaker, whose verses were at that time the subject of common discourse, soon afforded a pretence, and Mr. Murphy brought Johnson to meet him, giving me general cautions not to be surprised at his figure, dress, or behaviour. What I recollect best of the day's talk was his earnestly recommending Addison's works to Mr. Woodhouse as a model for imitation. 'Give nights and days, Sir,' said he, 'to the study of Addison, if you mean either to be a good writer, or, what is more worth, an honest man.' When I saw something like the same expression in his criticism on that author, in the Lives of the Poets, I put him in mind of his past injunctions to the young poet, to which he replied, 'that he wished the shoemaker might have remembered them as well.' Mr. Johnson liked his new acquaintance so much, however, that from that time he dined with us every Thursday through the winter." — Croker.

5 The reader will not fail to observe the tone in which Boswell presents himself to us in this chapter. It marks a prejudice which pervades his book. — Croker.

6 He should have added that she was very pretty. She was about as tall as myself, and rather slender in her figure; but, when this acquaintance commenced. At the time of my first edition I was unable to ascertain precisely Mrs. Piozzi's age—but a somewhat early marriage is not to be wondered at, when this acquaintance commenced. little creatures should never wear those sort of clothes, however; they are unsuitable in every way. What! have not all insects gay colours? Mr. Thrale gave his wife a liberal indulgence, both in the choice of their company, and in the mode of entertaining them. He understood and valued Johnson, without remission, from their first acquaintance to the day of his death. Mrs. Thrale was enchanted with Johnson's conversation for its own sake, and had also a very allowable vanity in appearing to be honoured with the attention of so celebrated a man.

Nothing could be more fortunate for Johnson than this connection. He had at Mr. Thrale's all the comforts and even luxuries of life; his melancholy was diverted, and his irregular habits lessened, by association with an agreeable and well-ordered family. He was treated with the utmost respect, and even affection. The vivacity of Mrs. Thrale's literary talk roused him to cheerfulness and exertion, even when they were alone. But this was not often the case; for he found there a constant succession of what gave him the highest enjoyment, the society of the learned, the witty, and the eminent in every way; who were assembled in numerous companies, called forth his wonderful powers, and gratified him with admiration, to which no man could be insensible.

In the October of this year he at length gave to the world his edition of Shakspeare, which, if it had no other merit but that of producing his Preface, in which the excellences and defects of that immortal bard are displayed with a masterly hand, the nation would have had no reason to complain. A blind indiscriminate admiration of Shakspeare had exposed the British nation to the ridicule of foreigners. Johnson, by candidly admitting the faults of his poet, had the more credit in bestowing on him deserved and indisputable praise; and doubtless none of all his panegyrists have done him half so much honour. Their praise was like that of a counsel, upon his own side of the cause: Johnson's was like the grave, well-considered, and impartial opinion of the judge, which falls from his lips with weight, and is received with reverence. What he did as a commentator has no small share of merit, though his researches were not so ample, and his investigations so acute, as they might have been; and which we now certainly know from the labours of other able and ingenious critics who have followed him. He has enriched his edition with a concise account of each play, and of its characteristic excellence. Many of his notes have illustrated obscurities in the text, and placed passages eminent for beauty in a more conspicuous light; and he has, in general, exhibited such a mode of annotation, as may be beneficial to all subsequent editors.

His Shakspeare was virulently attacked by Mr. William Kenrick, who obtained the degree of LL.D. from a Scotch university, and wrote for the booksellers in a great variety of branches. Though he certainly was not without considerable merit, he wrote with so little regard to decency, and principles, and decorum, and in so hasty a manner, that his reputation was neither extensive nor lasting. I remember one evening, when some of his works were mentioned, Dr. Goldsmith said, he had never heard of them; upon which Dr. Johnson observed, 'Sir, he is one of the many who have made themselves public, without making themselves known.'

A young gentleman of Oxford, of the name of Barclay, wrote an answer to Kenrick's review of Johnson's Shakspeare. Johnson was at first angry that Kenrick's attack should have the credit of an answer. But afterwards, considering the young man's good intention, he kindly noticed him, and probably would have done more, had not the young man died.

In his Preface to Shakspeare, Johnson treated Voltaire very contemptuously, observing, upon some of his remarks, 'These are the petty cavils of petty minds.' Voltaire, in revenge, made an attack upon Johnson, in one of his numerous literary sallies which I remember to have read; but, there being no general index to his voluminous works, have searched in vain, and therefore cannot quote it.

Sir Joshua Reynolds, and some other of his friends, who were more conversed for his reputation than himself seemed to be, contrived to entangle him by a wager, or some other pecuniary engagement, to perform his task by a certain time.' - C. - Granger thus writes of Percy's edition of Shakspeare, in June, 1758: I have several times called on Johnson to pay him part of your subscription— I say part, because he never thinks of working if he has a couple of guineas in his pocket.

And again, 26th July: 'As to his Shakspeare, novet sed min promont. I shall feed him occasionally with guineas.' Price's Goldsmith, p. 295. C. - Croker, 1846.

Kenrick was born at Watford, Herts, and was brought up to the business of a rule-maker, which he quitted for literature. Of this he writes to Peregrine Porcupine, on the 26th April, 1774. He delivered Lectures on Shakspeare, and the next year commenced the London Review, which he continued to his death, June 10, 1779. - Whitt.

2 Hawkins says that Johnson was insensible to Churchill's abuse; but the poem before mentioned had brought to remembrance that his edition of Shakspeare had long been due. His friends took the alarm, and, by all the arts of reasoning and persuasion, laboured to convince him that, having taken subscriptions for a work in which he had made no progress, his credit was at stake. He confessed he was culpable, and promised from time to time to begin a course of such reading as was necessary to qualify him for the work; this was no more than he had formerly done in an engagement with Coxeter, to whom he had bound himself to write the Life of Shakspeare, but he never could be prevailed on to begin it, so that even now it was questioned whether his promises were to be relied on. For this reason

Voltaire was an antagonist with whom I thought Johnson should not disdain to contend. I pressed him to answer. He said, he perhaps might; but he never did.1

[JOHNSON TO DR. JOSEPH WARTON.

"Oct. 9. 1765.

"Dear Sir,—Mrs. Warton uses me hardly in supposing that I could forget so much kindness and civility as she showed me at Winchester. I remember, likewise, our conversation about St. Cross.2 The desire of seeing her again will be one of the motives that will bring me into Hampshire.

"I have taken care of your book; being so far from doubting your subscription, that I think you have subscribed twice: you once paid your guineas into my own hand in the garret in Gough Square. When you light on your receipt, throw it on the fire; if you find a second receipt, you may have a second book.

"To tell the truth, as I felt no solicitude about this work, I receive no great comfort from its conclusion; but yet am well enough pleased that the public has no further claim upon me. I wish you would write more frequently to, dear Sir, your affectionate humble servant,

"[S. JOHNSON.]"

Mr. Burney having occasion to write to Johnson for some receipts for subscriptions to his Shakespeare, which Johnson had omitted to deliver when the money was paid, he availed himself of that opportunity of thanking Johnson for the great pleasure which he had received from the perusal of his Preface to Shakespeare; which, although it excited much clamour against him at first, is now justly ranked among the most excellent of his writings. To this letter Johnson returned the following answer:

JOHNSON TO BURNEY,
In Portland Street.

"Oct. 16. 1765.

"Sir,—I am sorry that your kindness to me has brought upon you so much trouble, though you have taken care to abate that sorrow, by the pleasure which I received from your approbation. I defend my criticism in the same manner with you. We must confess the faults of our favourite, to gain credit to our praise of his excellencies. He that claims, either in himself or for another, the honours of perfection, will surely injure the reputation which he designs to assist. Be pleased to make my compliments to your family. I am, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,

From one of his Journals I transcribed what follows:—

"To avoid all singularity: Bonaventura.3 "To come in before service, and compose my mind by meditation, or by reading some portions of scripture. Tetty.

"If I can hear the sermon, to attend it, unless attention be more troublesome than useful.

"To consider the act of prayer as a reposal of myself upon God, and a resignation of all into his holy hand."

In 1764 and 1765 it should seem that Dr. Johnson was so busily employed with his edition of Shakspere, as to have had little leisure for any other literary exertion, or, indeed, even for private correspondence.4 He did not favour me with a single letter for more than two years, for which it will appear that he afterwards apologised.

He was, however, at all times ready to give assistance to his friends, and others, in revising their works, and in writing for them, or greatly improving, their Dedications. In that courtly species of composition no man excelled Dr. Johnson. Though the loftiness of his mind prevented him from ever dedicating in his own person, he wrote a very great number of Dedications for others. Some of these, the persons who were favoured with them are unwilling should be mentioned, from a too anxious apprehension, as I think, that they might be suspected of having received larger assistance; and some, after all the diligence I have bestowed, have escaped my inquiries. He told me, a great many years ago, "he believed he had dedicated to all the Royal Family round;" and it was indifferent to him what was the subject of the work dedicated, provided it were innocent. He once dedicated some music for the German Flute to Edward, Duke of York. In writing Dedications for others, he considered himself as by no means speaking his own sentiments.5

Notwithstanding his long silence, I never omitted to write to him, when I had any thing worthy of communicating. I generally kept

He appears in the course of this summer to have visited Dr. Warton, Head Master of Winchester School, and on the publication of his Shakespeare wrote to him the letter in the text, which I extract from Wool's Life of Warton. — Croker.

3 He was probably proposing to himself the model of this excellent person, who for his piety was named the Seraphic Doctor. — Boswell.

4 This trait is amusing: Mr. Boswell concludes that because Johnson did not, for two years, write to him, he wrote to nobody, and was exclusively occupied with his Shakespeare, though we have seen that, in those years, he found time to pay visits to his friends in Lincolnsire and Northamptonshire, and at Cambridge and Winchester. He also visited Brighton. If Mr. Boswell had been these two years in London, there can be no doubt that he would have found Johnson by no means absorbed in Shakespeare. — Croker.

copies of my letters to him, that I might have a full view of our correspondence, and never be at a loss to understand any reference in his letters. He kept the greater part of mine very carefully; and a short time before his death was attentive enough to seal them up in bundles, and ordered them to be delivered to me, which was accordingly done. Amongst them I found one, of which I had not made a copy, and which I own I read with pleasure at the distance of almost twenty years. It is dated November, 1763, at the palace of Pascal Paoli, in Corse, the capital of Corsica, and is full of generous enthusiasm. After giving a sketch of what I had seen and heard in that island, it proceeded thus: "I dare to call this a spirited tour. I dare to challenge your approbation."

This letter produced the following answer, which I found on my arrival at Paris.

A M. M. BOSWELL,

Chez Mr. Waters, Banquier, à Paris.

"Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, Jan. 14. 1766.

Dear Sir,— Apologies are seldom of any use. We will delay till your arrival the reasons, good or bad, which have made me such a sparing and ungrateful correspondent. Be assured, for the present, that nothing has lessened either the esteem or love with which I dismissed you at Harwicb. Both have been increased by all that I have been told of you by yourself or others; and when you return, you will return to an unalterated, and, I hope, unalterable friend.

"All that you have to fear from me is the vexation of disappointing me. No man loves to frustrate expectations which have been formed in his favour; and the pleasure which I promise myself from your journals and remarks is so great, that perhaps no degree of attention or discernment will be sufficient to afford it."

"Come home, however, and take your chance. I long to see you, and to hear you; and hope that we shall see some of you, or all, again. Come home, and expect such welcome as is due to him, whom a wise and noble curiosity has led, where perhaps no native of this country ever was before.

"I have no news to tell you that can deserve your notice; nor would I willingly lessen the pleasure that any novelty may give you at your return. I am afraid we shall find it difficult to keep among us a mind which has been so long feasted with variety. But let us try what esteem and kindness can effect.

"As your father's liberalty has indulged you with so long a ramble, I doubt not but you will think his sickness, or even his desire to see you, a sufficient reason for hastening your return. The longer we live, and the more we think, the higher value we learn to put on the friendship and tenderness of parents and of friends. Parents we can have but once; and he promises himself too much, who enters life with the expectation of finding many friends. Upon some motive, I hope, that you will be here soon; and am willing to think that it will be an inducement to your return, that it is sincerely desired by dear Sir, your affectionate humble servant, SAm. J0HNSON."

[JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.

"Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, Jan. 14. 1766.

"Dear Madam,— The reason why I did not answer your letters was that I can please myself with no answer. I was loth that Kitty should leave the house till I had seen it once more, and yet for some reasons I cannot well come during the session of parliament. I am unwilling to sell it, yet hardly know why. If it can be let, it should be repaired, and I purpose to let Kitty have part of the rent while we both live; and wish that you would get it surveyed, and let me know how much money will be necessary to fit it for a tenant. I would not have you stay longer than is convenient, and I thank you for your care of Kitty.

"I do not design to omit any amiss, I am sorry for it, but know not what to say. You must act by your own prudence, and I shall be pleased. Write to me again; I do not design to neglect you any more. It is great pleasure for me to hear from you; but this whole affair is painful to me. I wish you, my dear, many happy years. Give my respects to Kitty. I am, dear Madam, your most affectionate humble servant, Pearson MISS. (Sam. Johnson.)"

I returned to London in February, and found Dr. Johnson in a good house in Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, in which he had accommodated Miss Williams with an apartment on the ground floor, while Mr. Levett occupied his room in the garret: his faithful Francis was still attending upon him. He received me with much kindness. The fragments of our first conversation, which I have preserved, are these: I told him that Voltaire, in a conversation with me, had distinguished Pope and Dryden thus: "Pope drives a handsome chariot, with a couple of neat trim nags; Dryden a coach, and six stately horses.

1 See ante, p. 160. 2. — Croker.
2 In the Life of Dr. Warton, p. 312, we find a letter (dated Jan. 1760) from him to his brother, giving some account of Johnson and his society at this period: "I only dined with Johnson, who seemed cold and indifferent, and scarce said anything to me; perhaps he has heard what said of his Shakespeare, or rather was offended at what I wrote to him—as he pleases. Of all solemn coxcombs, Goldsmith is the first: yet sensible—but affects to use Johnson's hard words in conversation. We had a Mr. Dyer (ante/, p. 58, and post, p. 77), who is a scholar and a gentleman. Garrick is entirely off from Johnson, and cannot, he says, forgive him his insinuating that he withheld his old editions, which always were open to him, nor I suppose his never mentioning him in all his works." This coxcombs between Johnson and Warton was probably not serious—a subsequent difference arising out of a dispute at Sir Joshua Reynolds's table was more lasting. — Croker.

1. It is remarkable that Mr. Gray has employed somewhat the same image to characterize Dryden. He, indeed, furnishes his car with but two horses; but they are of 'ethereal race.' —

2. Behold where Dryden's less presumptuous car Wide o'er the fields of glory bends.

Two couriers of ethereal race,

With necks in thunder clothed, and long resounding pace." — Boswell.

Johnson, in the Life of Pope, has made a comparison between him and Dryden, in the spirit of this correction of Johnson. "Why, Sir, the truth is, they both drive coaches and six; but Dryden's horses are either galloping or stumbling: Pope's go at a steady even trot." He said of Goldsmith's "Traveller," which had been published in my absence, "There has not been so fine a poem since Pope's time."

And here it is proper to settle, with authentic precision, what has long floated in public report, as to Johnson's being himself the author of a considerable part of that poem. Much, no doubt, both of the sentiments and expression, were derived from conversation with him; and it was certainly submitted to his friendly revision: but, in the year 1783, he, at my request, marked with a pencil the lines which he had furnished, which are only line 420th:

"To stop too fearful, and too faint to go;
and the concluding ten lines, except the last couplet but one, which I distinguish by the Italic character:

"How small of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure!
Still to ourselves in every place consigned,
Our own felicity we make or find:
With secret course, which no loud storms annoy,
Glides the smooth current of domestic joy.
The lifted axe, the agonizing wheel,
Luke's iron crown, and Democrit's bed of steel,
To men removed from power, but rarely known,
Leave reason, faith, and conscience all our own."

He added, "These are all of which I can be sure." They bear a small proportion to the whole, which consists of four hundred and thirty-eight verses. Goldsmith, in the couplet which he inserted, mentions Luke as a person well known, and superficial readers have passed it over quite smoothly; while those of more attention have been as much perplexed by Luke as by Lydias, in "The Vanity of Human Wishes." The truth is, that Goldsmith himself was in a mistake. In the "Respublica Hungarica," there is an account of a desperate rebellion in the year 1514, headed by two brothers of the name of Zeck, George and Luke. When it was quelled, George, not Luke, was punished, by his head being encircled with a red-hot iron crown; "coronæ condescendit ferreæ coronatur." The same severity of torture was exercised on the Earl of Athol, one of the murderers of King James I. of Scotland!

Voltaire's metaphor. It is one of the most beautiful critical passages in our language, and was probably suggested to Johnson's mind by this conversation, although he did not make use of the same illustration. - Croker. Johnson condemns the image in his Life of Gray, "The car of Dryden," he says, "with his two couriers, has nothing in it peculiar; it is a car in which any other rider may be placed." - P. Cunningham.

1 This rests on no authority whatever, and may well be doubted. The Traveller is a poem which, in a peculiar degree, seems written from the personal observation and feelings of its author. - Croker.

2 This is a strange way of speaking of the lines of an author in his own poem — Johnson's were rather the

Dr. Johnson at the same time favoured me by marking the lines which he furnished to Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," which are only the last four:

"That trade's proud empire hastens to swift decay,
As ocean sweeps the labour'd mole away;
While self-dependent power can time defy,
As rocks resist the billows and the sky."

Talking of education, "People have now-a-days," said he, "got a strange opinion that every thing should be taught by lectures. Now, I cannot see that lectures can do so much good as reading the books from which the lectures are taken. I know nothing that can be best taught by lectures, except where experiments are to be shown. You may teach chemistry by lectures: — you might teach making of shoes by lectures!"

At night I supped with him at the Mitre tavern, that we might renew our social intimacy at the original place of meeting. But there was now a considerable difference in his way of living. Having had an illness, in which he was advised to leave off wine, he had, from that period, continued to abstain from it, and drank only water, or lemonade. I told him that a foreign friend of his, whom I had met with abroad, was so wretchedly persuaded to infidelity, that he treated the hopes of immortality with brutal levity; and said, "As man dies like a dog, let him tie like a dog." Johnson. "If he dies like a dog, let him lie like a dog." I added, that this man said to me, "I hate mankind, for I think myself one of the best of them, and I know how bad I am." Johnson. "Sir, he must be very singular in his opinion, if he thinks himself one of the best of men; for none of his friends think him so." — He said, "No honest man could be a Deist; for no man could be so after a fair examination of the proofs of Christianity." I named Hume. Johnson. "No, Sir; Hume owned to a clergyman in the bishopric of Durham, that he had never read the New Testament with attention." — I mentioned Hume's notion, that all who are happy are equally happy; a little miss with a new gown at a dancing-school ball, a general at the head of a victorious army, and an orator after having made an eloquent speech in a great assembly. Johnson. "Sir, that all who are happy, are equally happy, is not true. A peasant and a philosopher may be equally satisfied, but not equally happy. Happiness consists in the multiplicity of agreeable consciousness. A peasant has not capacity for having equal happiness with a philosopher." I remember this very question very happily illustrated, in opposition to Hume, by the Rev. Mr. Robert Brown, at Utrecht: "A small drinking-glass and a large one," said he, "may be equally full; but the large one holds more than the small."

Dr. Johnson was very kind this evening, and said to me, "You have now lived five-and-twenty years, and you have employed them well." "Alas, Sir," said I, "I fear not. Do I know history? Do I know mathematics? Do I know law?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, though you may know no science so well as to be able to teach it, and no profession so well as to be able to follow it, your general mass of knowledge of books and men renders you very capable to be made as useful as your cause, or yourself, as any profession." I mentioned, that a gay friend had advised me against being a lawyer, because I should be excelled by plodding blockheads. Johnson. "Why, Sir, in the formulary and statutory part of law, a plodding blockhead may excel; but in the ingenious and rational part of it, a plodding blockhead can never excel."

I talked of the mode adopted by some to rise in the world, by courting great men, and asked him whether he had ever submitted to it. Johnson. "Why, Sir, I never was near enough to great men, to court them. You may be prudently attached to great men, and yet independent. You are not to do what you think wrong; and, Sir, you are to calculate, and not pay too dear for what you get. You must not give a shilling's worth of court for sixpence worth of good. But if you can get a shilling's worth of good for sixpence worth of court, you are a fool if you do not pay court."

He said, "If convents should be allowed at all, they should only be retreats for persons unable to serve the public, or who have served it. It is our first duty to serve society, and, after we have done that, we may attend wholly to the salvation of our own souls. A youthful passion for abstracted devotion should not be encouraged. I introduced the subject of second sight, and other mysterious manifestations; the fulfilment of which, I suggested, might happen by chance. Johnson. "Yes, Sir, but they have happened so often that mankind have agreed to think them not fortuitous."

I talked to him a great deal of what I had seen in Corsica, and of my intention to publish an account of it. He encouraged me by saying, "You cannot go to the bottom of the subject; but all that you tell us will be new to us. Give us as many anecdotes as you can."

Our next meeting at the Mitre was on Saturday the 15th of February, when I presented to him my old and most intimate friend, the Rev. Mr. Temple, then of Cambridge. I having mentioned that I had passed some time with Rousseau in his wild retreat, and having quoted some remark made by Mr. Wilkes, with which I had spent many pleasant hours in Italy, Johnson, sarcastically, "It seems, Sir, you have kept very good company abroad, — Rousseau and Wilkes!" Thinking it enough to defend one at a time, I said nothing as to my gay friend, but answered with a smile, "My dear Sir, you don't call Rousseau had company. Do you really think him a bad man?" Johnson. "Sir, if you are talking jestingly of this, I don't talk with you. If you mean to be serious, I think him one of the worst of men; a rascal, who ought to be hunted out of society, as he has been. Three or four nations have expelled him; and it is a shame that he is protected in this country." Boswell. "I don't deny, Sir, but that his novel may, perhaps, do harm; but I cannot think his intention was bad." Johnson. "Sir, that will not do. We cannot prove any man's intention to be bad. You may shoot a man through the head, and say you intended to miss him; but the judge will order you to be hanged. An alleged want of intention, when evil is committed, will not be allowed in a court of justice. Rousseau, Sir, is a very bad man. I would sooner sign a sentence for his transportation, than that of any felon who has lived our whole duration, and shall never die." — Holy Dying, c. i. c. Neither the Bishop nor Dr. Johnson could mean that God and manhood should not be religious, but that they should not be religious to the exclusion of the social duties of industry, prudence, &c. See post, Aug. 19, 1778, where Johnson quotes from Hesiod, and explains in this sense, "Εγώ σιν, Δημόκριτος, τούτα ζήσας καὶ θανάσας, a line which Bishop Taylor had perhaps in his mind, and of which Boswell gives this translation: —

"Let youth in deeds, in counsel men engage:

When the proper days of youth are gone." — Croker.

2 Bishop Hall, in discussing this subject, has the same image: "Yet so conceive of these heavenly degrees, that the least is glorious. So do these vessels differ, the all are "just," and the pure are "blissful." — Epistles. Dec. III. cap. 6. It is found also in "A Work worth the Reading," by Charles Gibbon, 4to. 1801: "The joys of heaven are little compared to vessels filled with honour, of all quantities; for every man shall have his full measure there." — Malone. — See post, sub Mar. 24, 1773, Boswell's own use of this metaphor. — Croker.

3 This observation has given offence, as seeming to sanction the postponement of the care of our salvation, until we should have performed all our duties to society; which would be, in fact, an adjournment sine die. But Dr. Johnson was talking of monastic retirement, and from the context, as well as from his own practice, it is clear that he must have meant, that an entire abstraction from the world, and an excommunication to receive devotion, was not justifiable, as long as any of our duties to society were unperformed. Jeremy Taylor, who will not be suspected of worldliness, has a sentiment not dissimilar: — "If our youth be chaste and temperate, moderate and industrious, proceeding through a prudent and sober manhood, to a religious old age, then we have lived our whole duration, and shall never die." — Holy Dying, c. i. c. Neither the Bishop nor Dr. Johnson could mean that God and manhood should not be religious, but that they should not be religious to the exclusion of the social duties of industry, prudence, &c. See post, Aug. 19, 1778, where Johnson quotes from Hesiod, and explains in this sense, "Εγώ σιν, Δημόκριτος, τούτα ζήσας καὶ θανάσας, a line which Bishop Taylor had perhaps in his mind, and of which Boswell gives this translation: —

"Let youth in deeds, in counsel men engage:

When the proper days of youth are gone." — Croker.

4 The fact seems rather to be, that they have happened so seldom that (however general superstition may be) there does not seem to be on record, in the profane history of the world, one single well-authenticated instance of such a manifestation, — not one such instance as could command the full belief of rational men. Although Dr. Johnson generally leaned to the superstitious side of this question, it will be seen that he occasionally took a more rational view of it. — Croker.

gone from the Old Bailey these many years. Yes, I should like to have him work in the plantations." Boswell. "Sir, do you think him as bad a man as Voltaire? " Johnson. "Why, Sir, it is difficult to settle the proportion of iniquity between them."

This violence seemed very strange to me, who had read many of Rousseau's animated writings with great pleasure, and even edification; had been much pleased with his society, and was just come from the continent, where he was very generally admired. Nor can I yet allow that he deserves the very severe censure which Johnson pronounced upon him. His absurd preference of savage to civilised life, and other singularities, are proofs rather of a defect in his understanding, than of any depravity in his heart. And notwithstanding the unfavourable opinion which many worthy men have expressed of his "Profession de Foi du Vicaire Savoyard," I cannot help admiring it as the performance of a man full of sincere reverential submission to Divine Mystery, though beset with perplexing doubts: a state of mind to be viewed with pity rather than with anger.

On his favourite subject of subordination, Johnson said, "So far is it from being true that men are naturally equal, that no two people can be half an hour together, but one shall acquire an evident superiority over the other." 5

I mentioned the advice given us by philosophers, to console ourselves, when distressed or embarrassed, by thinking of those who are in a worse situation than ourselves. This, I observed, could not apply to all, for there must be some who have nobody worse than they are. Johnson. "Why, to be sure, Sir, there are; but they don't know it. There is no being so poor and so contemptible, who does not think there is somebody still poorer, and still more contemptible."

As my stay in London at this time was very short, I had not many opportunities of being with Dr. Johnson; but I felt my veneration for him in no degree lessened, by my having seen "mulitum hominum mores et urbes." On the contrary, by having it in my power to compare him with many of the most celebrated persons of other countries, my admiration of his extraordinary mind was increased and confirmed.

The roughness, indeed, which sometimes appeared in his manners, was more striking to me now, from my having been accustomed to the studied smooth complying habits of the continent; and I clearly recognised in him, not without respect for his honest conscientious zeal, the same indignant and sarcastical mode of treating every attempt to unhinge or weaken good principles.

One evening, when a young gentleman teased him with an account of the inferiord of his servant, who, he said, would not believe the scriptures, because he could not read them in the original tongues, and be sure that they were not invented. "Why, foolish fellow," said Johnson, "has he any better authority for almost everything that he believes?" Boswell. "Then the vulgar, Sir, never can know they are right, but must submit themselves to the learned." Johnson. "To be sure, Sir. The vulgar are the children of the State, and must be taught like children. Boswell. "Then, Sir, a poor Turk must be a Mahometan, just as a poor Englishman must be a Christian?" Johnson. "Why, yes, Sir; and what then? This, now, is such stuff as I used to talk to my mother, when I first began to think myself a clever fellow; and she ought to have whipt me for it."

Another evening Dr. Goldsmith and I called on him, with the hope of prevailing on him to sup with us at the Mitre. We found him indisposed, and resolved not to go abroad. "Come, then," said Goldsmith, "we will not go to the Mitre to-night, since we cannot have the big man with us." Johnson then called for a bottle of port, of which Goldsmith and I partook, while our friend, now a water-drinker, sat by us. Goldsmith. "I think, Mr. Johnson, you don't go near the theatres now. You give yourself no more concern about a new play, than if you had never had anything to do with the stage." Johnson. "Why, Sir, our tastes greatly alter. The lad does not care for the child's rattle, and the old man does not care for the young man's mistress." Goldsmith. "Nay, Sir; but your Muse was not a pros-

1 Boswell was always envious of notoriety; and the Confessions of this miserable man had not been at this time published. If we are to admit Mr. Boswell's distinction between the understanding and the heart, it would seem that his judgment on this point should be reversed, for Rousseau's understanding would probably have been sound enough, if the folly and turpitude of his heart had not disordered it. I would think this is in literature so below and undervalued a reputation as Rousseau's. — Croker.
2 No mistake was ever greater, in terms or in substance, than that which affirms the natural equality of mankind. Men, on the contrary, are born so very unequal in capacities and powers, mental and corporeal, that it requires laws and the institutions of civil society to bring them to a state of moral equality. Social equality — that is, equality in property, power, rank, and respect — if it were miraculously established, could not maintain itself a week. — Croker.

5 It may be suspected that Dr. Johnson called this "childish stuff" somewhat hastily, and from a desire of evading the subject; for, no doubt, the principle involved in Mr. Boswell's inquiries is one of very high importance, and of very great difficulty — for it applies not merely to the submission of the ignorant to the interpretations of the learned, but to the degree of absolute, verbal and literal authority, to which human transcripts of the divine inspiration are entitled. This question has a great share in the injured sophistry of some modern Germans. — Croker, 1831-1856.
6 These three little marks of Mr. Boswell's accuracy in reporting the expressions of his personages, is a jejune Irish phrase, which, of all Johnson's acquaintances, no one, probably, but Goldsmith, would have used. — Croker.

titute." Johnson. "Sir, I do not think she was. But as we advance in the journey of life we drop some of the things which have pleased us; whether it be that we are fatigued, and don't choose to carry so many things any farther, or that we find other things which we like better." Boswell. "But, Sir, why don't you give us something in some other way?" Goldsmith. "Ay, Sir, we have a claim upon you." Johnson. "No, Sir, I am not obliged to do any more. No man is obliged to do as much as he can do. A man is to have part of his life to himself. If a soldier has fought a good many campaigns, he is not to be blamed if he retires to ease and tranquillity. A physician, who has practised long in a great city, may be excused if he retires to a small town, and takes less practice. Now, Sir, the good I can do by my conversation bears the same proportion to the good I can do by my writings, that the practice of a physician, retired to a small town, does to his practice in a great city." Boswell. "But I wonder, Sir, you have not more pleasure in writing than in not writing." Johnson. "Sir, you may wonder." He talked of making verses, and observed, "The great difficulty is, to know when you have made good ones. When composing, I have generally had them in my mind, perhaps fifty at a time, walking up and down in my room; and then I have written them down, and often, from laziness, have written only half lines. I have written a hundred lines in a day. I remember I wrote a hundred lines of 'The Vanity of Human Wishes' in a day. Doctor, turning to Goldsmith, "I am not quite idle; I made one line t'other day; but I made no more." Goldsmith. "Let us hear it: we'll put a bad one to it." Johnson. "No, Sir; I have forgot it." Such specimens of the easy and playful conversation of the great Dr. Samuel Johnson are, I think, to be prized; as exhibiting the little varieties of a mind so enlarged and so powerful when objects of consequence required its exertions, and as giving us a minute knowledge of his character and modes of thinking.

my capricious delicacy, in omitting, in one or two instances, an indecent passage, and in substituting, in two or three others, for a coarse word, a more decorous equivalent; and he regretts particularly the suppression of "a strong old-fashioned English word, familiar to all who read their Bibles." It would be easy, I think, to refute Mr. Macaulay's general principle, and to expose his equally sophistical and irreverent allusion to the Bible; but I shall here content myself with adducing the contrary authority of Sir Walter Scott, and the author of the Lives of Burke and Goldsmith, who, having, since my edition and Mr. Macaulay's Review were published, occasion to quote some of those passages, adopted my version, and I am convinced that the public at large must approve of my endeavour to remove from this delightful book the few expressions that might offend female delicacy on any score, however, to say, that one or two of Mr. Macaulay's "strong old-fashioned words" still remain, being so interwoven with the context, that I could not remove them without too great laceration. — Croker.

JOHNSON TO LANGTON,
At Langton, near Spilsby. "Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, March 9, 1766. "Dear Sir,—I am told your friends have done, that from your departure till a postman nothing has been heard of you, none of us are able to inform the rest; but as we are all neglected alike, no one thinks himself entitled to the privilege of complaint. "I should have known nothing of you or of Langton, from the time that dear Miss Langton left us, had not I met Mr. Simpson, of Lincoln, one day in the street, by whom I was informed that Mr. Langton, your mamma, and yourself, had been all ill, but that you were all recovered. "That sickness should suspend your correspondence, I did not wonder; but hoped that it would be renewed at your recovery. "Since you will not inform us where you are, or how you live, I know not whether you desire to know any thing of us. However, I will tell you that the Club subsists; but we have the loss of Burke's company since he has been engaged in public business, in which he has gained more reputation than perhaps any man at his [first] appearance ever gained before. He made two speeches in the House for repealing the Stamp Act, which were publicly commended by Mr. Pitt, and have filled the town with wonder. "Burke is a great man by nature, and is expected soon to attain civil greatness. I am grown greater too, for I have maintained the newspapers these many weeks; and what is greater still, I have risen every morning since New-year's day, at about eight: when I was up, I have, indeed, done but little; yet it is no slight advancement to obtain, for so many hours more, the consciousness of being. "I wish you were in my new study; I am now writing the first letter in it. I think it looks very pretty about me, — Croker.

JOHNSON TO LANGTON,

At Langton.

"Dear Sir,—In supposing that I should be more commonly afflicted by the death of Peregrine Langton, you were not wrong; but he was one of those whom I loved at once by instinct and by reason. I have seldom indulged more hope of any thing than of being able to improve our acquaintance to friendship. Many a time have I placed myself again at Langton, and imagined the pleasure with which I should walk to Partney in a summer morning; but this is no longer possible. We must now endeavour to preserve what is left us,—his example of piety and economy. I hope you make what inquiries you can, and write down what is told you. The little things which distinguish domestic characters are soon forgotten: if you delay to inquire, you will have no information; if you neglect to write, information will be vain."

1 Mr. Langton's uncle.— Boswell.
2 The place of residence of Mr. Peregrine Langton. — Boswell.
3 Mr. Langton did not disregard the counsel given by Dr. Johnson, but wrote an account which he has been pleased to communicate to me.

The circumstances of Mr. Peregrine Langton were these. He had an annuity for life of two hundred pounds per annum. He lived partly on it, partly on the interest of his house, with two or three small fields, was twenty-eight pounds; the county he lived in was not more than moderately cheap; his family consisted of a sister, who paid him eighteen pounds annually for her board, and a niece. The servants were two maid, and two men in livery. His common way of living, at his table, was three or four dishes: the appartances to his table were neat and handsome; he frequently entertained company at dinner, and then his table was well served with as many dishes as were usual at the tables of the other gentlemen in the neighbourhood. His own appearance, as to clothes, was genteely neat and plain. He always had a post-chaise and a pair of chaise-horses.

"Such, with the resources I have mentioned, was his way of living, and did not practise any extraordinary degree of parsimony, but endeavoured that in his family there should be plenty without waste. As an instance that this was his endeavour, it may be worth while to mention a method he took in regulating a proper allowance of malt liquor to be drunk in his family, that there might not be a deficiency, or any intemperate provision. Every Friday he made his allowance of a hog's head in a month was not enough for his own family, he ordered the quantity of a hog's head to be put into bottles, had it drunk by his servants, and distributed out, every day, eight quarts, which is the quantity each day at one hog's head in a month; and told his servants, that if that did not suffice, he would allow them more; but, by this method, it appeared at once that the allowance was much more than sufficient for his small family; and this practice, that continued, and saved all future dispute. He was, in general, very diligently and honestly kept his household; and always believed that he was very considerate as to the injunctions he gave, and saved them distinct; and, at their first coming to his service, steadily exacted a close compliance with them, without relief or remission; and the servants, finding this to be the case, soon grew habitually accustomed to the practice of their business, and then very little further attention was necessary. On extraordinary instances of good behaviour, or diligent service, he was not wanting in particular encouragements and presents above their wages: it is remarkable that he would permit their relations to visit them, and stay at his house two or three days at a time.

"The wonder, with most that hear an account of his economy, will be, how he was able, with such an income, to live so comfortably when it is known how much every thing he had. He had no land, except the two or three small fields which I have said he rented; and, instead of gaining by his house, he was continually losing by it; he had no tenant, and no customary rents; and, however, they furnished him with no further assistance towards his housekeeping, than grass for his horses (not hay, for that I know he bought), and for two cows. Every Monday morning he settled his family accounts, and so kept up a constant attention to the confining his expenses within his income; and to do it more exactly, compared those expenses with a computation he had made, how much that income would afford him every week and day of the year, and the former as well as soon as possible, repair was wanting in or about his house, to have it immediately performed. When he had money to spare, he chose to lay it out in books, or other necessaries; as then, he said, he could afford it, which he might not do so well able to do when the actual want came; in consequence of which method, he had a considerable supply of necessary articles lying by him, beside what was in use.

"But the most particular that seems to have enabled him to do so much with his income, was, that he paid for every thing as soon as he had it, except, alone, what were current accounts, such as rent, and servants' wages; and these he paid at the stated times with the utmost exactness. He gave notice to the tradesmen of the neighbouring market towns, that they should no longer have his custom, if they let any of his servants have any thing without their paying for it. Thus he put it out of his power to commit those impositions to which those are liable, that defer their payments by using their money some other way than where it ought to go. And whatever money he had by him, he knew that it was not demanded elsewhere, but that he might safely employ it as he pleased.

"His example was confined, by the sequestered place of his abode, to no one but his family; and I know of no man of that character and degree of virtue would have made it valuable to all who could have known it. These few particulars, which I knew myself, or those who knew him, I have said were the strictest method, and an incentive to that wise art of living, which he so successfully practised."

After I had been some time in Scotland, I mentioned to him in a letter that "On my first return to my native country, after some years of absence, I was told of a vast number of my acquaintance who were all gone to the land of forgetfulness, and I found myself like a man stalking over a field of battle, who every moment perceives some one lying dead." I complained of irresolution, and mentioned my having made a vow as a security for good conduct. I wrote to him again without being able to move his indulgence: nor did I hear from him till he had received a copy of my inaugural Exercise, or Thesis in Civil Law, which I published at my admission as an Advocate, as is the custom in Scotland. He then wrote to me as follows: —

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, August 10. 1766.

'Dear Sir,—The reception of your Thesis put me in mind of my debt to you. Why did you suppose I would punish you for it, by telling you that your Latin wanted correction? In the beginning, Spei altera, not to urge that it should be prima, is not grammatical; altera should be alteri. In the next line you seem to use genus absolutely, for what we call family, that is, for illustris extraction, I doubt without authority. Homines nullius originis, for nullis ori;ti majoribus, or nullo loco nati, is, as I am afraid, barbarous. — Rud- diman is dead."

"I have now vexed you enough, and will try to please you. Your resolution to obey your father I sincerely approve; but do not accustom yourself to enchain your volatility by vows; they will sometime leave a thorn in your mind, which you will, perhaps, never be able to extract or eject. Take this warning; it is of great importance."

1 The passage omitted alluded to a private transaction. — Boswell.

2 This censure of my Latin relates to the dedication, which was as follows: — "Viro nobilissimo, eruditissimo, Ioanni, Viscomitii Montauintar, atavis edito regibus, excelsa familiaris de Bute spei altera; habente sculo, quam homines nullius originis genus oculos aggrandizat, sanguinis antiqui et illustris semper memorii, natum splendorum virtutibus augent: ad publica populi comiata jam legato; in optimatissimum vero Magnae Britanniae senatu, jure hereditario, olim concessuro; viam instar variis doctrinal promovente, nec tamen se venditante, prordito; prisci fidei, animo liberismo, et morum elegantia insigni; in Italie visitans et Rhenos socio suo honoratissimo; hasce jurisprudentiae primitias, deviendominia antieicie et observantium, monumentum, D. D. C. Q. Jacobus Boswell." — Boswell.

3 He says Ruddiman (a great grammarian) is dead — as in former days it was said that Priscian's head was broken. Ruddiman, who was born in 1674, had died in 1757. — Croker.

4 This alludes to the first sentence of the Proemium of my Thesis. "Jurisprudentiae studio nullum uberrim, nullum genereosum; in legibus enim agiandia, pullorum more, variaeque fortunis vicex quibus leges orientali, contemplari simul solenem." — Boswell.

5 Hic sunt qua nostra fatae voce monere; These are the counsels that my voice may give; Go — follow them. — En. vi. 461.

6 The passage omitted explained the transaction to which the preceding letter had alluded. — Boswell.
"To talk no longer in allegory, I am, with all deference, going to offer a few observations in defence of my Latin, which you have found fault with.

"You think I should have used spei prima instead of spei altera. Speis is, indeed, often used to express something on which we have a future dependence, as in Virg. Eclog. l. i. 14. —

"modo namque gemellos
Spes gregis, ab illic in nudis cornixia reliquit!

and in Georg. iii. l. 473. —

"Sperne egremque simul, for the lambs and the sheep. Yet it is also used to express any thing on which we have a present dependence, and is well applied to a man of distinguished influence, — our support, our refuge, our presidium, as Horace calls Maccenas. So, Ænèid xii. l. 57.; Queen Amata addresses her son-in-law, Turnus: — 'Spes tu nascere war;' and he was then no future hope, for she adds, —

"deens imperiumque Latini Te penes;
which might have been said of my Lord Bute some years ago. Now I consider the present Earl of Bute to be 'Excelsa familia de Bute speis prima,' and my Lord Mounstuart, as his eldest son, to be 'spei altera.' So in Ænèid xii. l. 106., after having mentioned Pater Ænæs, who was the present speis, the regiusing speis, as my German friends would say, the speis prima, the poet adds, —

"Et juxta Ascanius, magna speis altera Romæ."

"You think altere ungrammatical, and tell me it should have been alteri. You must recollect, that in old times alter was declined regularly; and when the ancient fragments preserved in the Juris Civilitatis Pontes were written, it was certainly declified in the way that I use it. This, I should think, may protect a lawyer who writes altera in a dissertation upon part of his own science. But as I could hardly venture to quote fragments of old law to so classical a man as Mr. Johnson, I have not made an accurate search into these remains, to find examples of what I am able to produce in poetical composition. We find in Plaut. Rudens, act iii. scene 4. —

"Nam huie altere patria quis sit profecto nescio.
Plautus is, to be sure, an old comic writer; but in the days of Scipio and Lelius, we find Terent. Hecatontin. act ii. scene 3. —

"hoc ipsa in itinere altere Dum narrat, forte audivi."

"You doubt my having authority for using genus absolutely, for what we call familiar, that is, for illustrious extraction. Now I take genus in Latin to have much the same signification with birth in English; both in their primary meaning expressing simply descent, but both made to stand near ἱερόν for noble descent. genus is thus used in Hor. Ía. ii. Sat. v. l. 8. —

"Et genus et virtus, nisi cum re, vilior algæ est.'
And in lib. i Epist. vi. l. 37. —

"Et genus et formam Regina Pecunia donat.'
And in the celebrated contest between Ajax and Ulysses, Ovid's Metamorph. lib. xii. l. 140. —

"Nam genus et proavos, et quae non fecimus ipsi, Vix ea nostra voca.'

"Homines nullius originis, for nullius orti majoribus,

Might I venture to differ from you with regard to the utility of vows? I am sensible that it would be very dangerous to make vows rashly, and without a due consideration. But I cannot help thinking that they may often be of great advantage to one of avariable judgment and irregular inclinations. I always remember a passage in one of your letters to our Italian friend Baretti; where, talking of the monastic life, you say you do not wonder that serious men should put themselves under the protection of a religious order, when they have found how unable they are to take care of themselves. For my own part, without affecting to be a Saint, I am sure I have a more than ordinary struggle to maintain with the Exit Principle; and all the methods I can devise are little enough to keep me tolerably steady in the paths of rectitude.

It appears from Johnson's diary, that he was this year at Mr. Thrale's, from before Midsummer till after Michaelmas, and that he afterwards passed a month at Oxford. He had then contracted a great intimacy with Mr. Chambers of that University, afterwards Sir Robert Chambers, one of the Judges in India.

He published nothing this year in his own name; but the noble Dedication * to the King, of Gwyn’s * "London and Westminster Improved,"1 was written by him; and he furnished the Preface,† and several of the pieces, which compose a volume of Miscellanies by Mrs. Anna Williams, the blind lady who had an asylum in his house.2 Of these, there are his "Epitaph on Philips; * " Translation of a Latin Epitaph on Sir Thomas Hamner; † " Friendship, an Ode; * and, " The Ant,"* a paraphrase from the Proverbs, of which I have a copy in his own handwriting; and, from internal evidence, I ascribe to him, " Miss M.," and " The Author’s Letters, given to the Author a gold and silk network Pomegranate, on which was written, † † and " The Happy Life." † Most of the pieces in this volume have evidently received additions from his superior pen, particularly " Verses to Mr. Richardson, on his Sir Charles Grandison; "The Excursion; " Reflections on a Grave digging in Westminster Abbey." There is in this collection a poem, "On the death of Stephen Grey, the Electrician; * which, on reading it, appeared to me to be undoubtedly Johnson’s. I asked Mrs. Williams whether it was not his. "Sir," said she, with some warmth, "I wrote that poem before I had the honour of Dr. Johnson’s acquaintance." I, however, was so much impressed with my first notion, that I mentioned it to Johnson, repeating, at the same time, what Mrs. Williams had said. His answer was, "It is true, Sir, that she wrote it before she was acquainted with me; but she has not told you that I wrote it all over again, except two lines." * "The Fountains," † a beautiful little Fairy tale in prose, written with exquisite simplicity, is one of Johnson’s productions; and I cannot withhold from Mrs. Thrale the praise of being the author of that admirable poem, "The Three Warnings.

He wrote this year a letter, not intended for publication, which has, perhaps, as strong marks of his sentiment and style, as any of his compositions. The original is in my possession. It is addressed to the late Mr. William Drummmond, bookseller in Edinburgh, a gentleman of good family, but small estate, who took arms for the house of Stuart in 1745; and during his concealment in London till the act of general pardon came out, obtained the acquaintance of Dr. Johnson, who justly esteemed him as a very worthy man. It seems some of the members of the Society in Scotland for propagating Christian knowledge had opposed the scheme of translating the Holy Scriptures into the Erse or Gaelic language, from political considerations of the disadvantage of keeping up the distinction between the Highlanders and the other inhabitants of North Britain. Dr. Johnson being informed of this, I suppose by Mr. Drummmond, wrote with a generous indignation as follows: —

JOHNSON TO WILLIAM DRUMMOND.

"Johnson’s Court, Fleet Street, Aug. 13. 1765."

"Sir, I did not expect to hear that it could be, in an assembly convened for the propagation of Christian knowledge, a question whether any nation uninstructed in religion should receive instruction; or whether that instruction should be imparted to them by a translation of the holy books into their own language. If obduracy to the will of God be necessary to happiness, and knowledge of his will be necessary to obedience, I know not how he that withholds this knowledge, or delays it, can be said to love his neighbour as himself. He that voluntarily continues ignorance is guilty of all the crimes which ignorance produces; as to him that should extinguish the talents of a light-house, might justly be impudently the calumniator of shipwreck. Christianity is the highest perfection of humanity: and as no man is good but as he wishes the good of others, no man can be good in the highest degree, who wishes not to others the largest measures of the greatest good. To omit for a year, or for

1 In this work Mr. Gwyn proposed the principle, and in many instances the details, of the most important improvements which have been made in the metropolis in our day. A bridge near Somerset House—a great street from the Haymarket to the New Road — the improvement of the interior of St. James’s Park—quays along the Thames—new approaches to the bridge, the general of Smith’s field market, and several other suggestions on which we pride ourselves as original designs of our own times, are all to be found in Mr. Gwyn’s able and curious work. It is singular, that he denounced a row of houses then building in Finsico, as intolerable nuisances to Buckingham Palace, and of these very houses the public voice now calls for the destruction. Gwyn had, what Lord Chatham called, “the prophet’s eye of taste.” — Croker.

2 The following account of this publication was given by Lady Knight (see ante, p. 21, and 74.). "As to her poems, she many years attempted to publish them, but got towards the publication, she confessed to me, went for necessities, and that the greatest pain she ever felt was from the thought of keeping her subscriptions.1 But what do I say? The doctor [Johnson] always puts me off with 'Well, we’ll think about it;' and Goldsmith says, 'Leave it to me.' However, two of her friends, under her directions, made a new subscription at a crown, the whole price of the work, and in a very little time raised sixty pounds. Mrs. Carter was applied to by Mrs. Williams’s desire, and she, with the utmost activity and kindness, procured a long list of names. At length the work was published, in which is a fine written [glossey fairy] tale of Dr. Johnson. The money (100l.) Mrs. Williams had various uses for, and a part of it was refunded."

3 See ante, p. 54, where it is shown that the "Verses on the Purse" are by Hakesworth. It is strange that Boswell should there state his belief that both the Latin epitaph on Hamner and its translation were Johnson’s, when it appears on the face of Mrs. Williams’s volume, that if (I presume the Latin) was "written by Dr. Friend," who was celebrated for this species of composition. — Croker, 1853.—1846.

4 These lines record a memorable fact which I have not seen elsewhere noticed. Mrs. Williams, if it seems, in her earlier life, had been an assistant to Gray in his electrical experiments, and mention is made of the electric flame:

"The flame which first, weak pupil of thy lore, I saw—condemned, alas! to see no more."

To which is appended a note, saying, "The publisher of this Miscellany, as she was assisting Mr. Gray in his experiments, was the first that observed and noticed the emission of the electric spark from the human body. Misc. p. 42.—Craver, 1846."
a day, the most efficacious method of advancing Christianity, in compliance with any purposes that terminate on this side of the grave, is a crime of which I know not that the world has yet had an example, except in the practice of the planters of America,—a race of mortals whom, I suppose, no other man wishes to resemble.

The Papists have, indeed, denied to the laity the use of the Bible; but this prohibition, in few places now very rigorously enforced, is defended by arguments, which have for their foundation the care of souls. To obscure, upon motives merely political, the light of revelation, is a practice reserved for the reformed; and, surely, the blackest midnight of popery is meridian sunshine to such a reformation. I am not very willing that any language should be totally extinguished. The similitude and derivations of languages afford the most indubitable proof of the traduction of nations, and the genealogy of mankind. They add often physical certainty to historical evidence, and often supply the only evidence of ancient migrations, and of the revolutions of ages which left no written monuments behind them.

"Every man’s opinions, at least his desires, are a little influenced by his favourite studies. My zeal for languages may seem, perhaps, rather over-heated, even to those by whom I desire to be well esteemed. To those who have nothing in their thoughts but trade or policy, present power, or present money, I should not think it necessary to defend my opinions; but with men of letters I would not unwillingly compound, by wishing the continuance of every language, however narrow in its extent, or however incommensurable for common purposes, till it is reposited in some version of a known book, that it may be always hereafter examined and compared with other languages, and then permitting its disuse. For this purpose, the translation of the Bible is most to be desired. It is not certain that the same method will not preserve the Highland language, for the purposes of learning, and abolish it from the world. Wishing that the Highland, or the Bible, they will naturally wish to have its obscurities cleared, and to know the history, collateral or appendant. Knowledge always desires increase; it is like fire, which must first be kindled by some external agent, but which will afterwards propagate itself. When they once desire to learn, they will naturally have recourse to the nearest language by which that desire can be gratified; and one will tell another, that if he would attain knowledge, he must learn English.

"This speculation may, perhaps, be thought more rational than the grossness of real life will easily admit. Let it, however, be remembered, that the efficacy of ignorance has long been tried, and has not produced the consequence expected. Let knowledge, therefore, take its turn; and let the patrons of privation stand awhile aside, and admit the operation of positive principles.

"You will be pleased, Sir, to assure the worthy man who is employed in the new translation, that he has my wishes for his success; and if here or at Oxford I can be of any use, that I shall think it more than honour to promote his undertaking.

"I am sorry that I delayed so long to write. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON.

The opponents of this pious scheme being made ashamed of their conduct, the benevolent undertaking was allowed to go on. The following letters, though not written till the year after, being chiefly upon the same subject, are here inserted.

JOHNSON TO DRUMMOND.

"Johnson’s Court, Fleet Street, April 21, 1767.

"Dear Sir,—That my letter should have had such effects as you mention, gives me great pleasure. I hope you do not flatter me by imputing to me more good than I have really done. Those whom my arguments have persuaded to change their opinion, show such modesty and candour as deserve great praise.

"I hope the worthy translator goes diligently forward. He has a higher reward in prospect than any honours which this world can bestow. I wish I could be useful to him.

"The publication of my letter, if it could be of use in a cause to which all other causes are nothing, I should not prohibit. But first, I would have you to consider whether the publication will really do any good; next, whether by printing and distributing a very small number, you may not attain all that you propose; and, what perhaps I should have said first, whether the letter, which I do not now perfectly remember, be fit to be printed. If you can consult Dr. Robertson, to whom I am a little known, I shall be satisfied about the propriety of whatever he shall direct. If he thinks that it should be printed, I entreat him to revise it; there may, perhaps, be some negligent lines written, and whatever is amiss, he knows very well how to rectify. Be pleased to let me know, from time to time, how this excellent design goes forward.

"Make my compliments to young Mr. Drummond, whom I hope you will live to see such as you desire him. I have not lately seen Mr. Elphinston, but believe him to be prosperous. I shall be glad to hear the same of you. I am, Sir, your affectionate humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."
JOHNSON TO DRUMOND.

"Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, Oct. 24. 1767.

Sir,—I returned this week from the country, after an absence of near six months, and found your letter with many others, which I should have answered sooner, if I had sooner seen them.

Dr. Robertson's opinion was surely right. Men should not be told of the faults which they have mended. I am glad the old language is taught, and honour the translator, as a man whom God has distinguished by the high office of propagating his word.

I must take the liberty of engaging you in an office of charity. Mrs. Heely, the wife of Mr. Heely, who had lately some office in your theatre, is my near relation, and now in great distress. They wrote me word of their situation some time ago, to which I returned them an answer which raised hopes of more than it is proper for me to give them. Their representation of their affairs I have discovered to be such as cannot be trusted; and at this distance, though their case requires haste, I know not how to act. She, or her daughters, may be heard of at Camongate head. I must beg, Sir, that you will enquire after them, and let me know what is to be done. I am willing to go to ten pounds, and will transmit you such a sum, if on examination you find it likely to be of use. If they are in immediate want, advance them what you think proper. What I could do I would do for the woman, having no great reason to pay much regard to Heely himself. I believe you may receive some intelligence from Mrs. Baker of the theatre, whose letter I received at the same time with yours; and to whom, if you see her, you will make my excuse for the seeming neglect of answering her.

Whatever you advance within ten pounds shall be immediately returned to you, or paid as you shall order. I trust wholly to your judgment. I am, Sir, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."
Hervey in consideration of his having written for him a pamphlet against Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, who, Mr. Hervey imagined, was the author of an attack upon him; but that it was afterwards discovered to be the work of a garretter1, who wrote "The Fool;" the pamphlet therefore against Sir Charles was not printed.

In February, 1767, there happened one of the most remarkable incidents of Johnson's life, which gratified his monarchical enthusiasm, and which he loved to relate with all its circumstances, when requested by his friends. This was his being honoured by a private conversation with his Majesty, in the library at the Queen's house.2 He had frequently visited those splendid rooms and noble collection of books, which he used to say was more numerous and curious than he supposed any person could have made in which the King was so belov'd. Mr. Barnard, the librarian, took care that he should have every accommodation that could contribute to his ease and convenience, while indulging his literary taste in that place; so that he had here a very agreeable resource at leisure hours.

"His Majesty having been informed of his occasional visits, was pleased to signify a desire that he should be told when Dr. Johnson came next to the library. Accordingly, the next time that Johnson did come, as soon as he was fairly engaged with a book, on which, while he sat by the fire, he seemed quite intent, Mr. Barnard stole round to the apartment where the King was, and, in obedience to his Majesty's commands, mentioned that Dr. Johnson was then in the library. His Majesty said he was at leisure, and would go to him; upon which Mr. Barnard took one of the candles that stood on the King's table, and lighted his Majesty through a suite of rooms, till they came to a private door into the library, of which his Majesty had the key. Being entered, Mr. Barnard stepped forward hastily to Dr. Johnson, who was still in a profound study, and whispered him, "Sir, here is the King;" Johnson started up, and stood still. His Majesty approached him, and at once was courteously easy.2

His Majesty began by observing, that he understood he came sometimes to the library; and then mentioning his having heard that the Doctor had been lately at Oxford, asked him if he was not fond of going thither. To which

Boswell's Life of Johnson. 1767.

(1741), it is believed, of the many appeals which Mr. Hervey made to the public, relative to his private concerns. The subject is astonishing. Lady Hammer elapsed from her husband with Mr. Hervey, and came to the house in coin from certain extantulas of which Sir Thomas had a life possession. Hervey's letter avows the adultery, and assigns very strange reasons for the lady's leaving her husband, and then goes on to complain, that Sir Thomas was cutting timber on the estate which had belonged to "our wife," so he calls her, and of which the revocation was Hervey's, and begging that, if Hammer did sell any more timber, he would give him, Hervey, the refusal of it. All this is garnished and storied with mirth, and a jest, and in which case the process of sarcasms, the most indecent details, and the most serious expressions of the writer's conviction, that his conduct was not in any way gratified, and his character even slighted, and that, finally, in Heaven, Lady Hammer, in the distribution of wives (nunquam cuique), would be considered as his. This letter was, so to speak, address'd to the person of the lady in her official capacity of the present reign, he addressed a letter to King George the Second, which still more clearly explains the state of his intellect. He describes his situation as that of being in the presence of the King, and having his eye upon the throne. He represents the King, as he had been informed, as in an extraordinary state of anguish, and would, in his turn, be "infinite distress." He describes Hattie's marriage with the second wife, in 1767, referred to in the text, he, according to his custom, blazoned to the public by the folio comit lambentibus, obcessioquea. Dr. Hervey's visits from home last year, and at least as many the year before, without my leave or privity, and hath encouraged her to believe that I might come home and take her with me, that neither I am nor will be accountable for any future debts of hers whatsoever. She is now keeping forcible possession of the property which had been put into her hands by her in all my life. — Thomas Hervey. " He afterwards proceeded further, and commenced a suit against his lady for satisfaction of marriage, which finally ended in his discharge. Johnson, as we shall see hereafter (6th April, 1725), characterised his friend, Tom Hervey, as he had already done (1740), as a noble, honest, and learned man, but too probable, that both were disorder'd in mind, and that with this understanding, he should make his mind, and required a madhouse rather than a prison. — Croker.

1 Some curiosity would naturally be felt as to who the garretter was, who wrote a pamphlet, which was attributed to Sir C. H. Williams, the most celebrated wit of the day, and to answer which, the wild and sarcastic genius of Hervey required the assistance of Dr. Johnson. His name was William Hervey, but his acknowledged works are poor productions. — Croker.

2 Buckingham House in St. James's Park, built in 1708, for Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, bought in 1761, by George III. for 31,000$, and settled on Queen Charlotte in lieu of Somerset House. All their children (George IV. excepted) were born in this house. The present Buckingham Palace occupies the site. — P. Cunningham.

3 Dr. Johnson had the honour of contributing his assistance towards the publication of this satirical history, if I have read a long letter from him to Mr. Barnard, giving the most masterly instructions on the subject. I wished much to have preserved and printed it; but he had an important reason to think that his Majesty would have been graciously pleased to permit its publication; but Mr. Barnard, to whom I sent a copy, the print of which I retained, said I was more fortunate, and this letter will be found under its proper date, May 29, 1768., p. 196. — Croker.

4 The particulars of this conversation I have been at great pains to collect with the utmost authenticity, from Dr. Johnson's own detail to myself: from Mr. Langton, who was present when he gave an account of it to Dr. Joseph Warburton and several other friends at Sir Joshua Reynolds's; from Mr. Barnard; from the copy of a letter written by the late Mr. Strahan, printer to Bishop Warburton; and from a minute, the original of which is among the papers of the late Sir James Caldwell, and a copy of which was most obligingly obtained for me from his son Sir John Caldwell, by Sir Francis Lumm. To all these gentlemen I beg leave to make my most fervent acknowledgments. I have read Sir Francis Lumm, who was pleased to take a great deal of trouble, and even had the minute laid before the King by Lord Grenville, and Mr. Chesterfield, who communicated it to the King through his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, who announced to Sir Francis the royal pleasure concerning it by a letter, in which he was to the King, that he could not but oblige you, Sir, how sensitive his Majesty is of your attention in communicating the minute of the conversation previous to its publication to so many individuals, besides the two who accompanied with Mr. Boswell's wishes on the subject, you are at full liberty to deliver it to that gentleman, to make such use of it in his Life of Johnson, as you may think proper. — Boswell.

Boswell was so jealous of the copyright of his work, that he had no conversation, as well as Johnson's letter to Lord Chesterfield, printed separately, and entered at Stationers' Hall, to prevent public sale of his work, and the making a profit, and required a madhouse rather than a prison. — Croker.

Lesions in Biography," in the Appendix. — Croker.
Johnson answered, that he was indeed fond of going to Oxford sometimes; but was likewise glad to come back again. The King then asked him what they were doing at Oxford. Johnson answered, he could not much commend their diligence, but that in some respects they were mendied, for they had put their press under better regulations, and were at that time printing Polybius. He was then asked whether there were better libraries at Oxford or Cambridge. He answered, he believed the Bodleian was larger than any they had at Cambridge; at the same time adding, "I hope, whether we have more books or not than they have at Cambridge, we shall make as good use of them as they do." Being asked whether All-Souls or Christ-Church library was the largest, he answered, "All-Souls library is the largest we have, except the Bodleian."

"Ay," said the King, "that is the public library.

His Majesty inquired if he was then writing anything. He answered, he was not, for he had pretty well told the world what he knew, and must now read to acquire more knowledge. The King, as it should seem with a view to urge him to rely on his own stores as an original writer, and to continue his labours, then said, "I do not think you borrow much from any body." Johnson said, he thought he had already done part as a writer. "I should have thought so too," said the King, "if you had not written so well." Johnson observed to me, upon this, that "No man could have paid a handsomer compliment;" and it was fit for a King to pay. It was decisive. When asked by another friend, at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, whether he made any reply to this high compliment, he answered, "No, Sir. When the King had said it, it was to be so. It was not for me to bandy civilities with my Sovereign." Perhaps no man who had spent his whole life in courts could have shown a more nice and dignified sense of true politeness, than Johnson did in this instance.

His Majesty having observed to him that he supposed he must have read a great deal; Johnson answered, that he thought more than he read; that he had read a great deal in the early part of his life, but having fallen into ill health, he had not been able to read much, compared with others; for instance, he said he had not read much, compared with Dr. Warburton. Upon which the King said, that he heard Dr. Warburton was a man of such general knowledge, that you could scarce talk with him on any subject on which he was not qualified to speak; and that his learning resembled Garrick's acting, in its universality. His Majesty then talked of the controversy between Warburton and Lowth, which he seemed to have read, and asked Johnson what he thought of it. Johnson answered, "Warburton has most general, most scholastic learning; Lowth is the more correct scholar. I do not know which of them calls names best." The King was pleased to say he was of the same opinion; adding, "You do not think then, Dr. Johnson, that there was much argument in the case." Johnson said, he did not think there was. "Why truly," said the King, "when once it comes to calling names, argument is pretty well at an end."

His Majesty then asked him what he thought of Lord Lyttleton's History, which was then just published. Johnson said, he thought its style pretty good, but that he had blamed Henry the Second rather too much. "Why," said the King, "they seldom do these things by halves."—"No, Sir," answered Johnson, "not to Kings." But fearing to be misunderstood, he proceeded to explain himself; and immediately subjoined, "That for those who spoke worse of Kings than they deserved, he could find no excuse; but that he could more easily conceive how some might speak better of them than they deserved, without any ill intention; for, as Kings had much in their power to give, those who were favoured by them would frequently, from gratitude, exaggerate their praises; and as this proceeded from a good motive, it was certainly excusable, as far as error could be excusable."

The King then asked him what he thought of Dr. Hill. Johnson answered, that he was an ingenious man, but had no veracity; and 1 Johnson himself imitated it to Paol (see post, Oct. 10, 1769); and it has indeed become one of the common-places of compliment—regia ad exemplar. Hawkins has preserved a compliment of the same kind by George II., which, of a prisoner not celebrated for such things, seems worth repeating. Mr. Thornton of Yorkshire raised, at his own expense, a regiment of horse, and though newly married to a beautiful young lady, marched at the head of it with the King's army. After the rebellion, he and his wife went to court, when the king, who had noticed Mrs. Thornton, said to him, "Mr. Thornton, I have been told of your services to your country, and your attachment to my family, and have held myself obliged to you for both; but I was never able to appreciate the degree of the obligation till I had seen the lady you left behind you."—Croker.

2 The Rev. Mr. Strahan clearly recollects having been told by Johnson, that the King observed that Pope made Warburton a bishop. "True, Sir," said Johnson, "but Warburton did more for Pope; he made him a Christian; although not bold, to his face, on the "Essay on Man."—Boswell. Mr. Strahan's recollection probably deceived him. His Majesty and Dr. Johnson were both too well informed to have handed such idle talk. Warburton had published the Divine Legation, and was chaplain to the prince of Wales before he knew Pope; his acquaintance with that poet, but of four years' continuance, was ended by Pope's death in 1744. It was ten years after, that he became a King's chaplain, and, in 1755, he had a prebend in the cathedral of Durham. In 1757, he was made dean of Bristol; and, in 1760, sixteen years after Pope's death, he became bishop of Gloucester. If it was alleged, that Mr. Strahan's report refers to the supposition, that his commentary on Pope's "Essay on Man" tended to create that character which finally raised him to the bench; it may be observed, that he published, before and after that commentary, a multitude of works on polemical and religious subjects, of which the most important is the "History of the Popes," 8 vols. 8vo, 1738-1748. His Commentary on the "Essay on Man." The truth is, Warburton was made a bishop by his numerous works, and his high literary character, to which his commentary on Pope contributed a very inconsiderable part. See post, Aug. 1773. —Croker.

4 John Hill, M. D., who assumed latterly the title of Sir John, on receiving a Swedish order of Knighthood. This
His Majesty expressed a desire to have the literary biography of this country ably executed, and proposed to Dr. Johnson to undertake it. Johnson signified his readiness to comply with his Majesty's wishes.

During the whole of this interview, Johnson talked to his Majesty with profound respect, but still in his firm manly manner, with a sonorous voice, and never in that subdued tone which is commonly used at levee and in the drawing-room. After the King withdrew, Johnson showed himself highly pleased with his Majesty's conversation, and gracious behaviour. He said to Mr. Barnard, "Sir, they may talk of the King as they will; but he is the finest gentleman I have ever seen." And he afterwards observed to Mr. Langton, "Sir, his manners are those of as fine a gentleman as we may suppose Lewis the Fourteenth or Charles the Second." 24

At Sir Joshua Reynolds's, where a circle of Johnson's friends was collected round him to hear his account of this memorable conversation, Dr. Joseph Warton, in his frank and lively manner, was very active in pressing him to mention the particulars. "Come now, Sir, this is an interesting matter; do favour us with it." Johnson, with great good-humour, complied.

He told them, "I found his Majesty wished I should talk, and I made it my business to talk. I find it does a man good to be talked to by his Sovereign. In the first place, a man cannot be in a passion —" Here some question interrupted him, which is to be regretted, as he certainly would have pointed out and illustrated many circumstances of advantage, from being in a situation where the powers of the mind are at once excited to vigorous exertion, and tempered by reverential awe.

During all the time in which Dr. Johnson was employed in relating to the circle at Sir Joshua Reynolds's the particulars of what passed between the King and him, Dr. Goldsmith remained unmoved upon a sofa at some distance, affecting not to join in the least in the eager curiosity of the company. He assigned as a reason for his gloom and seeming inattention, that he apprehended Johnson had relinquished his purpose of furnishing him with a Prologue to his play, with the hopes of am delighted with the Journal des Sçavans; its characteristics are emotion, precision, and taste; but what I most admire is that impartiality and candour which distinguish the beauties and defects of a work, giving to the former due and hearty praise, and calmly and tenderly pointing out the latter." 25

"This perhaps may have given Dr. Johnson the idea of the most popular and entertaining of all his works, "The Lives of the Poets." He himself says in his advertisement, that he "was persuaded to furnish the booksellers with prefixed" but that is not inconsistent with his having been pre disposed by the royal wish. Chas. de Coeurais.

24 This reminds us of Madame de Sevigne's charming naïveté, when, after giving an account of Louis XIV. having danced with her, she adds, "Ali c'est le plus grand roi du monde!" — Chas. de Coeurais.

25 Mr. Gibbon, however, about the same time (1783) gave a different judgment: — "I can hardly express how much I

1. Here Bishop Elrington observed, Dr. Johnson was unjust to Hill, and showed that he did not understand the subject. Hill does not talk of magnifying objects by two or more microscopes, but by applying two object glasses to one microscope; and the advantage of diminished spherical errors by this contrivance is well known. Hill's account of the experiment is obscurely and inaccurately expressed in one or two particulars; but there can be no doubt that he is substantially right, and that Dr. Johnson's statement was altogether unfounded.

which he had been flattered; but it was strongly suspected that he was fretting with chagrin and envy at the singular honour Dr. Johnson had lately enjoyed. At length, the frankness and simplicity of his natural character prevailed. He sprang from the sofa, advanced to Johnson, and in a kind of flutter, from imagining himself in the situation which he had just been hearing described, exclaimed, "Well, you acquitted yourself in this conversation better than I should have done; for I should have bowed and stammered through the whole of it." He received no letter from Johnson this year; nor have I discovered any of the correspondence he had, except the two letters to Mr. Drummond, which have been inserted for the sake of connection with that to the same gentleman in 1766. His diary affords no light as to his employment at this time. He passed three months at Lichfield; and I cannot omit an affecting and solemn scene there, as related by himself:

"Sunday, Oct. 18, 1767. Yesterday, Oct. 17, at about ten in the morning, I took my leave for ever of my dear old friend, Catherine Chambers, who came to live with my mother about 1724, and has been but little parted from us since. She buried my father, my brother, and my mother. She is now fifty-eight years old.

"I desired all to withdraw, then told her that we were to part for ever; that as Christians, we should part with prayer; and that I would, if she was willing, say a short prayer beside her. She expressed great desire to hear me; and held up her poor hands, as she lay in bed, with great fervour, while I prayed, kneeling by her, nearly in the following words:

"Almighty and most merciful Father, whose loving kindness is over all thy works, behold, visit, and relieve this thy servant, who is grievous with sickness. Grant that the sense of her weakness may add strength to her faith, and seriousness to her repentance. And grant that by the help of thy Holy Spirit, after the pains and labours of this short life, we may all obtain everlasting happiness, through Jesus Christ our Lord, for whose sake hear our prayers. Amen. Our Father, &c.

"I then kissed her. She told me, that to part was the greatest pain that she had ever felt, and that she hoped we should meet again in a better place. I expressed, with swollen eyes, and great emotion of tenderness, the same hopes. We kissed, and parted. I humbly hope to meet again, and to part no more."

By those who have been taught to look upon Johnson as a man of a harsh and stern character, let this tender and affectionate scene be candidly read; and let them then judge whether more warmth of heart, and grateful kindness, is often found in human nature.

We have the following notice in his devotional record:

"August 2, 1767. I have been disturbed and unsettled for a long time, and have been without resolution to apply to study or to business, being hindered by sudden snatches.

"I have for some days forborne wine and suppers. Abstinence is not easily practised in another's house; but I think it fit to try.

"I was extremely perturbed in the night, but have had this day more ease than I expected. D[co] gr[ata]. Perhaps this may be such a sudden relief as I once had by a good night's rest in Fetter Lane.

"From that time, by abstinence, I have had more ease. I have read five books of Homer, and hope to end the sixth to-night. I have given Mrs. Desmoulins a guinea.

"By abstinence from wine and suppers, I obtained sudden and great relief, and had freedom of mind restored to me; which I have wanted for all this year, without being able to find any means of obtaining it."

He, however, furnished Mr. Adams with a Dedication * to the King of that ingenious gentleman's "Treatise on the Globes," conceived and expressed in such a manner as could not fail to be very grateful to a monarch, distinguished for his love of the sciences.

This year was published a ridicule of his

1 It is remarkable that Johnson should have seen four, if not five, of our sovereigns, and been in the actual presence of three if not four of them. Queen Anne knighted him; George the First he probably never saw; but George the Second he must frequently have seen, though only in public. George the Third convinced him on this occasion, and he once told Sir John Hawkins, that, in a visit to Mrs. Percy, who was under care of one of the young princes, at the Queen's house, the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., being a child, came into the room, and began to play about; when Johnson, with his usual curiosity, took an opportunity of asking him what books he was reading, and, in particular, inquired as to his knowledge of the Scriptures; the Prince, in his answers, gave him great satisfaction. It is possible, also, that at that visit he might have seen Prince William Henry (William IV.), who was, I think, as well as the Duke of Gloucester, under Mrs. Percy's care. — CROKER.

2 It is proper here to mention, that when I speak of his correspondence, I consider it independent of the voluminous collection of letters which, in the course of many years, he wrote to Mrs. Thrale, which forms a separate part of his works; and, as a proof of the high estimation set on them, which came from his pen, was sold by that lady for the sum of five hundred pounds. — Boswell. In my former edition I had extracted largely from those letters to fill up the lacune (such as this) in Mr. Boswell's narrative, but the restricted plan of this edition obliges me to limit myself to such extracts as are essential to carry on the Life of Johnson. — CROKER.

3 In his letter to Mr. Drummond, dated Oct. 24, 1767, he mentions that he had arrived in London, after an absence of nearly six months in the country. Probably part of that time was spent at Oxford. — Malone. He appears to have been more than three months in Lichfield. Writing to Mr. Thrale, 20th July, 1767, he says that he had already been away "much longer than he proposed or expected." And it appears that he remained there till the 15th October. It is probable that he was on a visit to Miss Porter, for he adds, "Miss Lucy is more kind and civil than I expected, and raised my esteem by many excellencies very noble and resplendent, though a little discoloured by hoary virginity." — CROKER.

4 The greater part of this prayer is, as Bishop Elrington observed to me, in the Visitation of the Sick in our Liturgy, where, therefore, there is no help to prayer for all occasions may be found. — CROKER.

style, under the title of "Lexiphanes." Sir John Hawkins ascribes it to Dr. Kenrick; but its author was one Campbell, a Scotch purser in the navy. The ridicule consisted in applying Johnson's "words of large meaning" to insignificant matters, as if one should put the armour of Goliath upon a dwarf. The contrast might be laughable; but the dignity of the armour must remain the same in all considerate minds. This malicious drollery, therefore, it may easily be supposed, could do no harm to its illustrious object.

JOHN TO LANGTON,
At Mr. Roothwell's, Perfumer, in New Bond Street.

"Lichfield, Oct. 10. 1767.

"Dear Sir,— That you have been all summer in London is one more reason for which I regret my long stay in the country, I hope that you will not leave the town before my return. We have here only the chance of vacancies in the passing carriages, and I have bespoken one that may, if it happens, bring me to town on the fourteenth of this month; but this is not certain.

"It will be a favour if you communicate this to Mrs. Williams: I long to see all my friends. I am, dear Sir, your most humble servant,

S. JOHNSON."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. ASTON.]

"Nov. 17. 1767.

"Madam,— If you impute it to disrespect or inattention, that I took no leave when I left Lichfield, you will do me great injustice. I know you too well not to value your friendship.

"When I came to Oxford I inquired after the product of our walnut-tree, but it had, like other trees this year, but very few nuts, and for those few it came too late. 'The trees, as I told you, madam, we cannot find to be more than thirty years old, and, upon measuring it, I found it, at about one foot from the ground, seven feet in circumference, and at the height of about seven feet, the circumference is five feet and a half; it would have been, I believe, still bigger, but that it has been lopped. The nuts are small, such as they call single nuts; whether this nut is of quicker growth than better I have not yet inquired; such as they are, I hope to send them next year.

1 It may have been malicious, but it certainly is not dull. It is so overcharged, as to have neither resemblance nor pleasantness. Hawkins, in his second edition, (published long before Boswell) had corrected his error, and attributed it to Campbell. — Croker. Archibald Campbell, son of Professor Archibald Campbell, of St. Andrew's, was also author of 'The Sale of Authors; a Dialogue, in imitation of Lucian.' — Anderson.

2 We have just seen that he was detained till the 18th.

3 Mr. Asthon, one of the younger daughters of Sir Thomas Aston: see ante, p. 20, n. 4. Some letters of Johnson to Mrs. Asthon, communicated to me after that note was first printed, are in a uniform spirit of tenderness and respect, and, even if of no other value, afford additional proof of the inaccuracy of Miss Seward. A bundle of her letters were destroyed by Johnson just before his death, with a strong expression of regard and regret for the writer. — Croker.

4 It appears that he visited, with the Thrales, (though Mr. Boswell never mentions it,) Mr. Brooke of Town-malling, of whose primitive house and manners we find some account in the Letters.

"You know, dear Madam, the liberty I took of hinting, that I did not think your present mode of life very pregnant with happiness. Reflection has not yet changed my opinion. Solitude excludes pleasure, and does not always secure peace. Some communication of sentiments is commonly necessary to give vent to the imagination, and discharge the mind of its own flatulencies. Some lady surely might be found, in whose conversation you might delight, and in whose fidelity you might repose. The World, says Locke, has people of all sorts. You will forgive me this obtrusion of my opinion; I am sure I wish you well."

"Poor Kitty has done what we have all to do, and Lucy has the world to begin anew: I hope she will find some way to more content than I left her possessing.

"Be pleased to make my compliments to Mrs. Hinekley and Miss Turton. I am, Madam, your most obliged and most humble servant, — Parker MSS. — "Sam. Johnson.""

1768.

State of Johnson's Mind.—Visit to Town-Malling.

It appears from his notes of the state of his mind, that he suffered great perturbation and distraction in 1768.

"Town-Malling, in Kent, 18th Sept. 1768, at night. — I have now begun the sixtieth year of my life. — Dr. Johnson to Mrs. Thrale, 3rd August, 1777. — It was very well done by Mr. Brooke to send for you. His house is one of my favourite places. His water is very commodious, and the whole place has the true old appearance of a little country town."

"Mrs. Thrale to Dr. Johnson, 13th September, 1777. — Come, here is news of Town-Malling, the quiet old-fashioned place in Kent, that you liked so, because it was agreeable to your own notions of a rural life. I believe we were the first people, except the master of it, who had, for many years, taken delight in the old coach without springs, the two rosted ducks in one dish, the fortiert flower-garden, and fir-trees cut in figures. A spirit of innovation has however reached even there at last. The roads are mended; no more narrow shaded lanes, but clear open turnpike trotting. A few hedge, or an eugh hedge if you will, newly cut down too by his nephew's desire. Ah! those nephews. And a wall pulled away, which bore incomparable fruit — to call it the country is the phrase. Mr. Thrale is wicked enough to urge on these rough reformers: how it will end I know not. For your comfort, the square canals still drop into one another, and the chocolate is still made in the kitchen.

"Dr. Johnson to Mrs. Thrale, 23d August, 1777. — It was very well done by Mr. Brooke to send for you. His house is one of my favourite places. His water is very commodious, and the whole place has the true old appearance of a little country town."
life. How the last year has past, I am unwilling to terrify myself with thinking. This day has been past in great perturbation: I was distracted at church in an uncommon degree, and my distress has had very little intermission. I have found myself somewhat relieved by reading, which I therefore plunged to temporary when I am able. This day it came into my mind to write the history of my melancholy. On this I purpose to deliberate; I know not whether it may not too much disturb me."

Nothing of his writings was given to the public this year, except the Prologue* to his friend Goldsmith's comedy of "The Good-natured Man." The first lines of this Prologue are strongly characteristic of the dismal gloom of his mind; which in his case, as in the case of all who are distressed with the same malady of imagination, transfers to others its own feelings. Who could suppose it was to introduce a comedy, when Mr. Bensley solemnly began,

"Press'd with the load of life, the weary mind Surveys the general toil of human kind."

But this dark ground might make Goldsmith's humour shine the more."

In the spring of this year, having published my "Account of Corsica," with the Journal of a Tour to that Island," I returned to London, very desirous to see Dr. Johnson, and hear him upon the subject. I found he was at Oxford, with his friend Mr. Chambers, who was now Vinerian Professor, and lived in New-Inn Hall. Having had no letter from him since that in which he criticised the Latinity of my Thesis, and having been told by somebody that he was offended at my having put into my book an extract of his letter to me at Paris, I was impatient to be with him, and therefore followed him to Oxford, where I was entertained by Mr. Chambers, with a civility which I shall ever gratefully remember. I found that Dr. Johnson had sent a letter to me to Scotland, and that I had nothing to complain of but his being more indifferent to my anxiety than I wished him to be. Instead of giving, room by a maid, who curtsies as she presents every cup. Dear old Daddy Brooke looks well, and even handsome, at eighty-one years old; while I saw his sister, who is ninety-four years old and calls him Frances, eat more venison at a sitting than Mr. Thrale. These are the proper contemplations of this season. May my daughter and my friend but enjoy life as long, and use it as innocently as these sweet people have done. The sight of such a family consoles one's heart."—Croker.

1 In this prologue, after the line—"And social sorrow loses half its pain," the following couplet was inserted:

"Amidst the toils of this returning year,
When senators and nobles long to fear.
Our little bard without complaint may share
The bustling season's epidemic care."—Croker.

So the prologue appeared in the Public Advertiser. Goldsmith probably thought that the lines printed in Italic characters might give offence, and therefore prevailed on Johnson to omit them. The epithet little, which perhaps the author thought might diminish his dignity, was also changed. —Macray. Goldsmith was low in stature, a circumstance often alluded to by his contemporaries. —Croker.

2 "Mr. Boswell's book I was going to recommend to you when I received your letter: it has pleased and moved me strangely, all (I mean) that relates to Paoli. He is a man born two thousand years after his time! The pamphlet proves what I have always maintained, that any fool may write a most valuable book by chance, if he will only tell us what he heard and saw with veracity. Of Mr. Boswell's truth I have not the least suspicion, because I am sure he could invent nothing of this kind. The true title of this part of his work is, a Dialogue between a Green-Goose and a Hero. Gray to Horace Walpole, Feb. 29, 1784. —Croker, 1836.

3 See post, Aug. 19, 1773, where Johnson has supported the same argument. —J. Boswell, jun.

Cicero touches this question more than once, but never with much confidence. "Atqui eodem hoc preceptum officiarii diligentiae tenendum est, ne quam uisum innocemiu judicis praebatur spinis aridarum, sine quibus sedet iusticia vel sancta, sine qua nihil pacto petes. Nec tamen, ut hoc fugiendum est, ita habendum est religiosi, noviscat aliquando, modo ne furiam impune, desideriis quasi onera suae aequali, sed feri eos humanitas. Judicis est semper in causa sequi, patroni nonnamquam versiltem, etiam minus sit verum, sed eadem consilia et actiones, quae unam esse, sive unam esse, a lass conditional and apologetical defence of his own profession from the great philosophical orator. —Croker.
Talking of some of the modern plays, he said, "False Delicacy" was totally void of character. He praised Goldsmith's "Good-natured Man;" and said it was the best comedy that had appeared since "The Provoked Husband," and that there had not been of late any such character exhibited on the stage as that of Croker. I observed it was the Suspirius of his Rambler [No. 59]. He said, Goldsmith had owned he had borrowed it from thence. "Sir," continued he, "there is all the difference in the world between characters of nature and characters of manners; and there is the difference between the characters of Fielding and those of Richardson. Characters of manners are very entertaining; but they are to be understood, by a more superficial observer than characters of nature, where a man must dive into the recesses of the human heart."

It always appeared to me, that he estimated the compositions of Richardson too highly, and that he had an unreasonable prejudice against Fielding. In comparing those two writers, he used this expression; "that there was as great a difference between them, as between a man who knew how a watch was made, and a man who could tell the hour by looking on the dial-plate." This was a shallow and figurative state of his distinction between drawing characters of nature and characters only of manners. But I cannot help being of opinion, that the next watches of Fielding are as well constructed as the large clocks of Richardson, and that his dial-plates are brighter. Fielding's characters, though they do not expand themselves so widely in dissertation, are as just pictures of human nature, and I will venture to say, have more striking features, and nicer touches of the pencil; and, though Johnson used to quote with approbation a saying of Richardson's, "that the virtues of Fielding's heroes were the vices of a truly good man," I will venture to add, that the moral tendency of Fielding's writings, though it does not encourage a strained and rarely possible virtue, is ever favourable to honour and honesty, and cherishes the benevolent and generous affections. He who is good as Fielding would make him, is an amiable member of society, and may be led on by more regulated instructors, to a higher state of ethical perfection.

Johnson proceeded: "Even Sir Francis Wronghead is a character of manners, though drawn with great humour." He then repeated, very happily, all Sir Francis's erudite account to Manly of his being with "the great man," and securing a place. I asked him, if "The Suspicious Husband" did not furnish a well-drawn character, that of Ranger. Johnson: "No, Sir; Ranger is just a rake, a mere rake, and a lively young fellow, but no character.

The great Douglas Cause was at this time a very general subject of discussion. I found he had not studied it with much attention, but had only heard parts of it occasionally. He, however, talked of it, and said, "I am of opinion that positive proof of fraud should not be required of the plaintiff, but that the Judges should decide according as probability shall appear to preponderate, granting to the defendant the presumption of filtration to be strong in his favour. And I think too, that a good deal of weight should be allowed to the dying declarations, because they were spontaneous. There is a great difference between what is said without our being urged to it, and what is said from a kind of compulsion. If I praise a man's book without being asked my opinion of it, that is honest praise, to which one may trust. But if an author asks me if I like his book, and I give him something like praise, it must not be taken as my real opinion."

"I have not been troubled for a long time with authors desiring my opinion of their works. I used once to be sadly plagued with a man who wrote verses, but who literally had no other notion of a verse, but that it consisted of ten syllables. Lay your knife and your fork across your plate, was to him a verse:—

'Lay your knife and your fork across your plate.'

As he wrote a great number of verses, he sometimes by chance made good ones, though he did not know it."

He renewed his promise of coming to Scot-

3 "Johnson," says Hawking, "was inclined, as being personally acquainted with Richardson, to favour the opinion of his admirers; but he seemed not firm in it, and could at any time be talked into a disapprobation of all fictitious relations, of which he would frequently say, they took no hold of the mind." — Croker.
4 In the Provoked Husband, begun by Sir John Vanbrugh, and finished by Colley Cibber. — Wright.
5 By Dr. Benjamin Haulth. Garrick's immortal performance of Pantaloon was an act of great support of the piece, during its first run. George II. was so well pleased with this comedy, that he sent the author one hundred pounds — Hints. This main support of the piece, however, was given as a reason of George the Second's favour, that one of the causes of suspicion against the innocent heroine (the finding Ranger's hat) was the same with one of those alleged against his mother, the Electress Dorothea — the hat of Count Konigsmeik (the same who caused the murder of Mr. Thynne) having been found in her apartment. — Croker.

6 Boswell, who was counsel on the side of Mr. Douglas, had published, in 1766, a pamphlet entitled the "Essence of the Douglas Cause," but which, it will be seen, post, April 27. 1773, he could not induce Johnson even to read. — Leather.
7 "Dr. Johnson did not like that his friends should bring their manuscripts for him to read, and he liked still less to read them when they were brought; sometimes, however, when he could not refuse, he would take the play or poem, or whatever it was, and give the people his opinion from the one who brought it; if he had peeped into a gentleman carried him his tragedy, which, because he loved the author, Johnson took, and it lay about our rooms at Streatham some time. 'What answer did you give your friend, Sir?' asked I, after the hook had been called for. 'I told him,' replied he, 'that there was too much Tit and Terry in it.' Seeing me laugh most violently, 'Why, what would you, child?' said he; 'I looked at nothing but the dramatis personas, and Lichfield, but had grown very weary before he left it. Boswell. "I wonder at that, Sir; it is your native place." Johnson. "Why so is Scotland your native place."

His prejudice against Scotland appeared remarkably strong at this time. 2 When I talked of our advancement in literature, "Sir," said he, "you have learnt a little from us, and you think yourselves very great men. Hume would never have written history, had not Voltaire written it before him. He is an echo of Voltaire." Boswell. "But, Sir, we have lord Kames." Johnson. "You have lord Kames. Keep him; ha, ha, ha! We don't envy you him. Do you ever see Dr. Robertson?" Boswell. "Yes, Sir." Johnson. "Does the dog talk of me?" Boswell. "Indeed, Sir, he does, and loves you." Thinking that I now had him in a corner, and being solicitous for the literary fame of my country, I pressed him for his opinion on the merit of Dr. Robertson's History of Scotland. But to my surprise, he escaped. "Sir, I love Robertson, and I won't talk of his book."

It is by his advice; and a book to him, Dr. Robertson to add, that though he indulged himself in this sally of wit, he had too good taste not to be fully sensible of the merits of that admirable work. 3

An essay, written by Mr. Dean, a divine of the Church of England, maintaining the future life of brutes 4, by an explication of certain parts of the Scriptures, was mentioned, and the doctrine insisted on by a gentleman who seemed fond of curious speculation; Johnson, who did not like to hear of any thing concerning a future state which was not authorised by the regular canons of orthodoxy, discongrued this talk; and being offended at its continuation, he watched an opportunity to give the gentleman a blow of reprehension. So, when the poor speculator, with a serious metaphysical pensive face, addressed him, "But really, Sir, when we see a very sensible dog, we don't know what to think of him?" Johnson, rolling with joy at the thought which beam'd in his eye, turned quickly round, and replied, "True, Sir; and when we see a very foolish fellow, we don't know what to think of him." He then rose up, stri'd to the fire, and stood for some time laughing and exulting.

I told him that I had several times, when in Italy, seen the experiment of placing a scorpion within a circle of burning coals; that it ran

2. Johnson's invectives against Scotland, in common conversation, were more in pleasantry and sport than real and malignant; for no man was more visited by natives of that country, nor were there any for whom he had a greater esteem. It was to Dr. Grainger, a Scottish physician, that I owed my first acquaintance with Johnson, in 1756. — Percey. They were something more than sport. — Croker.

3. It is to be regretted that Mr. Boswell should have persisted in repeating these assertions. Dr. Johnson, on *every occasion, seems to have expressed a great contempt for Dr. Robertson's works — very unjustly indeed; but, however Mr. Boswell might lament Johnson's prejudice, he was not unjustified in thus repeatedly misstating the fact. See ante, p. 170., note, and 19th April, 1772, where Boswell suppressed, and 30th April, 1773, where he again misrepresented Johnson's opinions of Dr. Robertson. — Croker.

4. An Essay on the Future Life of Brute Creatures, by Richard Dean, curate of Middleton." This work is reviewed in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1768, p. 177., in a style very like Johnson's, and the "story of a very sensible dog" is noticed with censure. So that it may probably have been Johnson's. — Croker.
round and round in extreme pain; and finding no way to escape, retired to the centre, and, like a true Stoic philosopher, darted its sting into its head, and thus at once freed itself from its woes. “This must end ‘em.” I said, this was a curious fact, as it showed deliberate suicide in a reptile. Johnson would not admit the fact. He said, Maupertuis was of opinion that it does not kill itself, but dies of the heat; that it gets to the centre of the circle, as the coolest place; that its turning its tail in upon its head is merely a convulsion, and that it does not sting itself. He said he would be satisfied if the great anatomist Morgagni, after dissecting a scorpion on which the experiment had been tried, should certify that its sting had penetrated into its head.

He seemed pleased to talk of natural philosophy. “That woodcocks,” said he, “fly over the northern countries, proved, because they have been observed at sea. Swallows certainly sleep all the winter. A number of them conglominate together, by flying round and round, and then all in a heap throw themselves under water, and lie in the bed of a river.”

He told us, one of his first essays was a Latin poem upon the glow-worm; I am sorry I did not ask where it was to be found.

Talking of the Russians and the Chinese, he advised me to read Bell’s Travels. I asked him whether I should read Du Halde’s Account of China. “Why yes,” said he, “as one reads such a book; that is to say, consult it.”

He talked of the heinousness of the crime of adultery, by which the peace of families was destroyed. He said, “Confusion of progeny constitutes the essence of the crime; and therefore a woman who breaks her marriage vows is much more criminal than a man who does it. A man, to be sure, is criminal in the sight of God; but he does not do his wife a very material injury, if he does not insult her; if, for instance, from mere wantonness of appetite, he steals privately to her chambermaid. Sir, a wife ought not greatly to resent this. I would not receive home a daughter who had run away from her husband on that account. A wife should study to reclaim her husband by more attention to please him. Sir, a man will not, once in a hundred instances, leave his wife and go to a harlot, if his wife has not been negligent of pleasing.”

Here he discovered that acute discrimination, that solid judgment, and that knowledge of human nature, for which he was upon all occasions remarkable. Taking care to keep in view the moral and religious duty, as understood in our nation, he showed clearly, from reason and good sense, the greater degree of culpability in the one sex deviating from it than the other; and, at the same time, inculcated a very useful lesson as to the way to keep him.

I asked him if it was not hard that one deviation from chastity should so absolutely ruin a young woman. “Why no, Sir; it is the great principle which she is taught. When she has given up that principle, she has given up every notion of female honour and virtue, which are all included in chastity.”

A gentleman talked to him of a lady whom he greatly admired and wished to marry, but was afraid of her superiority of talents. “Sir,” said he, “you need not be afraid; marry her. Before a year goes about, you’ll find that reason much weaker, and that wit not so bright.” Yet the gentleman may be justified in his apprehension by one of Dr. Johnson’s admirable sentences in his Life of Waller: “He doubtless praised many whom he would have been afraid to marry; and, perhaps, married one whom he would have been ashamed to praise. Many qualities contribute to domestic happiness, upon which poetry has no colours to bestow; and many airs and sallies may delight imagination, which he flatters them never to approve.”

He praised Signor Baretto. “His account of Italy is a very entertaining book; and, Sir, I know no man who carries his head higher in conversation than Baretto. There are strong powers in his mind. He has not, indeed, many books; but with what books he has, he grapples very forcibly.”

At this time I observed upon the dial-plate of his watch a short Greek inscription, taken from the New Testament, Νενεχθείς επηχρισα, being the first words of our Saviour’s solemn

Mr. Boswell seems to contemplate the possibility of a post mortem conversion to Christianity. — Croker.

1 Should think it impossible not to wonder at the variety of Johnson’s reading, however desultory it might have been. Who could have imagined that the High Church of England would be so prompt in quoting Maupertuis, who, I am sorry to think, stands in the list of those unfortunate mistaken men, who call themselves epitaphs FORTI. I have, however, a high respect for that philosopher, whom the great Frederick of Prussia loved and honoured, and addressed pathetically in one of his poems,

“Maupertuis, cher Maupertuis, Que votre vie est pen de chose.”

There was in Maupertuis a vigour and yet a tenderness of sentiment, united with strong intellectual power, and an uncommon ardour of soul. Would he had been a Christian I cannot help earnestly venturing to hope that he is one now. — Boswell. 6 John Hinchcliffe. Mr. Boswell calls them the first words: on the contrary, they are expletive of the former part of the admonition. Hawkins says that this watch (made for Johnson by Mudge and Dutton in 1760) was the first he ever possessed; but he adds that the Greek inscription was made intelligible by the mistake of inscribing µαν for µαν. This Mr. Croker denied; and he certainly bequeathed to his niece a watch bearing, as I am informed, the correct inscription: but from the evidence of Hawkins, one of Johnson’s executors, and from the knowledgment of Stevens to what is lacently called mystification, I conclude that... admiration to the improvement of that time which is allowed us to prepare for eternity;

"the night cometh when no man can work." He some time afterwards laid aside this dial-plate; and when I asked him the reason, he said, "It might do very well upon a clock which a man keeps in his closet; but to have it upon his watch, which he carries about with him, and which is often looked at by others, might be censured as ostentations." Mr. Steevens is now possessed of the dial-plate inscribed as above.

He remained at Oxford a considerable time. I was obliged to go to London, where I received this letter, which had been returned from Scotland.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"My dear Boswell,—I have omitted a long time to write to you, without knowing very well why. I could now tell why I should not write; for who would write to men who publish the letters of their friends, without their leave? Yet I write to you in spite of my caution, to tell you that I shall be glad to see you, and that I wish you would empty your head of Corsica, which I think has filled it rather too long. But, at all events, I shall be glad, very glad, to see you. I am, Sir, yours affectionately,

SAM. JOHNSON."

I answered him thus: —

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"London, April 20. 1768.

"My dear Sir,—I have received your last letter, which, though very short, and by no means complimentary, yet gave me real pleasure, because it contains these words, 'I shall be glad, very glad, to see you.'—Surely you have no reason to complain of my publishing a single paragraph of one of your letters; the temptation to it was so strong. An irrevocable grant of your friendship, and your signifying my desire of visiting Corsica with the epithet of 'a wise and noble curiosity,' are to me more valuable than many of the grants of kings.

"But how can you bid me 'empty my head of Corsica?' My noble-minded friend, do you not feel for an oppressed nation bravely struggling to be free? Consider fairly what is the case. The Corsicans never received any kindness from the Genevese. They never agreed to be subject to them. They owe them nothing, and when reduced to an abject state of slavery, by force, shall they not rise in the great cause of liberty, and break the galling yoke? And shall not every liberal soul be warm for them? Empty my head of Corsica! Empty it of honour, empty it of humanity, empty it of friendship, empty it of piety. No! while I live, Corsica, and the cause of the brave islanders, shall ever employ much of my attention, shall ever interest me in the sincerest manner.

"JAMES BOSWELL."

JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.

"Oxford, April 18. 1769.

"My dear, dear Love,—You have had a very great loss. To lose an old friend, is to be cut off from a great part of the little pleasure that this life allows. But such is the condition of our nature, that as we live on we must see those whom we love drop successively, and find our circle of relations grow less and less, till we are almost unconnected with the world; and then it must soon be our turn to drop into the grave. There is always this consolation, that we have one Protector who can never be lost but by our own fault, and every new experience of the uncertainty of all other comforts should determine us to fix our hearts where true joys are to be found. All union with the inhabitants of earth must in time be broken; and all the hopes that terminate here, must on [one] part or other end in disappointment.

"I am glad that Mrs. Adey and Mrs. Cobb do not leave you alone. Pay my respects to them, and the Searows, and all my friends. When Mr. Porter comes, he will direct you. Let me know of his arrival, and I will write to him.

"When I go back to London, I will take care of your reading-glass. Whenever I can do any thing for you, remember, my dear darling, that one of my greatest pleasures is to please you.

"The punctuality of your correspondence I consider as a proof of great regard. When we shall see each other, I know not, but let us often think on each other, and think with tendereness. Do not forget me in your prayers. I have for a long time been very poorly; but of what use is it to complain? Write often, for your letters always give great pleasure to my dear, your most affectionate and most humble servant.

"—Malone.

"SAM. JOHNSON.]"

Upon his arrival in London in May, he surprised me one morning with a visit at my lodging in Halfmoon Street, was quite satisfied with my explanation, and was in the kindest and most agreeable frame of mind. As he had objected to a part of one of his letters being published, I thought it right to take this opportunity of asking him explicitly whether it would be improper to publish his letters after his death. His answer was, "Nay, Sir, when I am dead, you may do as you will."
He talked in his usual style with a rough contempt of popular liberty. "They make a rout about universal liberty, without considering that all that is to be valued, or indeed can be enjoyed by individuals, is private liberty. Political liberty is good only so far as it produces private liberty. Now, Sir, there is the liberty of the press, which you know is a constant topic. Suppose you and I and two hundred more were restrained from printing our thoughts: what then? What proportion would that restraint upon us bear to the private happiness of the nation?"

This mode of representing the inconveniences of restraint as light and insignificant, was a kind of sophistry in which he delighted to indulge himself, in opposition to the extreme laxity for which it has been fashionable for too many to argue, when it is evident, upon reflection, that the very essence of government is restraint; and certain it is, that as government produces rational happiness, too much restraint is better than too little. But when restraint is unnecessary, and so close as to gall those who are subject to it, the people may and ought to resist; and, if relief is not granted, to resist. Of this manly and spirited principle, no man was more convinced than Johnson himself.

About this time Dr. Kenrick attacked him, through his sides, in a pamphlet, entitled "An Epistle to James Boswell, Esq.," occasioned by his having transmitted the moral Writings of Dr. Samuel Johnson to Pascal Paoli, General of the Corsicans." I was at first inclined to answer this pamphlet; but Johnson, who knew that my doing so would only gratify Kenrick, by keeping alive what would soon die away of itself, would not suffer me to take any notice of it.

His sincere regard for Francis Barber, his faithful negro servant, made him so desirous of his further improvement, that he now placed him at a school at Bishop Stortford, in Hertfordshire. This humane attention does Johnson's heart much honour. Out of many letters which Mr. Barber received from his master, he has preserved three, which he kindly gave me, and which I shall insert according to their dates.

JOHNSON TO FRANCIS BARBER.
"May 28, 1768.

"Dear Fr.,—I have been very much out of order. I am glad to hear that you are well, and design to return to you. I would stay at Mrs. Clapp's for the present, till I can determine what we shall do. Be a good boy. My compliments to Mrs. Clapp and to Mr. Fowler. I am yours affectionately, Sir. Johnson."

Soon afterwards, he supped at the Crown and Anchor tavern, in the Strand, with a company whom I collected to meet him. They were, Dr. Percy now Bishop of Dromore, Dr. Douglas now Bishop of Salisbury, Mr. Langton, Dr. Robertson the Historian, Dr. Hugh Blair, and Mr. Thomas Davies, who wished much to be introduced to these eminent Scotch literati; but on the present occasion he had very little opportunity of hearing them talk; for, with an excess of prudence, for which Johnson afterwards found fault with them, they hardly opened their lips, and that only to say something which they were certain would not expose them to the sword of Goliath; such was their anxiety for their fame when in the presence of Johnson. He was this evening in remarkable vigour of mind, and eager to exert himself in conversation, which he did with great readiness and fluency; but I am sorry to find that I have preserved but a small part of what passed.

He allowed high praise to Thomson as a poet; but when one of the company said he was also a very good man, our moralist contested this with great warmth, accusing him of gross sensuality and licentiousness of manners. I was very much afraid that, in writing Thomson's life, Dr. Johnson would have treated his private character with a stern severity, but I was agreably disappointed; and I may claim a little merit in it, from my having been at pains to send him authentic accounts of the affectation and generous conduct of that poet to his sisters, one of whom, the wife of Mr. Thomson, schoolmaster at Lanark, I knew, and was presented by her with three of his letters, one of which Dr. Johnson has inserted in his life.

He was vehement against old Dr. Mounsey, of Chelsea College, as "a fellow who swore and talked indecently." 4 "I have been often in his

1 See post, p. 599, n. 1.—C.
2 Hawkins says, Johnson's silence proceeded not more from his contempt of such an adversary, than from a settled resolution he had formed, of declining all controversy in defence either of himself or of his writings. Against personal abuse he was ever ardent, by a reflection that I have heard him utter:—"Alas! reputation would be of little worth, were it in the power of every concealed enemy to deprive us of it;" and he defined all attacks on his writings by an answer of Dr. Bentley to one who threatened to write him down; that "no author was ever written down but by himself."—Clapp.
3 The sending his negro servant, at least five and twenty years old, to a boarding-school, seems a strange exercise of Johnson's good nature. It was very unpoplar with his other inmates. When Mrs. Williams and Francis quar- relled, as was very frequent, the lady would complain to the doctor, adding, "This is your scholar, on whose education you have spent 300l. Dr. Johnson, in the conclusion of the letter, calls him a "boy," but sixteen years had already elapsed since he entered Johnson's own service. —Croker.
4 A common word used in the original. Messenger Mounsey, M.D., died at his apartments in Chelsea College, Dec. 25, 1768, at the age of ninety-five. An extraordinary direction in his will may be found in the "Gentleman's Magazine," vol. 80, p. ii. p. 1188. —Malone. The direction was, that his body should not suffer any funeral ceremony, but be disinterred, and the operation, be thrown into the Thames, or where the surgeon pleased. It is surprising that this coarse and crazy humorist should have been an intimate friend and favourite of the elegant and pious Mrs. Montagu. —Croker. In the following company," said Dr. Percy, "and never heard him swear or talk indecently." Mr. Davies, who sat next to Dr. Percy, having after this had some conversation aside with him, made a discovery which, in his zeal to pay court to Dr. Johnson, he eagerly proclaimed aloud from the foot of the table: "Oh, Sir, I have found out a very good reason why Dr. Percy never heard Mounsey swear or talk indecently; for he tells me he never saw him but at the Duke of Northumberland's table. "And so, Sir," said Dr. Johnson loudly to Dr. Percy, "you would shield this man from the charge of swearing and talking indecently, because he did not do so at the Duke of Northumberland's table. Sir, you might as well tell us that you had seen him hold up his hand at the Old Bailey, and he neither swore nor talked indecently; or that you had seen him in the cart at Tyburn, and he neither swore nor talked indecently. And is it thus, Sir, that you presume to controvert what I have related?" Dr. Johnson's animadversion was uttered in such a manner, that Dr. Percy seemed to be displeased, and some altercation took place between the two, to which Johnson did not at that time take any notice.

Swift having been mentioned, Johnson, as usual, treated him with little respect as an author. Some of us endeavoured to support the Dean of St. Patrick's, by various arguments. One, in particular, praised his Conduct of the Allies. Johnson. "Sir, his Conduct of the Allies is a performance of very little ability." "Surely, Sir," said Dr. Douglas, "you must allow it has strong facts." Johnson. "Why yes, Sir; but what is that to the merit of the composition? In the Sessions-paper of the Old Bailey there are strong facts. House-breaking is a strong fact; robbery is a strong fact; and murder is a mighty strong fact: but is great praise due to the historian of those strong facts? No, Sir, Swift has told what he had to tell distinctly enough, but that is all. He had to count ten, and he has counted it right." Then recollecting that Mr. Davies, by acting as an informer, had been the occasion of his talking somewhat too harshly to his friend Dr. Percy, for which, probably, when the first ebullition was over, he felt some compunction, he took an opportunity to give him a hint: so added, with a preparatory laugh, "Why, Sir, Tom Davies might have written 'The Conduct of the Allies.' Poor Tom, being thus suddenly dragged into ludicrous notice in presence of the Scottish doctors, to whom he was ambitious of appearing to advantage, was grievously mortified. Nor did his punishment rest here; for upon subsequent occasions, whenever he, "statesman all over," assumed a strutting importance, I used to hail him — "the Author of the Conduct of the Allies.

When I called upon Dr. Johnson next morning, I found him highly satisfied with his colloquial prowess the preceding evening. "Well," said he, "we had good talk." Boswell. "Yes, Sir; you tossed and gored several persons.

The late Alexander Earl of Eglintoun and Eglintoune, who loved wit more than wine, and men of genius more than sycophants, had a great admiration of Johnson; but, from the remarkable elegance of his own manner, was, perhaps, too delicately sensible of the roughness which sometimes appeared in Johnson's behaviour. One evening about this time, when his lordship did me the honour to sup at my lodgings with Dr. Robertson and several other men of literary distinction, he regretted that Johnson had not been educated with more refinement, and lived more in polished society. "No, no, my lord," said Signor Baretti, "do with him what you would, he would always have been a bear." "True," answered the earl, with a smile, "but he would have been a dancing bear." To obviate all the reflections which have gone round the world to Johnson's prejudice, by applying to him the epithet of a bear, let me impress upon my readers a just and happy saying of my friend Goldsmith, who knew him well: — "Johnson, to be sure, has a roughness in his manner; but no man alive has a more tender heart. He has nothing of the bear but his skin."
[JOHNSON TO MR. BARNARD.]

"May 28, 1768.

"Sir, — It is natural for a scholar to interest himself in an expedition, undertaken, like yours, for the importation of literature; and therefore, though, having never travelled myself, I am very little qualified to give advice to a traveller; yet, that I may not seem inattentive to a design so worthy of regard, I will try whether the present state of my health will suffer me to lay before you what observation or report have suggested to me, that may direct your inquiries, or facilitate your success. Things of which the mere rarity makes the value, and which are prized at a high rate by a wantonness rather than by use, are always passing from poorer to richer countries; and therefore, though Germany and Italy were principally productive of typographical curiosities, I do not much imagine that they are now to be found there in great abundance. An eagerness for scarce books and early editions, which prevailed among the English about half a century ago, filled our shops with all the splendour and nicety of literature; and when the Harleian Catalogue was published, many of the books were bought for the library of the King of France.

"I believe, however, that by the diligence with which you have enlarged the library under your care, the present stock is so nearly exhausted, that, till new purchases supply the booksellers with new stores, you will not be able to do much more than glean up single books, as accident shall produce them; this, therefore, is the time for visiting the continent.

"What addition you can hope to make by ransacking other countries we will now consider. English literature you will not seek in any place but in England. Classical learning is diffused every where, and is not, except by accident, more copious in one part of the polite world than in another. But every country has literature of its own, which may be best gathered in its native soil. The studies of the learned are influenced by forms of government and modes of religion; and therefore, those books are necessary and common in some places, which, where different opinions or different manners prevail, are of little use; and for that reason rarely to be found.

"Thus in Italy you may expect to meet with canonists and scholastic divines, in Germany with writers on the feudal laws, and in Holland with civilians. The schoolmen and canonists must not be neglected, for they are useful to many purposes; nor too anxiously sought, for their influence among us is much lessened by the Reformation. Of the canonists at least a few eminent writers may be sufficient. The schoolmen are of more general value. But the feudal and civil law I cannot but wish to see complete. The feudal constitution is the original of the law of property, over all the civilised part of Europe; and the civil law, as it is generally understood to include the law of nations, may be called with great propriety a regal study. Of these books, which have been often published, and diversified by various modes of impress, a royal library should have at least the most curious edition, the most splendid, and the most useful. The most curious edition is commonly the first, and the most useful may be expected among the last. Thus, of Tully's Offices, the edition of Fust is the most curious, and that of Graviani the most useful. The most splendid the eye will discern. With the old printers you are now become well acquainted; if you can find any collection of their productions to be sold, you will undoubtedly buy it; but this can scarcely be hoped, and you must catch up single volumes where you can find them. In every place things often occur where they are least expected. I was shown a Welsh grammar written in Welsh, and printed at Milan, I believe, before any grammar of that language had been printed here. Of purchasing entire libraries, I know not whether the inconvenience may not overbalance the advantage. Of libraries connected with general views, one will have many books in common with another. When you have bought two collections, you will find that you have bought many books twice over, and many in each which you have left at home, and, therefore, did not want; and when you have selected a small number, you will have the rest to sell at a great loss, or to transport hither at perhaps a greater. It will generally be more commodious to buy the few that you want, at a price somewhat advanced, than to encumber yourself with useless books. But libraries collected for particular studies will be very valuable acquisitions. The collection of an eminent civilian, feudalist, or mathematician, will perhaps have very few superfluities. Topography or local history prevails much in parts of the continent. I have been told that scarcely a village of Italy wants its historian. These books may be generally neglected, but some will deserve attention by the celebrity of the place, the eminence of the authors, or the beauty of the sculptures. Sculpture has always been more cultivated among other nations than among us. The old art of cutting on wood, which decorated the books of ancient impression, was never carried here to any excellence; and the practice of engraving on copper, which succeeded, has never been much employed among us in acquiring books. The old books with wooden cuts are to be diligently sought; the designs were often made by great masters, and the prints are such as cannot be made by any artist now living. It will be of great use to collect in every place maps of the adjacent country, and plans of towns, buildings, and gardens. By this care you will form a more valuable body of geography than can otherwise be had. Many countries have been very exactly surveyed, but it must not be expected that the exactness of actual mensuration will be preserved, when the maps are reduced by a contracted scale, and incorporated into a general system."

"The king of Sardinia's Italian dominions are not large, yet the maps made of them in the reign of Victor fill two Atlantic folios. This part of your design will deserve particular regard, because, in this, your success will always be proportioned to your diligence. You are too well acquainted with literary history not to know that many books derive their value from the reputation of the printers. Of the celebrated printers you do not need to be informed, and if you did, might consult Baillie, Jugemens des Scavans. The productions of Aldus are enumerated in the Bibliotheca Graeca, so that you may know when you have them all; which is always of use, as it prevents needless search. The great ornaments of a library, furnished for magnificence as well as use, are the first editions, of which, therefore, I would not willingly neglect the mention. You know, sir, that the annals of typography begin with the Codex, 1457; but there is great reason to believe, that there are latent, in obscure corners, books printed before it. The secular feast, in memory of the invention of printing, is celebrated in the fortieth year of the century; if this tradition, therefore, is right, the art had in 1457 been already exercised nineteen years.

There prevails among typographical antiquaries a vague opinion, that the Bible had been printed three times before the edition of 1452, which CALMET calls 'La première édition bien avérée.' One of these editions has been lately discovered in a convent, and transplanted into the French king's library. Another copy has likewise been found, but I know not whether of the same impression, or another. These discoveries are sufficient to raise hope and instigate inquiry. In the purchase of old books, let me recommend to you to inquire with great caution, whether they are perfect. In the first edition the loss of a leaf is not easily observed. You recommend buying a book here to purchasing a mutilated Missal at a high price.

"All this perhaps you know already, and therefore, my letter may be of no use. I am, however, desirous to show you, that I wish prosperity to your undertaking. One advice more I will give, of more importance than all the rest, of which I, therefore, hope you will have still less need. You are going into a part of the world divided, as it is said, between bigotry and atheism; such representations are always hyperbolical, but there is certainly enough of both to alarm any mind solicitous for peace and truth; let not the contempt of superstition precipitate you into infidelity in the horror of infidelity ensue you in superstition.

I sincerely wish you successful and happy, for I am, Sir, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.

"June 18, 1768.

"My Love,—It gives me great pleasure to find that you are so well satisfied with what little things it has been in my power to send you. I hope you will always employ me in any office that can contribute to your convenience. My health is, I thank God, much better; but it is yet very weak; and very little things put it into a troublesome state; but still I hope all will be well. Pray for me.

"My friends at Liechfield must not think that I forget them. Neither Mrs. Cobb, nor Mrs. Adey, nor Miss Adey, nor Miss Seward, nor Miss Vise, are to suppose that I have lost all memory of their kindness. Mention me to them when you see them. I hear Mr. Vise has been lately very much in danger. I hope he is better.

"When you write again, let me know how you go on, and what company you keep, and what you do all day. I love to think on you, but do not know when I shall see you. Pray, write very often. I am, dearest, your humble servant,

—Pearson MSS.

SAM. JOHNSON."

In 1769, so far as I can discover, the public was favoured with nothing of Johnson's composition, either for himself or any of his friends. His "Meditations" too strongly prove that he suffered much both in body and mind; yet was he perpetually striving against evil, and nobly endeavouring to advance his intellectual and devotional improvement. Every generous and grateful heart must feel for the distresses of so eminent a benefactor to mankind; and now that his unhappiness is certainly known, must respect that dignity of character which prevented him from complaining.

His Majesty having the preceding year instituted the Royal Academy of Arts in London, Johnson had now the honour of being appointed Professor, in Antient Literature. The course of the year he wrote some letters to Mrs. Thrale, passed some part of the summer at Oxford and at Liechfield, and when at Oxford he wrote the following letter:

JOHN SON TO THOMAS WARTON.

"May 31, 1769.

"Dear Sir,—Many years ago, when I used to read in the library of your College, I promised to reimburse the college for that permission, by adding to their books a Baskerville's Virgil. I have now sent it, and desire you to reposit it on the shelves in my name.

"If you will be pleased to let me know when you have an hour of leisure, I will drink tea with you. I am engaged for the afternoon to this honorary Professorship, at the same time that Edward Gibbon, Esq., noted for introducing a kind of steering indelity into his historical writings, was elected Professor in Ancient History, in the room of Dr. Goldsmith, I observed that it brought to my mind, 'Wicked Will Whiston and good Mr. Ditton.'—I am now also [1791] of that admirable institution, as Secretary for Foreign Correspondence, by the faculty of the Academicians, and the approbation of the sovereign.—Boswell.

It has this inscription in a blank leaf:—"Hoc librum D. D. Samuel Johnson libri tertii libri secundi, vacaret." Of this library, which is an old Gothic room, he was very fond. On my observing to him that some of the smaller libraries of the University were more commodious and pleasant for study, as being more spacious and airy, he replied, "Sir, if a man has a mind to procure, he must study at Christchurch and All-South."—Warton.

JOHNSON TO MRS. ASTON.

"Madam,—I suppose you have received the mill: the whole apparatus seemed to be perfect, except that there is wanting a little tin spout at the bottom, and some ring or knob, on which the bag that catches the meal is to be hung. When these are added, I hope you will be able to grind your own bread, and treat me with a cake made by yourself, of meal from your own corn of your own grinding.

"I was glad, Madam, to see you so well, and hope your health will long increase, and then long continue. I am, Madam, your most obedient servant, S. JOHNSON."¹

— Parker MSS.

¹ During this visit he seldom or never dined out. He appeared to be deeply engaged in some literary work. Miss Williams was now with him at Oxford.—Warton.

² We shall see more by and bye of poor cousin Tom; who, Dr. Harwood thought, was the son of his uncle Andrew, of whom he told Mrs. Piozzi that he, for a whole year, kept the ring at Smithfield (where they wrestled and boxed), and never was thrown or conquered.—Croker.

³ Historical Account of the Sacredness and Use of Standing Groves, p. 638, 4to, 1776.—Croker.

⁴ Mr. Boswell, on this occasion, justified Johnson's forethought and prudence, in advising him to "clear his head of Corsica," unluckily, the advice had no effect, for Boswell made a fool of himself at the Jubilee by sundry enatical freaks; amongst others, lest he should not be sufficiently distinguished, he wore the words CORSICA BOSWELL in large letters round his hat.—C. 1813. There was an absurd print of him, I think in the London Magazine, published, no doubt, with his concurrence, in the character of an armed Corsican chief, at the Jubilee masquerade on the evening of the 7th Sept. 1769, in which he wears a cap with the inscription of "Viva la Liberté!"—but his friend and admirer, Tom Day, wrote that he wore an ordinarly the veracious inscription of "CORSICA BOSWELL in large letters outside his hat."—Life of Garrick, i. 212. Earlier in the year he had visited Ireland, and was no doubt the correspondent who flourished the following paragraph to the Public Advertiser of the 7th July, 1760:

"Extract of a letter from Dublin, 5th June.

"James Boswell, Esq., having now visited Ireland, he dined with his Grace the Duke of Leinster, at his seat at Carlow. He went also to visit the Lord Lieutenant at his country seat at Leitopol, to which he was conducted in one of his Excellency's coaches by Lt. Col. Walsh. He dined also and stayed all night, and next morning came in the coach with his Excellency, to the Phoenix Park, and was present at a review of Sir Joseph Yorke's Dragoons. He also dined with the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor. He is now set out on his return to Scotland."—Croker, 1846.
From Brightelmstone Dr. Johnson wrote me the following letter; which they who may think that I ought to have suppressed, must have less ardent feelings than I have always avowed.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Brightelmstone, Sept. 9. 1769.

"Dear Sir,—Why do you charge me with unkindness? I have omitted nothing that could do you good, or give you pleasure, unless it be that I have forbore to tell you my opinion of your Account of Corsica. I believe my opinion, if you think well of my judgment, might have given you pleasure; but when it is considered how much vanity is excited by praise, I am not sure that it would have done you good. Your History is like other histories, but your Journal is, in a very high degree, curious and delightful. There is between the history and the journal that difference which there will always be found between notions borrowed from without, and notions generated within. Your history was copied from books; your journal rose out of your own experience and observation. You express images which operated strongly upon yourself, and which are impressed upon me with greater force upon your readers. I know not whether I could name any narrative by which curiosity is better excited, or better gratified.

"I am glad that you are going to be married; and as I wish you well in things of less importance, wish you well with proportionate ardour in this crisis of your life. What I can contribute to your happiness, I should be very unwilling to withhold; for I have always loved and valued you, and shall love you and value you still more, as you become more regular and useful; effects which a happy marriage will hardly fail to produce.

"I do not find that I am likely to come back very soon from this place. I shall, perhaps, stay a fortnight longer; and a fortnight is a long time to a lover absent from his mistress. Would a fortnight ever have an end? I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

After his return to town, we met frequently, and I continued the practice of making notes of his conversation, though not with so much assiduity as I wish I had done. At this time, indeed, I had a sufficient excuse for not being able to appropriate so much time to my journal; for General Paoli, after Corsica had been overpowered by the monarchy of France, was now no longer at the head of his brave countrymen; but, having with difficulty escaped from his native island, had sought an asylum in Great Britain; and it was my duty, as well as my pleasure, to attend much upon him. Such particulars of Johnson's conversation at this period as I have committed to writing, I shall here introduce, without any strict attention to methodical arrangement. Sometimes short notes of different days shall be blended together, and sometimes a day may seem important enough to be separately distinguished.

He said, he would not have Sunday kept with rigid severity and gloom, but with a gravity and simplicity of behaviour.

I told him that David Hume had made a short collection of Scoticisms. "I wonder," said Johnson, "that he should find them." He would not admit the importance of the question concerning the legality of general warrants. "Such a power," he observed, "must be vested in every government, to answer particular cases of necessity; and there can be no just complaint but when it is abused, for which those who administer government must be answerable. It is a matter of such indifference, a matter about which the people care so very little, that were a man to be sent over Britain to offer them an exemption from it at a halfpenny a piece, very few would purchase it." This was a specimen of that laxity of talking, which I had heard him fairly acknowledge; for, surely, while the power of granting to liberate his country from the yoke of France, he went thither, and was a principal promoter of its short-lived union to the British Crown. When this was dissolved, Paoli returned to England, and resided here till his death in 1807.

CROKER.

Sept. 9th, 1769. General Paoli arrived at Mr. Hutchinson's, in Old Bond Street. 27th Sept. General Paoli was presented to his Majesty at St. James's.— Ann Reg. Mr. Boswell's attendance on General Paoli, which was branches in all the newspapers, excited at the time, a good deal of observation and ridicule. CROKER.

Mrs. Piozzi says, "He ridiculed a friend who, looking out on Streatham Common from our windows one day, lamented the enormous wickedness of the time, because some birdcatchers were busy there one fine Sunday morning. "While half the Christian world is permitted," said he, "to dance and sing, and celebrate Sunday as a day of festivity, how come your puritanical spirit so offended with frivolous and empty deviations from exactness? Whoever loads life with unnecessary duties," Sir," continued he, "provokes the attention of others on the principle of contradiction of singularity without repining the reward of superior virtue." He, indeed, always had the hope of being remembered after death; which has been a great object to the noblest minds in all ages."—BOSWELL.

3d. Paol's battle was in 1768; was appointed by his countrymen Chief Magistrate and General in their resistance to the Genoese. He, after an honourable, and for a time successful defence, was at last overpowered by the French, and sought refuge in England in 1769, where he resided, till the French revolution seeming to afford an opportunity to liberate his country from the yoke of France, he went thither, and was a principal promoter of its short-lived union to the British Crown. When this was dissolved, Paoli returned to England, and resided here till his death in 1807. CROKER.

general warrants was supposed to be legal, and the apprehension of them hung over our heads, we did not possess that security of freedom, congenial to our happy constitution, and which, by the intrepid exertions of Mr. Wilkes, has been happily established.

He said, "The duration of parliament, whether for seven years or the life of the king, appears to me so immaterial, that I would not give half a crown to turn the scale one way or the other. The habebus corpus is the single advantage which our government has over that of other countries." 1

On the 30th of September we dined together at the Mitre. I attempted to argue for the superior happiness of the savage life, upon the usual fanciful topics. Johnson. "Sir, there can be nothing more false. The savages have no bodily advantages beyond those of civilised men. They have not better health; and as to care or mental uneasiness, they are not above it, but below it, like bears. No, Sir; you are not to talk such paradox: let me have none on't. It cannot entertain, far less can it instruct. Lord Monboddo, one of your Scotch judges, talked a great deal of such nonsense. I suffered him; but I will not suffer you." Boswell. "But, Sir, does not Rousseau talk such nonsense?" Johnson. "True, Sir; but Rousseau himself is talking nonsense, and no less so the world for staring at him." Boswell. "How so, Sir?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, a man who talks nonsense so well, must know that he is talking nonsense. But I am afraid (chuckling and laughing) Monboddo does not know that he is talking nonsense." 2 Boswell. "Is it wrong, then, Sir, to affect singularity, in order to make people stare?" Johnson. "Yes, if you do it by propagating error: and, indeed, it is wrong in any way. There is in human nature a general inclination to make people stare; and every wise man has himself to cure of it, and does cure himself. If you wish to make people stare, by doing better than others, why, make them stare till they stare their eyes out. But consider how easy it is to make people stare, by being absurd. I may do it by going into a drawing-room without my shoes. You remember the gentleman in the 'Spectator,' [No. 576.] who had a commission of lunacy taken out against him for his extreme singularity, such as never wearing a wig, but a night-cap. Now, Sir, abstractedly, the night-cap was best: but, relatively, the advantage was over-balanced by making the boys run after him." 3

Talking of a London life, he said, "The happiness of London is not to be conceived but by those who have been in it. I will venture to say, there is more learning and science within the circumference of ten miles from where we now sit, than in all the rest of the kingdom." Boswell. "The only disadvantage is the great distance at which people live from one another." Johnson. "Yes, Sir; but that is occasioned by the largeness of it, which is the cause of all the other advantages." Boswell. "Sometimes I have been in the humour of wishing to retire to a desert." Johnson. "Sir, you have desert enough in Scotland."

Although I had promised myself a great deal of instructive conversation with him on the conduct of the married state, of which I had then a near prospect, he did not say much upon that topic. Mr. Seward 4 heard him once say, that "a man has a very bad chance for happiness in that state, unless he marries a woman of very strong and fixed principles of religion." He maintained to me, contrary to the common notion, that a woman would not

1 This surely is paradox. See ante, p. 197. n. 1, the probable motive of this opinion as to the duration of parliaments: but did he reckon the power of the Commons over the public purse as nothing? and did he calculate how long the habebus corpus might exist, if the freedom of the press were destroyed, and the duration of parliaments unlimited?—Croker.

2 His lordship having frequently spoken in an abusive manner of Dr. Johnson, in my company, I, on one occasion, during the lifetime of my illustrious friend, could not refrain from retaliation, and repeated to him this saying. He has since published I don't know how many pages in one of his curious books, attempting, in much anger, but with pitiful effect, to persuade mankind that my illustrious friend was not the great and good man as to his being a fool, the reader holds in his hand a sufficient answer.—Croker, 1846.

3 Mrs. Plorzi says: 'Few people had a more settled reverence for the world than Dr. Johnson, or were less carded by innovations on the long-received customs of common life. We met a friend driving six very small ponies, and stopped to speak to him; and at the same moment, Doctor Johnson began the fashion of driving six spaniels horses, all spaniels of the same size, and would have a mighty pretty effect. We deprecated the distincting of doing something worse than the common way.' He hated the way of leaving a company without taking notice to the lady of the house that he was going; and did not much like any of the contrivances by which ease has been lately introduced into society instead of ceremony, which had more of his approbation. Courts, dress, and dancing, however, all found their advocates in Dr. Johnson, who inculcated, upon principle, the cultivation of those arts, which many a moralist thinks himself bound to reject, and many a Christian holds unfit to be practised. "No person," said he, one day, "goes under-dressed till he thinks himself of consequence enough to forbear carrying the badge of his rank upon his back." And, in answer to the arguments urged by Puritans, Quakers, &c. against showy decorations of the human figure, I once heard him exclaim, "Oh, let us not be found, when our Master calls us, rippling the face of nature, or carrying on our souls and tongues! Let us all conform in outward customs, which are of no consequence, to the manners of those whom we live among; and despise such paltry distinctions. Alas! Sir," continued he, "a man who cannot get to heaven in a green coat, will not find his way thither in a grey one."—Croker.

4 William Seward, Esq. F.R.S., editor of "Anecdotes of Some Distinguished Persons, &c." in four volumes, 8vo., well known to all lovers of humorous and satirical literature, of the fine arts, and social virtues. I am indebted to him for several communications concerning Johnson.—Boswell. Mr. Seward was born in London in 1747, the son of a wealthy brewer, partner in the house of Calvert and Seward. Mr. Seward was educated at Charterhouse, and at Oxford, where he graduated, April 24, 1799. Malone. Besides the "Anecdotes," he published "Biographiana," and "Literary Miscellaneous"... be the worse wife for being learned; in which, from all that I have observed of Artemisius, I humbly differed from him. That a woman should be sensible and well informed, I allow to be a great advantage; and think that Sir Thomas Overbury, in his rude versification, has very judiciously pointed out that degree of intelligence which is to be desired in a female companion:

"Give me, next good, an understanding wife,
By nature wise, not learned by much art;
Some knowledge on her side will all my life
More scope of conversation impart;
Besides, her inborn virtue forte;
They are most firmly good, who best know why."

When I censured a gentleman of my acquaintance for marrying a second time, as it showed a disregard of his first wife, he said, "Not at all, Sir. On the contrary, were he not to marry again, it might be concluded that his first wife had given him a disgust to marriage; but by taking a second wife he pays the highest compliment to the first, by showing that she made him so happy as a married man, that he wishes to be so a second time." So ingenious a turn did he give to this delicate question. And yet, on another occasion, he owned that he once had almost asked a promise of Mrs. Johnson that she would not marry again, but had checked himself. Indeed I cannot help thinking, that in his case the request would have been unreasonable; for if Mrs. Johnson forgot, or thought it no injury to the memory of her first love — the husband of her youth and the father of her children — to make a second marriage, why should she be precluded from a third, should she be so inclined? In Johnson's persevering fond approbation of his Tetty, even after her decease, he seems totally to have overlooked the prior claim of the honest Birmingham trader. I presume that her having been married before had, at times, given him some uneasiness; for I remember his observing upon the marriage of one of our common friends, "He has done a very foolish thing, Sir; he has married a widow, when he might have had a maid."

We drank tea with Mrs. Williams. I had last year the pleasure of seeing Mrs. Thrale at Dr. Johnson's one morning, and had conversation enough with her to admire her talents; and to show her that I was as Johnsonian as herself. Dr. Johnson had probably been kind enough to speak well of me, for this evening he delivered me a very polite card from Mr. Thrale and her, inviting me to Streatham.

On the 6th of October I complied with this obliging invitation; and found, at an elegant villa, six miles from town, every circumstance that can make society pleasing. Johnson, though quite at home, was yet looked up to with an awe, tempered by affection, and seemed to be equally the care of his host and hostess. I rejoiced at seeing him so happy.

He played off his wit against Scotland with a good-humoured pleasantry, which gave me, though no bigot to national prejudices, an opportunity for a little contest with him. I having said that England was obliged to us for gardeners, almost all their good gardeners being Scotchmen: — JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, that is because gardening is much more necessary amongst you than with us, which makes so many of your people learn it. It is all gardening with you. Things which grow wild here, must be cultivated with great care in Scotland. Pray now (throwing himself back in his chair, and laughing), are you ever able to bring the sloe to perfection?"

I boasted that we had the honour of being the first in England to abolish the unhelpable, troublesome, and ungracious custom of giving vails to servants. Johnson. "Sir, you abolished vails, because you were too poor to be able to give them."

Mrs. Thrale disputed with him on the merit of Prior. He attacked him powerfully; said he wrote of love like a man who had never felt it; his love verses were college verses; and he repeated the song, "Alexis shum'd his fellow swains," &c. in so ludicrous a manner, as to make us all wonder how any one could have been pleased with such fantastical stuff. Mrs. Thrale stood to her gun with great courage, in defence of amorous ditties, which Johnson despised, till he at last silenced her by saying, "My dear lady, talk no more of this. Nonsense can be defended but by nonsense."

Mrs. Thrale then praised Garrick's talents for light gay poetry; and, as a specimen, repeated his song in "Florizel and Perdita," and dwelt with peculiar pleasure on this line:

"I'd smile with the simple, and feed with the poor."

JOHNSON. "Nay, my dear lady, this will never do. Poor David! Smile with the simple! — what folly is that? And who would feed with the poor that can help it? No, no; let me smile with the wise, and feed with the rich." I repeated this sally to Garrick, and wondered to find his sensibility as a writer not a little irri-

3 Yet his inquisitive mind might have been struck by his friend Tom Hervey's startling application of the scriptural question to Sir Thomas Hanmer, relative to the lady who was the cause of their contention: — "In heaven, whose wife shall she be?" Luke xx. 33. See ante, p. 183. n. 4.— CROKER.

tated by it. To soothe him, I observed, that Johnson spared none of us; and I quoted the passage in Horace, in which he compares one who attacks his friends for the sake of a laugh to a pushing ox, that is marked by a bunch of hay put upon his horns: fenum habet in cornu.

"Ay," said Garrick, vehemently, "he has a whole mow of it."

Talking of history, Johnson said, "We may know historical facts to be true, as we may know facts in common life to be true. Motives are generally unknown." We cannot trust to the characters we find in history, unless when they are drawn by those who knew the persons; as those, for instance, by Sallust and by Lord Clarendon.

He would not allow much merit to Whitley's oratory. "His popularity, Sir," said he, "is chiefly owing to the peculiarity of his manner. He would be followed by crowds were he to wear a night-cap in the pulpit, or were he to preach from a tree."

I know not from what spirit of contradiction he burst out into a violent declamation against the Corsicans, of whose heroism I talked in high terms. "Sir," said he, "what is all this rout about the Corsicans? They have been at war with the Genoese for upwards of twenty years, and have never yet taken their fortified towns. They might have battered down their walls, and reduced them to powder in twenty years. They might have pulled the walls in pieces, and cracked the stones with their teeth in twenty years." It was in vain to argue with him upon the want of artillery: he was not to be resisted for the moment.

On the evening of October 10, I presented Dr. Johnson to General Paoli. I had greatly wished that two men, for whom I had the highest esteem, should meet. They met with a manly ease, mutually conscious of their own abilities, and of the abilities of each other. The General spoke Italian, and Dr. Johnson English, and understood one another very well, with a little aid of interpretation from me, in which I compared myself to an isthmus which joins two great continents. Upon Johnson's approach, the General said, "From what I have read of your works, Sir, and from what Mr. Boswell has told me of you, I have long held you in great veneration." The General talked of languages being formed on the particular notions and manners of a people, without knowing which, we cannot know the language. We may know the direct signification of single words; but by these no beauty of expression, no sally of genius, no wit is conveyed to the mind. All this must be by allusion to other ideas. "Sir," said Johnson, "you talk of language, as if you had never done any thing else but study it, instead of governing a nation." The General said, "Questo è un troppo gran complimento," this is too great a compliment. Johnson answered, "I should have thought so, Sir, if I had not heard you talk." The General asked him what he thought of the spirit of infidelity which was so prevalent. Johnson. "Sir, this gloom of infidelity, I hope, is only a transient cloud passing through the hemisphere, which will soon be dissipated, and the sun break forth with his usual splendour." "You think then," said the General, "that they will change their principles like their clothes." Johnson. "Why, Sir, if they bestow no more thought on principles than on dress, it must be so." The General said, that a great part of the fashionable infidelity was owing to a desire of showing courage. Men who have no opportunities of showing it as to things in this life, take death and futurity as objects on which to display it.

Johnson. "That is mighty foolish affectation. Fear is one of the passions of human nature, of which it is impossible to divest it. You remember that the Emperor Charles V., when he read upon the tomb-stone of a Spanish nobleman, 'Here lies one who never knew fear,' wittily said, 'Then he never snuffed a candle with his fingers.'"

He talked a few words of French to the General; but finding he did not do it with facility, he asked for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote the following note:

"J'ai lu dans la géographie de Lucas de Lindo un Pater-noster écrit dans une langue tout-à-fait différente de l'italienne, et de toutes autres langues, qu'on décrit du Latîn. L'auteur s'appelle lingua Corsica rusticana: elle a peut-être passé peu à peu; mais elle a certainement prévalu autrfois dans les montagnes et dans la campagne. Le même auteur dit la même chose en parlant de Sardaigne; qu'il y a deux langues dans l'Isle, une des villes, l'autre de la campagne."

The General immediately informed him, that the lingua rusticana was only in Sardinia. Dr. Johnson went home with me, and drank tea till late in the night. He said, "General

1 This was what old Sir Robert Walpole probably meant, when his son Horace, wishing to amuse him one evening, after his fall, offered to read him some historical work. "Any thing," said the old statesman, "but history—that must be false." Mr. Gibbon says, "Malheureux sort de l'historien! Les spectateurs sont trop peu instruits, et les acteurs trop intéressés, pour que nous puissions compter sur les récits des uns ou des autres!" (Misc. Works, vol. iv. p. 416.)—Croker.

2 Boswell, in his "Journey to Corsica," published in 1768, p. 356, had anticipated this meeting, with apparent satisfaction:—"What an idea," he observes, "may we not form of an interview between such a scholar and philosopher as

Mr. Johnson and such a legislator and general as Paoli!"—Markland.

Paoli had the loftiest port of any man he had ever seen." He denied that military men were always the best bred men. "Perfect good breeding, he observed, consists in having no particular mark of any profession, but a general elegance of manners; whereas, in a military man, you can commonly distinguish the brand of a soldier."

Mr. Johnson should not to-night any discussion of the perplexed question of fate and free-will, which I attempted to agitate: "Sir," said he, "we know our will is free, and there's an end on't."

He honoured me with his company at dinner on the 16th of October, at my lodgings in Old Bond Street, with Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Garrick, Dr. Goldsmith, Mr. Murphy, Mr. Bickerstaff, and Mr. Thomas Davies. Garrick played round him with a fond vivacity, taking hold of the breasts of his coat, and, looking up in his face with a lively archness, complimented him on the good health which he seemed then to enjoy; while the sage, shaking his head, beheld him with a gentle complacency. One of the company not being come at the appointed hour, I proposed, as usual, upon such occasions, to order dinner to be served; adding, "Ought six people to be kept waiting for one?" "Why, yes," answered Johnson, with a delicate humanity, "if the one will suffer more by your sitting down, than the six will do by waiting." Goldsmith, to divert the tedious minutes, strutted about, bragging of his dress, and I believe was seriously vain of it, for his mind was wonderfully prone to such impressions. "Come, come," said Garrick, "talk no more of that. You are, perhaps, the worst — eh, eh?" — Goldsmith was eagerly attempting to interrupt him, when Garrick went on, laughing ironically, "Nay, you will always look like a gentleman; but I am talking of being well or ill drest." "Well, let me tell you," said Goldsmith, "when my tailor brought home my bloom-coloured coat, he said, 'Sir, I have a favour to beg of you. When any body asks you who made your clothes, be pleased to mention John Filby, at the Harrow, in Water Lane.'" — Johnson.

"Why, Sir, that was because he knew the strange colour would attract crowds to gaze at it, and if they might hear of him, and see how well he could make a coat even of so absurd a colour."

After dinner our conversation first turned upon Pope. Johnson said, his characters of men were admirably drawn, those of women not so well. He repeated to us, in his forcible, melodious manner, the concluding lines of the Dunciad. While he was talking loudly in praise of those lines, one of the company ventured to say, "Too fine for such a poem: — a poem on what?" — Johnson (with a disdainful look), "Why, on dunces. It was worth while being a dunce then. Ah, Sir, hadst thou lived in those days! It is not worth while being a dunce now, when there are no wits." Bickerstaff observed, as a peculiar circumstance, that Pope's fame was higher when he was alive than it was then. Johnson, his Pastorals were poor things, though the versification was fine. He told us, with high satisfaction, the anecdote of Pope's inquiring who was the author of his "London," and saying, he will soon be détéré. He observed, that in Dryden's poetry there were passages drawn from a profundity which Pope could never reach. He repeated some fine lines on love, by the former, which I have now forgotten, and gave great applause to the character of Zimri. Goldsmith said, that Pope's character of Addison showed a deep knowledge of the human heart. Johnson said, that the description of the temple, in "The Mourning Bride," was the finest poetical passage he had ever read; he recollected none in Shakspeare equal to it. — "But," said Garrick, all alarmed for those lines so much, that when he repeated them his voice faltered: "And well it might, Sir," said Johnson, "for they are noble lines." — J. Boswell, Jun.

6 What a lively idea of the tranquillity of Johnson's conversation does the word ventured give! Boswell was himself the object of this sarcasm. "Boswell lamented that he had not lived in the Augustan age of England, when Pope and others flourished. Sir Joshua Reynolds thought that Boswell had no right to complain, as it were better to be alive than dead. Johnson said, 'No, Sir, Boswell is in the right; as, perhaps, he has lost the opportunity of having his name immortalised in the Dunciad.' Northeast, Life of Reynolds. — Croker.

7 Probably that from the Fables which Johnson quotes in the Life of Chardin.

"Love various minds does variously inspire: It stirs in gentle bosoms gentle fire, Like that of incense on the altar laid: But mine flames tempestuous seem to invade," &c.

8 It is doubtless true that he has in his mind the "T furnishings of pope in his will, and, Mr. Thrale said, in answer to Johnson's astonishment, that he had long been a suspected man, 'By those who look close to the ground dirt will be seen,' Sir; was the reply: 'I hope I see things from a greater distance.' — Croker.

"It is due to Boswell's character for minute accuracy to state that in this letter he alludes to his celebration of his 21st birthday, dated the very same day on which Goldsmith sported it at Boswell's. Mr. Langton informed me that he once related to Johnson (on the authority of Spence) that Pope himself admired
"the God of his idolatry," "we know not the extent and variety of his powers. We are to suppose there are such passages in his works. Shakspeare must not suffer from the badness of our memories. Johnson, divided on this occasion, from his usual indolent, went on with great ardour: "No, Sir; Congreve has nature" (smiling on the tragic eagerness of Garrick); but composing himself, he added, "Sir, this is not comparing Congreve on the whole with Shakspeare on the whole; but only maintaining that Congreve has one finer passage than any that can be found in Shakspeare. Sir, a man may have no more than ten guineas in the world, but he may have those ten guineas in one piece; and so may have a finer piece than a man who has ten thousand pounds; but, then he has only one ten-guinea piece.—What I mean is, that you can show me no passage where there is simply a description of material objects, without any intermixture of moral notions, which produces such an effect."

Mr. Murphy mentioned Shakspeare's description of the night before the battle of Agincourt; but it was observed it had men in it. Mr. Davies suggested the speech of Juliet, in which she figures herself awaking in the tomb of her ancestors. Some one mentioned the description of Dover Cliff. Johnson. "No, Sir; it should be all precipice,—all vacuum. The crows impede your fall. The diminished appearance of the boats, and other circumstances, are all very good description; but do not impress the mind at once with the horrible idea of immense height. The impression is divided; you pass on by computation from one stage of the tremendous space to another. Had the girl in 'The Mourning Bride' said she could not cast her shoe to the top of one of the pillars in the temple, it would not have added the idea, but weakened it." 2

Talking of a barrister who had a bad utterance, some one (to rouse Johnson) wickedly said, that he was unfortunate in not having been taught oratory by Sheridan. Johnson. "Nay, Sir, if he had been taught by Sheridan, he would have cleared the room." Garrick. "Sheridan has too much vanity to be a good man." We shall now see Johnson's mode of defending a man; taking him, into his own hands, and drawing on him, Johnson. "No, Sir. There is to be sure, in Sheridan, something to reprehend and every thing to laugh at; but, Sir, he is not a bad man. No, Sir; were mankind to be divided into good and bad, he would stand considerably within the ranks of good. And, Sir, it must be allowed that Sheridan excels in plain declamation, though he can exhibit no character."

I should, perhaps, have suppressed this disquisition concerning a person of whose merit and worth I think with respect, had he not attacked Johnson so outrageously in his Life of Swift, and at the same time, treated us his admirers as a set of pigmies. 3 He who has provoked the lash of wit, cannot complain that he smart from it.

Mrs. Montagu, a lady distinguished for having written an Essay on Shakspeare, being mentioned; — Reynolds. "I think that essay does her honour." Johnson. "Yes, Sir; it does her honour, but it would do nobody else honour. I have, indeed, not read it all. But when I take up the end of a web, and find it packthread, I do not expect, by looking further, to find embroidery. Sir, I will venture to say, there is not one sentence of true criticism in her book." Garrick. "But, Sir, surely it shows how much Voltaire has mistaken Shakspeare, which nobody else has done." Johnson. "Sir, nobody else has thought it worth while. And what merit is there in that? You may as well praise a schoolmaster for whippimg a boy who has construed ill. No, Sir, there is no real criticism in it: none showing the beauty of thought, as formed on the workings of the human heart."

The admirers of this Essay 4 may be offended

1 In Congreve's description there seems to be an intermixture of moral notions; as the affecting power of the passage arises from the vivid impression of the described objects on the mind of a speaker: "And shoot a chilliness," etc. — Keaney. No surely are the first words of the speech, "how revered," and, again, "it strikes an awe," and again, "looking tranquility." — Croker.

2 We should have been at a loss to account for all this paradoxical preference of Congreve to Shakspeare, and this total insensibility to, or misrepresentation of, the beautiful description of the cliff, but that Mrs. Poet says that Johnson beated to her how he used to tease Garrick by commendations on the tomb scene in Congreve's Mourning Bride, protesting that Shakspeare had, in that passage, "seen greater good." These fellows know not how to blame, or how to comment. He himself does not here show much taste either in his blame or commendation. He surely could not think the cliff a part of the fall, "it should," he says, "be all vacuum" — but how is vacuum to be painted but by such circumstances and contrasts as Shakspeare has introduced? and has not Congreve done exactly the same? — Croker.

3 "There is a writer, at present of gigantic fame in these days of little men, who has pretended to scratch out a Life of Swift, but so miserably executed as only to reflect back on himself that disgrace, which he meant to throw upon the character of the Dean." — Sheridan. Life of Swift. It however should be recollected that Sheridan's just cause of resentment against Johnson occurred many years before the publication of his Life of Swift. Johnson was, throughout, the aggressor. — Croker.

4 Of whom, I acknowledge myself to be one, considering it as a piece of the secondary or comparative species of criticism; and not of that profound species which alone Dr. Johnson would allow to be "real criticism." It is, besides, clearly and elegantly expressed, and has done efficaciously what it professed to do, namely, vindicated Shakspeare from the misrepresentation of Johnson. He has laid it on his soul to set many young people at their wits, though false observations, Mrs. Montagu's Essay was of service to Shakspeare with a certainty of readers, and is, therefore, entitled to praise. Johnson, I am assured, allowed the merit which I have stated, saying, (with reference to Voltaire), "It is a subject on which I have concluded to pronounce it bad. — Croker. His whole preserved an admirable reply of hers on the subject of Voltaire. She happened to be present at a sitting of l'Académie Françoise, and had just intimated to Johnson, that Voltaire was read. Stuard, the secretary, said to her, "Je Cravis Madame que vous étes un peu lachée de ce que vous venez d'entendre." Johnson replied, with admirable good taste and good manners, "Mon, Monsieur? — Point du tout — Je ne vais pas amie de M. de Voltaire." Lett. to Mann, Dec. 1, 1776. — Croker.
at the slighting manner in which Johnson spoke of it; but let it be remembered, that he gave his honest opinion unbiassed by any prejudice, or any proud jealousy of a woman intruding herself into the choir of criticism; for Sir Joshua himself had read hereafter, that when he Essay first came out, and it was not known who had written it, Johnson wondered how Sir Joshua could like it. At this time Sir Joshua himself had received no information concerning the author, except being assured by one of our most eminent literati, that it was clear its author did not know the Greek tragedies in the original. One day at Sir Joshua’s table, when it was related that Mrs. Montagu, in an excess of compliment to the author of a modern tragedy 1 had exclaimed, “I tremble for Shakspeare,” Johnson said, “When Shakspeare has got — for his rival, and Mrs. Montagu for his defender, he is in a poor state indeed.”

Johnson proceeded: “The Scotchman (Lord Kames) has taken the right method in his Elements of Criticism.” I do not mean that he has taught us any thing, but he has told us old things in a new way,” Murray. “He seems to have read a great deal of French criticism, and wants to make it his own; as if he had been for years anatomising the heart of man, and peeping into every cranny of it,” Goldsmith. “It is easier to write that book, than to read it.” Johnson. “We have an example of true criticism in Burke’s Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful:” and, if I recollect, there is also Du Bos (Rédéxions Critiques sur la Poésie et sur la Peinture), and Bouhours (Mânière de bien penser dans les Œuvres d’Esprit), who shows all beauty to depend on truth. There is no great merit in telling how many plays have ghosts in them, and how this ghost is better than that. You must show how terror is impressed on the human heart. In the description of Night in Macbeth, the beetle and the bat detract from the general idea of darkness — insipissated gloom.”

Politics being mentioned, he said, “This petitioning 4 is a new mode of distressing government, and a mighty easy one. I will undertake to get petitions either against quarter guineas or half guineas, with the help of a little dirt wine. There must be no yielding to encourage this. The object is not important enough. We are not to blow up half a dozen palaces, because one cottage is burning.”

The conversation then took another turn. Johnson. “It is amazing what ignorance of certain points one sometimes finds in men of eminence. A wit about town, who wrote indecent Latin verses, asked me, how it happened that England and Scotland, which were once two kingdoms, were now one: — and Sir Fletcher Norton did not seem to know that there were such publications as the Reviews.”

“The ballad of Hardyknute 5 has no great merit, if it be really ancient. People talk of nature. But mere obvious nature may be exhibited with very little power of mind.”

On Thursday, October 19, I passed the evening with him at his house. He advised me to complete a Dictionary of words peculiar to Scotland, of which I showed him a specimen. “Sir,” said he, “Ray (in his English Proverbs) has made a collection of north-country words. By collecting those of your country, you will do a useful thing towards the history of the language.” He bade me also go on with collections which I was making upon the antiquities of Scotland. “Make a large book; a folio,” Boswell. “But of what use will it be, Sir?” Johnson. “Never mind the use; do it.”

I complained that he had not mentioned Garrick in his Preface to Shakspeare; and asked him if he did not admire him. Johnson. “Yes, as ‘a poor player, who frets and struts his hour upon the stage;’ — as a shadow.”

2 And yet when Mrs. Montagu showed him some China plates which had once belonged to Queen Elizabeth, he told her, “that they had no reason to be ashamed of their present possessors, who was so little inferior to the first.” — Piozzi.

3 It has been often said, that the cooing between Mrs. Montagu and Dr. Johnson arose out of his treatment of Lord Lyttelton, in the “Lives of the Poets;” but we see that he began to speak disrespectfully of her long before; and, indeed, there is hardly any point of Dr. Johnson’s conduct less excusable, and, as far as I can see, less defensible, than the contemptuous way in which he appears to have sometimes spoken of a lady to whom he continued to address such extravagant compliments as that just quoted, and to write such flattering letters as we shall read hereafter. There is some private history in all this, which I am no further able to unravel than by repeating that Boswell himself had a strong dislike to Lady Montagu; but he had little real talents, and what a dispenser of fame he was to be, treated him with a distance bordering on contempt. — Croker.

4 “Ere the bath hath flown His diapr’d light: ere to black Heaut’s suns The sharp-born beetle, with his drowsy hums, Hath rung night’s yawning peal, there shall be done A deed of dreadful note.” — Act iii. sc. 2.

See ante, p. 201, n. 2; but again, I cannot but think that Johnson’s criticism is wholly erroneous in fact as well as in taste. Darkness, like respect, only could have been described by circumstances; but, in fact, Shakespeare had an intention to describe darkness — “insipissated gloom,” as Johnson absurdly calls it. Macbeth is stating a mere question of time, and instead of saying before morning, more poetically selects the awful images of night. — Croker.

5 A great number of petitions, condemnatory of the proceedings against Mr. Wilkes, and inflamed with all the violence of party, were at this period presented to the King. — Croker.

7 Sir Robert Chambers of Edinburgh, who has favoured me with several notes and corrections, says, that the real author of the ballad was Elizabeth Halket, daughter of Sir Charles Halket, of Pitferrane, Bart., and wife of Sir Henry Wardlaw, of Fidrievie, Bart.; she died about 1727. The reason why Sir John Bruce’s name has been mentioned was, probably, that she introduced her ballad to Dr. Johnson by the hands of that gentleman, who was her brother-in-law. — Croker, 1835.

The ballad of Hardyknute was the first poem I ever read, and it will be the last I shall forget. — Sir Walter Scott.
Boswell. "But has he not brought Shakspere into notice?" Johnson. "Sir, to allow that, would be to lampoon the age.
Many of Shakespeare's plays are the worse for being acted: Maebeth, for instance." 1 Boswell. "What, Sir, is nothing gained by decoration and action? Indeed, I do wish that you had mentioned Garrick." Johnson. "My dear Sir, had I mentioned him, I must have mentioned many more; Mrs. Fritchard, Mrs.
Cibber—nay, and Mr. Cibber too; he too altered Shakespeare." Boswell. "Yes, Sir, you have read the 'Apology,'" Johnson. "Yes, it is very entertaining. But as for Cibber himself, taking from his conversation all that he ought not to have said, he was a poor creature. I remember when he brought me one of his Odes to have my opinion of it, I could not bear such nonsense, and would not let him read it to the end; so little respect had I for that great man!" (laughing.) Yet I remember Richardson wondering that I could treat him with familiarity."

I mentioned to him that I had seen the execution of several convicts at Tyburn, 2 two days before, and that none of them seemed to be under any concern. Johnson. "Most of them, Sir, have never thought at all." Boswell. "But is not the fear of death natural to man?" Johnson. "So much so, Sir, that the whole of life is but keeping away the thoughts of it." He then, in a low and earnest tone, talked of his meditating upon the awful hour of his own dissolution, and in what manner he should conduct himself upon that occasion: "I know not," said he, "whether I should wish to have a friend by me, or have it all between God and myself."

Talking of our feeling for the distresses of others:—Johnson. "Why, Sir, there is much noise made about it, but it is greatly exaggerated. No, Sir, we have a certain degree of feeling to prompt us to do good; more than that Providence does not intend. It would be misery to no purpose." Boswell.
"But suppose now, Sir, that one of your intimate friends were apprehended for an offence for which he might be hanged." Johnson.
"I should do what I could to bail him, and give him any other assistance: but if he were once fairly hanged, I should not suffer." Boswell. "Would you eat your dinner that day, Sir?" Johnson. "Yes, Sir; and eat it as if he were eating with me. Why, there's Baretti, who is to be tried for his life to-morrow, friends have risen up for him on every side; yet if he should be hanged, none of them will eat a slice of pudding the less, Sir, that sympathetic feeling goes a very little way in depressing the mind."

I told him that I had dined lately at Foote's, who showed me a letter which he had received from Tom Davies, telling him that he had not been able to sleep from the concern he felt on account of "this sad affair of Baretti," beginning of him to try if he could suggest any thing that might be of service; and, at the same time, recommending to him an industrious young man who kept a pickle shop.
Johnson. "Ay, Sir, here you have a specimen of human sympathy; a friend hanged, and a cucumber pickled. We know not whether Baretti or the pickle-man has kept Davies from sleep; nor does he know himself.
And as to his not sleeping, Sir; Tom Davies is a very great man; Tom has been upon the stage, and knows how to do those things: I have not been upon the stage, and cannot do those things." Boswell. "I have often blamed myself, Sir, for not feeling for others as sensibly as many say they do." Johnson.
"Sir, don't be duped by them any more. You will find these very feeling people are not very ready to do you good. They pay you by feeling."

Boswell. "Foote has a great deal of
"He has a singular talent of exhibiting character." Johnson. "Sir, it is not a talent, it is a vice; it is what others abstain from. It is not comedy, which exhibits the character of a species, as that of a miser gathered from many misers: it is farce, which exhibits individuals." Boswell. "Did not he think of exhibiting you, Sir?" Johnson. "Sir, fear restrained him; he knew I would have broken his bones. I would have saved him, and give him the trouble of cutting off a leg; I would have left him a leg to cut off." Boswell. "Pray, Sir, is not Foote an infidel?" Johnson. "I do not know, Sir, that the fellow is an infidel; but if he be an infidel, he is an infidel as a dog is an infidel; that is to say, he has never thought upon the subject." 3 Boswell. "I suppose,

3 Six unhappy men were executed at Tyburn, on Wednesday, the 18th (one day before). It was one of the irregularities of Mr. Boswell's mind to be passionately fond of seeing these melancholy spectacles. Indeed he avows and defends it (in the 'Humphry Clinker,' No. 6, Lond. Mag. 1783) at a natural and irresistible impulse. — Croker.
4 It would seem, however, that Davies's anxiety was more sinister than Johnson thought. He says, in a letter to Grainger, 'I have been so taken up with a very unlucky accident that befell an intimate friend of mine, that for this last fortnight I have been able to attend to no business, though ever so urgent.' Grainger's Letters, p. 28. — Croker.
6 When Mr. Foote was at Edinburgh, he thought fit to entertain a numerous Scotch company, with a great deal of careless comicity, at the expense of Dr. Johnson, imagining it would be acceptable. 'I felt this as not civil to me,' but not very patiently till he had exhausted his meritment on that subject; and then observed, that surely Johnson must be allowed to have some sterling wit, and that I had heard him say a very good thing of Mr. Foote himself. 'Ah! my old friend Sam,' cried Foote, 'no man says better things: do let us have it.' Upon which I told the above story, which produced a very loud laugh from the company. But I never saw Foote so disconcerted. He looked grave and angry, and Sir, he has thought superficially, and seized the first notions which occurred to his mind.

Johnson. "Why then, Sir, still he is like a dog, that snatches the piece next him. Did you never observe that dogs have not the power of comparing? A dog will take a small bit of meat as readily as a large, when both are before him."

"Buchanan," he observed, "has fewer cents 1 than any modern Latin poet. He not only had great knowledge of the Latin language, but was a great poetical genius. Both the Scaligers praise him."

He again talked of the passage in Congreve with high commendation, and said, "Shakspeare never has six lines together without a fault. 2 Perhaps you may find seven: but this does not refute my general assertion. If I come to an orchard, and say there's no fruit here, and then comes a poring man, who finds two apples and three pears, and tells me, "Sir, you are mistaken, I have found both apples and pears, I should laugh at him: what would that be to the purpose?"

"What do you think of Dr. Young's 'Night Thoughts, Sir?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, there are very fine things in them."

Boswell. "Is there not less religion in the nation now, Sir, than there was formerly?"

Johnson. "I don't know, Sir, that there is."

Boswell. "For instance, there used to be a chaplain in every great family, which we do not find now." Johnson. "Neither do you find any of the state servants which great families used formerly to have. There is a change of modes in the whole department of life."

Next day, October 20, he appeared, for the only time I suppose in his life, as a witness in a court of justice, being called to give evidence to the character of Mr. Baretti, who, having stabbed a man in the street 3 was arraigned at the Old Bailey for murder. Never did such a constellation of genius enlighten the awful Sessions-house, emphatically called Justice-hall; Mr. Burke, Mr. Garrick, Mr. Beaulclerk, and Dr. Johnson: and undoubtedly their favourable testimony had due weight with the court and jury. Johnson gave his evidence in a slow, deliberate, and distinct manner, which was uncommonly impressive. 4 It is well known that Mr. Baretti was acquitted.

entered into a serious refutation of the justice of the remark. "What, Sir," said he, "talk thus of a man of liberal education—a man who for years was at the University of Oxford—a man who has added sixteen new characters to the English drama of his country!"—Boswell.

1 A composition formed by joining scraps from other authors." Johnson's Dictionary. — Croke.

2 What strange "laxity of talk" all this is from the author of the Preface to Shakespeare! 1 I can imagine no better excuse for it, than that he had got into the vein to vex Garrick, (see ante, p. 204, n. 2) and that Boswell teased him into a perverse maintenance of his paradox. — Croke.

On the 26th of October, we dined together at the Mitre tavern. I found fault with Foote for indulging his talent of ridicule at the expense of his visitors, which I colloquially termed making fools of his company. Johnson. "Why, Sir, when you go to see Foote, you do not go to see a saint: you go to see a man who will be entertained at your house, and then bring you on the public stage; who will entertain you at his house, for the very purpose of bringing you on the public stage. Sir, he does not make fools of his company; they whom he exposes are fools already; he only brings them into action."

Talking of trade, he observed, "It is a mistaken notion that a vast deal of money is brought into a nation by trade. It is not so. Commodities come from commodities; but trade produces no capital accession of wealth. However, though there should be little profit in money, there is a considerable profit in pleasure, as it gives to one nation the productions of another, as we have wines and fruits, and many other foreign articles, brought to us." Boswell. "Yes, Sir, and there is a profit in pleasure, by its furnishing occupation to such numbers of mankind." Johnson. "Why, Sir, you cannot call that pleasure, to which all are averse, and which none begin but with the hope of leaving off; a thing which men dislike before they have tried it, and when they have tried it." Boswell. "But, Sir, the mind must be employed, and we grow weary when idle." Johnson. "That is, Sir, because others being busy, we want company; safety, and rashly struck one of them with a knife (which he constantly wore for the purpose of carving fruit and sweetmeats), and gave him a wound, of which he died the next day. European Magazine, vol. xxv. p. 91.— Wignor.

The following is the substance of Dr. Johnson's evidence: "Dr. J. I believe I began to be acquainted with Mr. Baretti about the year 1753 or 1754. I have been intimate with him. He is a man of literature, a very studious man, a man of great diligence. He gets his living by study. I have no reason to think he was ever disordered with liquor in his life. A man that I never knew, or was ever in any way associated with, a man that I take to be rather timidons. — Q. Was he addicted to pick up women in the streets? — Dr. J. I never knew that he was. — Q. How is he as to eyesight? Dr. J. He does not see me now, nor do I see him. I do not believe he could be capable of assailing any body in the street, without great provocation." Gent. Mag.—Croke.
but if we were all idle, there would be no growing weary; we should all entertain one another. There is, indeed, this in trade; — it gives men an opportunity of improving their situation. If there were no trade, many who are poor would always remain poor. But no man loves labour for itself." Boswell. "Yes, Sir, I know a person who does. He is a very laborious Judge, and he loves the labour," Johnson. "Sir, that is because he loves respect and distinction. Could he have them without labour, he would like it less." Boswell. "He tells me he likes it for itself." Johnson. "Why, Sir, he fancies so, because he is not accustomed to abstract."

We went home to his house to ten. Mrs. Williams made it with sufficient dexterity, notwithstanding her blindness, though her manner of satisfying herself that the cups were full enough, appeared to me a little awkward; for I fancied she put her finger down a certain way, till she felt the tea touch it. In my first elation at being allowed the privilege of attending Dr. Johnson at his late visits to this lady, which was like being à secretoria con- siding, I willcribed a cup after cup, as if it had been the Heliconian spring. But as the charm of novelty went off, I grew more fastidious; and besides, I discovered that she was of a peevish temper.

There was a pretty large circle this evening. Dr. Johnson was in very good humour, lively, and ready to talk upon all subjects. Mr. Ferguson, the self-taught philosopher, told him of a new-invented machine which went without horses: a man who sat in it turned a handle, which worked a spring that drove it forward. "Then, Sir," said Johnson, "what is gained is, the man has his choice whether he will move himself alone, or himself and the machine too." Dominicetti being mentioned, he would not allow him any merit. "There is nothing in all this boasted system. No, Sir; medicated baths can be no better than warm water; their only effect can be that of tepid moisture." One of the company took the other side, maintaining that medicines of various sorts, and some too of most powerful effect, are introduced into the human frame by the medium of the pores; and, therefore, when warm water is impregnated with salutiferous substances, it may produce great effects as a bath. This appeared to me very satisfactory. Johnson did not answer it; but talking for victory, and determined to be master of the field, he had recourse to the device which Goldsmith impu- tented to him in the witty words of one of Gibber's comedies: "There is no arguing with Johnson; for when his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the but-end of it." He turned to the gentleman, "Well, Sir, go to Dominicetti, and get thyself fumigated; but be sure that the steam be directed to thy head, for that is the peccant part." This produced a triumphant roar of laughter from the motley assembly of philosophers, printers, and dependents, male and female.

I know not how so whimsical a thought came into my mind, but I asked, "If, Sir, you were shut up in a castle, and a new-born child with you, what would you do?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, I should not much like my company." Boswell. "But would you take the trouble of rearing it?" He seemed, as may well be supposed, unwilling to pursue the subject; but upon my persevering in my question, replied, "Why yes, Sir, I would; but I must have all conveniences. If I had no garden, I would make a shed on the roof, and take it there for fresh air. I should feed it, and wash it much, and with warm water to please it, not with cold water to give it pain," Boswell. "But, Sir, does not heat relax?" Johnson. "Sir, you are not to imagine the water is to be very hot. I would not coddle the child. No, Sir, the hardy method of treating children does no good. I'll take you five children from London, who shall cuss five Highland children. Sir, a man bred in London will carry a burthen, or run, or wrestle, as well as a man brought up in the hardest manner in the country." Boswell. "Good living, I suppose, makes the Londoners strong." Johnson. "Why, Sir, I don't know that it does. Our chairman from Ireland, who are as strong men as any, have been brought up upon potatoes. Quantity makes up for quality." Boswell. "Would you teach this child that I have furnished you with, any thing?" Johnson. "No, I should not be apt to teach it." Boswell. "Would not you have a pleasure in teaching it?" Johnson. "No, Sir, I should not have a pleasure in teaching it." Boswell. "Have you not a pleasure in teaching men? There I have you. You have the same pleasure in teaching men, that I should have in teaching children." Johnson. "Why, something about that." Boswell. "Do you think, Sir, that what are comprised in ten volumes. 2 I have since had reason to think that I was mistaken; for I have been informed by a lady, who was long intimate with her, and likely to be a more accurate observer of such matters, that she had acquired such a nimbleness of touch, as to know, by the feeling on the outside of the cup, how near it was to being full. — Boswell.
3 James Ferguson was born in Banff, in 1710, of very poor parents. While tending his master's sheep, he acquired a knowledge of the stars, and constructed a celestial globe. This he exhibited not only to Mr. Johnson, who procured him further instructions. At length, he went to Edinburgh, where he drew portraits in miniature at a small price; and this profession he pursued afterwards, when he resided in Belt Court. is called natural affection is born with us? It seems to me to be the effect of habit, or of gratitude for kindness. No child has it for a parent whom it has not seen." Johnson.

"Why, Sir, I think there is an instinctive natural affection in parents towards their children."

Russia being mentioned as likely to become a great empire, by the rapid increase of population: — Johnson. "Why, Sir, I see no prospect of their propagating more. They can have no more children than they can get. I know of no way to make them breed more than they do. It is not from reason and prudence that people marry, but from inclination. A man is poor: he thinks, 'I cannot be worse, and so I'll e'en take Peggy.' Boswell. "But have not nations been more populous at one period than another?" Johnson. "Yes, Sir; but that has been owing to the people being less thinned at one period than another, whether by emigrations, war, or pestilence, not by their being more or less prolific. Births at all times bear the same proportion to the same number of people." Boswell. "But, to consider the state of our own country; — does not throwing a number of farms into one hand hurt population?" Johnson. "Why no, Sir; the same quantity of food being produced, will be consumed by the same number of mouths, though the people may be disposed of in different ways. We see, if corn be dear, and butchers' meat cheap, the farmers all apply themselves to the raising of corn, till it becomes plentiful and cheap, and then butchers' meat becomes dear; so that an equality is always preserved. No, Sir, let fanciful men do as they will, depend upon it, it is difficult to disturb the system of life." Boswell. "But, Sir, is it not a very bad thing for landlord to oppress their tenants, by raising their rents?" Johnson. "Very bad. But, Sir, it never can have any general influence; it may distress some individuals. For, consider this: landlords cannot do without tenants. Now tenants will not give more for land, than land is worth. If they can make more of their money by keeping a shop, or any other way, they'll do it, and so oblige landlords to let land come back to a reasonable rent, in order that they may get tenants. Land, in England, is an article of commerce. A tenant who pays his landlord his rent, thinks himself no more obliged to him, than you think yourself obliged to a man in whose shop you buy a piece of goods. He knows the landlord does not let him have his land for less than he can get from others, in the same manner as the shopkeeper sells his goods. No shopkeeper sells a yard of riband for sixpence when seven-pence is the current price." Boswell. "But, Sir, is it not better that tenants should be dependent on landlords?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, as there are many more tenants than landlords, perhaps, strictly speaking, we should wish not. But, if you please, you may let your lands cheap, and so get the value, part in money and part in homage. I should agree with you in that." Boswell. "So, Sir, you laugh at schemes of political improvement." Johnson. "Why, Sir, most schemes of political improvement are very laughable things."

He observed, "Providence has wisely ordered that the more numerous men are, the more difficult it is for them to agree in any thing, and so they are governed. There is no doubt, that if the poor should reason, 'We'll be the poor no longer, we'll make the rich take their turn,' they could easily do it, were it not that they can't agree. So the common soldiers, though so much more numerous than their officers, are governed by them for the same reason."

He said, "Mankind have a strong attachment to the habitations to which they have been accustomed. You see the inhabitants of Norway do not with one consent quit it, and go to some part of America, where there is a mild climate, and where they may have the same produce from land, with the tenth part of the labour. No, Sir; their affection for their old dwellings, and the terror of a general change, keep them at home. Thus, we see many of the finest spots in the world thinly inhabited, and many rugged spots well inhabited."

"The London Chronicle," which was the only newspaper he constantly took in, being brought, the office of reading it aloud was assigned to me. I was diverted by his impatience. He made me pass over so many parts of it, that my task was very easy. He would not suffer one of the petitions to the King about the Middlesex election to be read.

I had hired a Bohemian as my servant while I remained in London, and being much pleased with him, I asked Dr. Johnson whether his being a Roman Catholic should prevent my taking him with me to Scotland. Johnson. "Why no, Sir. If he has no objection, you can have none." Boswell. "So, Sir, you are no great, enemy to the Roman Catholic religion." Johnson. "No more, Sir, than to the Presbyterian religion." Boswell. "You are joking." Johnson. "No, Sir, I really think so. Nay, Sir, of the two, I prefer the Popish."

Boswell. "How so, Sir?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, the Presbyterians have no church, no apostolical ordinance." Boswell. "And do you think that absolutely essential, Sir?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, as it was an apostolical institution, I think it is dangerous to be without it. And, Sir, the Presbyterians have no public worship: they have no form of prayer in which they know they are to join. They go to hear a man pray, and are to judge whether they will join with him." Boswell. "But, Sir, their doctrine is the same with that of the Church of England. Their confession of faith, and the thirty-nine articles, contain the same points, even the doctrines of predestination."—JOHN. "Why yes, Sir; predestination is a part of the amalgam of the times, so it is mentioned in our articles, but with as little positiveness as could be."—BOSWELL. "Is it necessary, Sir, to believe all the thirty-nine articles?"—JOHN. "Why, Sir, that is a question which has been much agitated. Some have thought it necessary that they should all be believed; others have considered them to be only articles of peace, that is to say, you are not to preach against them."—BOSWELL. "It appears to me, Sir, that predestination, or what is equivalent to it, cannot be avoided, if we hold an universal prescience in the Deity."—JOHN. "Why, Sir, does not God every day see things going on without preventing them?"—BOSWELL. "True, Sir; but if a thing be certainly foreseen, it must be fixed, and cannot happen otherwise; and if we apply this consideration to the human mind, there is no free will, nor do I see how prayer can be of any avail."—He mentioned Dr. Clarke, and Bishop Bramhall on Liberty and Necessity, and bid me read South's Sermons on Prayer; but avoided the question which has excruciated philosophers and divines, beyond any other. I did not press it further, when I perceived that he was displeased, and shrank from any abridgment of an attribute usually ascribed to the Divinity, however irreconcilable in its full extent with the grand system of moral government. His supposed orthodoxy here cramped the vigorous powers of his understanding. He was confined by a chain which early imagination and strong habit made him think massy and strong, but which, had he ventured to try, he could at once have snapt asunder.

I proceeded:—"What do you think, Sir, of Purgatory, as believed by the Roman Catholics?"—JOHN. "Why, Sir, it is a very difficult doctrine. They are of opinion that the generality of mankind are neither so obstinately wicked as to deserve everlasting punishment, nor so good as to merit being admitted into the society of blessed spirits; and therefore that God is graciously pleased to allow of a middle state, where they may be purified by certain degrees of suffering. You see, Sir, there is nothing unreasonable in this."

1 Dr. Simon Patrick (afterwards Bishop of Ely) thus expresses himself on this subject, in a letter to the learned Dr. John Mapleton, dated Feb. 8, 1689-90:

"I always took the Articles to be only articles of communion; and so Bishop Bramhall expressly maintains against the Bishop of Chalcedon. And I remember well, that Bishop Sanderson, when the King was first restored, received the subscription of an acquaintance of mine, which he declared was not to them as articles of faith but peace. I think you need make no scruple of the matter, because all that I know to understand of subscription, and upon other terms would not subscribe."—MALONE.

2 The solution is to be found in what Boswell states as the difficulty. All eternity is present to the Deity, and his pre-science foresees what man will have chosen, though man feels that he is free to choose. What Cowley says of Heaven, is equally true of this world, in the eye of Providence:

"Nothing there is to come, and nothing past; for both are now both that which is and that which was."

This is one of the mysteries which, though above human reason, is in no degree contrary to it. —CROKER, 1846.

3 They are sometimes rather ridiculous than idolatrous. I have now before me a Roman Catholic Prayer-book, printed at Ghent so lately as 1823, in which there is a prayer to the Virgin, addressing her as "Ma divine Princesse," and another to St. Joseph, as "Mon aimable patron." —CROKER.

and eminent instances, some of which will occur to most of my readers. When we were alone, I introduced the subject of death, and endeavoured to maintain that the fear of it might be got over. I told him that David Hume said to me, he was no more uneasy to think he should not be after this life, than that he had not been before he began to exist. Johnson. "Sir, if he really thinks so, his perceptions are disturbed; he is mad: if he does not think so, he lies. He may tell you, he holds his finger in the flame of a candle without feeling pain; would you believe him? When he dies, he at least gives up all he has." Boswell. "Foote, Sir, told me, that when he was very ill he was not afraid to die." Johnson. "It is not true, Sir. Hold a pistol to Foote's breast, or to Hume's breast, and threaten to kill them; and you'll see how they behave." Boswell. "But may we not fortify our minds for the approach of death?" —Here I am sensible I was in the wrong, to bring before his view what he ever looked upon with horror; for although, when in a celestial frame of mind, in his "Vanity of Human Wishes," he has supposed death to be "kind Nature's signal for retreat" from this state of being to "a happier seat," his thoughts upon this awful change were in general full of dismal apprehensions. His mind resembled the vast amphitheatre, the Coliseum at Rome. In the centre stood his judgment, which, like a mighty gladiator, combated those apprehensions that, like the wild beasts of the arena, were all around in cells, ready to be let out upon him. After a conflict, he drives them back into their dens; but not killing them, they were still assailing him. To my question, whether we might not fortify our minds for the approach of death, he answered, in a passion, "No, Sir, let it alone. It matters not how a man dies, but how he lives. The act of dying is not of importance, it lasts so short a time." He added (with an earnest look), "A man knows it must be so, and submits. It will do him no good to whine."

1 I do not understand this allusion. I am not aware of "many and eminent instances" of persons converted from popery to protestantism relapsing either into superstition or infidelity. I suspect that Mr. Boswell, who often alludes to Mr. Gibbon's speculation, really meant Ann in this passage, though his conversion from Protestantism to Popery and back again, which had ended in infidelity, does not exactly fit the case put by Johnson. —Croker.

2 Foote's statement did not merit so flat a contradiction: it is confirmed by those who have had the best means of speaking to the fact. Sir Henry Halford felt surprised that of the great number he has attended, "so few have appeared reluctant to die," adding, "many, we may easily suppose, have manifestly this will to die, from an impatience of suffering, or from that passive indifference, which is sometimes the result of bodily and extreme bodily pain." Essays, p. 241. There is a distinction, which neither Johnson nor Mr. Markland seem to have made, —between a visible and premature death, always terrible and even from gradually the eom of nature, under which the exhausted frame and weary spirit sink without reluctance. —Croker.

3 George Steevens, Esq., who, in the next year, became associated with Johnson in the edition of Shakespeare, which goes by their joint names. Mr. Steevens was born in 1736, and died at Hampstead in 1800. A cynical disposition and a strong turn for literary deceptions, more injurious than candid or creditable, rendered him unpopular with his acquaintance, as we shall have occasion to notice in the sequel. —Croker.

4 For an account of "Tom Tyers," as Johnson always called him, see post, April 17, 1778.

5 Johnson himself has vindicated Blackmore upon this very point. See the Lives of the Poets, vol. iii. p. 75, Svo., 1791. —J. Boswell, jun.

6 A correspondent of the European Magazine, April, 1792, has completely exposed the mistake of ascribing these lines to Blackmore, notwithstanding that Sir Richard Steele, in "The Spectator," [No. 43.] mentions them as written by the author of "The British Princes," the Ill. Edward Howard. The correspondent above-mentioned, shows this mistake to be so invertebrate, that not only I defended the lines as Blackmore, in the presence of Dr. Johnson, without any contradiction or doubt of their authenticity, but that the Rev. Mr. Whitaker has asserted in print, that he understands they were suppressed in the late editions of
I maintained it to be a poetical conceit. A Pict being painted, if he is slain in battle, and a vest is made of his skin, it is a painted vest won from him, though he was-naked.

Johnson spoke unfavourably of a certain pretty voluminous author, saying, "He used to write anonymous books, and then other books commendling those books, in which there was something of 'rascality.'"

I whispered him, "Well, Sir, you are now in good humour." "Yes, Sir." I was going to leave him, and had got as far as the staircase. He stopped me, and smiling, said, "Get you gone in," a curious mode of inviting me to stay, which I accordingly did for some time longer.

This little incidental quarrel and reconciliation, which, perhaps, I may be thought to have detailed too minutely, must be esteemed as one of many proofs which his friends had, that though he might be charged with bad humour at times, he was always a good-natured man; and I have heard Sir Joshua Reynolds, a nice and delicate observer of manners, particularly remark, that when upon any occasion Johnson had been rough to any person in company, he took the first opportunity of reconciliation, by drinking to him, or addressing his discourse to him; but if he found his dignified indirect overtures suddenly neglected, he was quite indifferent, and considered himself as having done all that he ought to do, and the other as now in the wrong.

Being to set out for Scotland on the 10th of November, I wrote to him at Streatham, begging that he would meet me in town on the 9th; but if this should be very inconvenient to him, I would go thither. His answer was as follows:

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Nov. 9, 1769.

Dear Sir,—Upon balancing the inconveniences of both parties, I find it will less inconvenience you to spend your night here, than me to come to town. I wish to see you, and am ordered by the lady of this house to invite you hither. Whether you can come or not, I shall not have any occasion of writing to you again before your marriage, and therefore tell you now, that with great sincerity I wish you happiness. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate humble servant,

Sam Johnson."

I was detained in town till it was too late on the 9th, so went to him early in the morning of the 10th of November. "Now," said he, "that you are going to marry, do not expect more from life than life will afford. You may often find yourself out of humour, and you may often think your wife not studious enough to please you; and yet you may have reason to consider yourself as upon the whole very happily married."

Talking of marriage in general, he observed, "Our marriage service is too refined. It is calculated only for the best kind of marriages; whereas, we should have a form for matches of convenience, of which there are many." 2 He agreed with me that there was no absolute necessity for having the marriage ceremony performed by a regular clergyman, for this was not commanded in Scripture, and he thought it would be easy enough to repeat to him a little epigrammatic song of mine 3 on matrimony, which Mr. Garrick had, a few days before, procured to be set to music by the very ingenious Mr. Diblein.

A Matrimonial Thought.

"In the blithe days of honey-moon,
With Kate’s allurements smitten,
I loved her late, I loved her soon,
And called her dearest kitten.

But now my kitten’s grown a cat,
And cross like other wives;
Oh! by my soul, my honest Mat,
I fear she has nine lives."

My ill-natured friend said, "It is very well, Sir; but you should not swear." Upon which I altered "Oh! by my soul," to "Alas, alas!"

He was so good as to accompany me to London, and see me into the post-chaise which was to carry me on my road to Scotland. And sure I am, that however incomparable many of the particulars recorded at this time may appear to some, they will be esteemed by the best part of my readers as genuine traits of his character, contributing together to give a full, fair, and distinct view of it.

1 Mr. Chalmers supposed that this was Dr. Hill, who used to play such tricks, not only anonymously, but under false names, such as Dr. Criciu, Dr. Uredé, and many others. Smollett has also been surmised; and as Boswell had certainly no tenderness for Hill’s character (see ante, p. 186.), the suppression of the name has been thought to favour this latter opinion. I, however, doubt both guesses, but can make no better. — Crooks.

2 It may be suspected that Mr. Boswell, in transcribing for the press, at the interval of twenty-five years, his original note, may have misrepresented Dr. Johnson’s opinion. There are, no doubt, marriages of convenience, but such often turn out to be very happy marriages — nay, Johnson himself thought they might be the happiest (March 22, 1777). Moreover, one would ask, how is the marriage ceremony too refined? It seems more open to a contrary criticism. Nor, finally, can I believe that Johnson agreed in Boswell’s Scottish views of a secular ceremony, and above all for the absurd reason stated — for it is not "commanded in Scripture," that any ceremony should be performed by a regular clergyman; and, again, if there were two services, who would ever consent to be married by that which implied some degree of degradation, or at least of inferiority? — Crooks.

3 Mr. Boswell used (as did also his eldest son, Sir Alexander) to sing in convivial society songs of his own composition. — Crooks.
In 1770, he published a political pamphlet, entitled "The False Alarm," intended to justify the conduct of the ministry and their majority in the House of Commons, for having virtually assumed it as an axiom, that the expulsion of a member of parliament was equivalent to exclusion, and thus having declared Colonel Luttrell to be duly elected for the county of Middlesex, notwithstanding Mr. Wilkes had a great majority of votes. This being justly considered as a gross violation of the right of election, an alarm for the constitution extended itself all over the kingdom. To prove this alarm to be false, was the purpose of Johnson's pamphlet; but even his vast powers were inadequate to cope with constitutional truth and reason, and his argument failed of effect; and the House of Commons have since expunged the offensive resolution from their Journals. That the House of Commons might have expelled Mr. Wilkes repeatedly, and as often as he should be re-chosen, was not denied; but incapacity cannot be but by an act of the whole legislature. It was wonderful to see how a prejudice in favour of government in general and an aversion to popular clamour, could blind and contract such an understanding as Johnson's, in this particular case; yet the wit, the sarcasm, the eloquent vivacity which this pamphlet displayed, made it be read with great avidity 1 at the time, and it will ever be read with pleasure, for the sake of its composition. That it endeavoured to infuse a narcotic indiffERENCE, as to public concerns, into the minds of the people, and that it broke out sometimes into an extreme coarseness of contemptuous abuse, is too but evident.

It must not, however, be omitted, that when the storm of his violence subsides, he takes a fair opportunity to pay a grateful compliment to the King, who had rewarded his merit: — "These low-born rulers have endeavoured, surely without effect, to alienate the affections of the people from the only King who for almost a century has much appeared to desire, or much endeavoured to deserve them." And, "Every honest man must lament, that the faction has been regarded with frigid neutrality by the Tories, who being long accustomed to signalise their principles by opposition to the Constitution, do not yet consider, that they have at last a King who knows not the name of party, and who wishes to be the common father of all his people." 2

To this pamphlet, which was at once discovered to be Johnson's, several answers came out, in which care was taken to remind the public of his former attacks upon government, and of his now being a pensioner, without allowing for the honourable terms upon which Johnson's pension was granted and accepted, or the change of system which the British court had undergone upon the accession of his present Majesty. He was, however, soothed in the highest strain of panegyric, in a poem called "The Remonstrance," by the Rev. Mr. Stockdale 3, to whom he was, upon many occasions, a kind protector.

The following admirable minute made by him, describes so well his own state, and that of numbers to whom self-examination is habitual, that I cannot omit it: —

"June 1, 1770. Every man naturally persuade himself that he can keep his resolutions, nor is he convinced of his imbecility but by length of time and frequency of experiment. This opinion of our own constancy is so prevalent, that we always despise him who suffers his general and settled purpose to be overpowered by an occasional desire. They, therefore, whom frequent failures have made despondent, cease to form resolutions; and they who are becoming eumou, do not tell them. Those who do not make them are very few, but of their effect little is perceived; for scarcely any man persists in a course of life planned by choice, but as he is restrained from deviation by some external power. He who may live as he will, seldom lives long in the observation of his own rules. I never yet saw a regular family, unless it were that of Mrs. Harriot's, nor a regular man, except Mr. — 4, whose exactness I know only by his own report, and Psalmanazer, whose life was, I think, uniform." [Pr. and Med. p. 100.]

Of this year I have obtained the following letters:

JOHNSON TO DR. FARMER.

"Johnson's Court, March 21, 1770.
Sir, — As no man ought to keep wholly to himself any possession that may be useful to the public, I hope you will not think me unreasonably intrusive, if I have recourse to you for such information as you are more able to give me than any other man.

In support of an opinion which you have already placed above the need of any more support, Mr. Steevens, a very ingenious gentleman, lately of King's College, has collected an account of all the translations which Shakespeare might have seen and used. He wishes his catalogue to be perfect, and therefore entreats that you will favour him by the insertion of such additions as the accuracy of your inquiries has enabled you to make. To this request, I take the liberty of adding my own solicitation.

1 "The False Alarm" was published by T. Cadell, in the Strand, Jan. 10, 1770; a second edition appeared Feb. 6, and a third, March 13. — Wright.

2 "This," says Mrs. Piozzi, "his first and favourite pamphlet, was written at our house, between eight o'clock on Wednesday night and twelve o'clock on Thursday night; we read it to Mr. Thrale, when he came very late home from the House of Commons." Boswell, it must be remembered, was a Whig. — Croker.

3 The Rev. Percival Stockdale, whose strange and rambling "Autobiography" was published in 1806; he was the author of several bad poems, and died in 1810, at the age of 75. He was Johnson's neighbour for some years, both in Johnson's Court and Bolt Court. — Croker.

4 The name in the original manuscript is, as Dr. Hall informed me, Campbell. The Scotch non Juring Bishop Campbell was probably the person meant. See an account of this gentleman, post, Oct. 25, 1773. — Croker.
“We have no immediate use for this catalogue, and therefore do not desire that it should interrupt or hinder your more important employments. But it will be kind to let us know that you receive it. I am, Sir &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON.”

“Dear Sirs,— Among other causes that have hindered me from answering your last kind letter, is a tedious and painful rheumatism, that has afflicted me for many weeks, and still continues to molest me. I hope you are well, and will long keep your health and your cheerfulness.

One reason why I delayed to write was, my uncertainty how to answer your letter. I like the thought of giving away the money very well; but when I consider that Tom Johnson is my nearest relation, and that he is now old and in great want; that he was my playfellow in childhood, and has never done any thing to offend me; I am in doubt, whether I ought not rather give it him than any other.

“Of this, my dear, I would have your opinion. I would willingly please you, and I know that you will be pleased best with what you think right. Tell me your mind, and do not learn of me to neglect writing; for it is a very sorry trick, though it be mine.

“Your brother is well; I saw him to-day, and thought it long since I saw him before: it seems he has called often, and could not find me. I am, my dear, your affectionate humble servant,

— Pearson MSS.

JOHNSON TO MISS PORTER.

My dearest Dear,— I am very sorry that your eyes are bad; take great care of them, especially by candlelight. Mine continue pretty good, but they are sometimes dim. My rheumatism grows gradually better. I have considered your letter, and am willing that the whole money should go where you, my dear, originally intended. I hope to help Tom some other way. So that matter is over.

“Dr. Taylor has invited me to pass some time with him at Ashbourne; if I come, you may be sure that I shall take you and Lichfield in my way. When I am nearer coming, I will send you word.

“Of Mr. Porter I have seen very little, but I know not that it is his fault, for he says that he often calls, and never finds me; I am sorry for it, for I love him. Mr. Mathias has lately had a great deal of money left him, of which you have probably heard already. I am, my dearest, your most affectionate servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.”

— Pearson MSS.

JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.

“Dear Sir,— The readiness with which you were pleased to promise me some notes on Shakespear, was a new instance of your friendship. I shall not hurry you; but am desired by Mr. Steevens, who helps me in this edition, to let you know, that we shall print the tragedies first, and shall therefore want first the notes which belong to them. We think not to incommode the readers with a supplement; and therefore, what we cannot put into its proper place, will do us no good. We shall not begin to print before the end of six weeks, perhaps not so soon. I am, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON.”

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

“Lichfield, July 7. 1770.

“I thought I should have heard something to-day about Streatham; but there is no letter; and I need some consolation, for rheumatism is come again, though in a less degree than formerly. I reckon to go next week to Ashbourne, and will try to bring you the dimensions of the great bull. The skies and the ground are all so wet, that I have been very little abroad: and Mrs. Aston is from home, so that I have no motive to walk; when she is at home, she lives on the top of Stowell, and I commonly climb up to see her once a day. There is nothing there now but the empty nest. To write to you about Lichfield is of no use, for you never saw Stowell, nor Borough-hill. I believe you may find Borrow or Borough-hill in my Dictionary, under cop or cob. Nobody here knows what the name imports.”

— Lichfield, July 11. 1770.

“Mr. Greene, the apothecary, has found a book which tells who paid levies in our parish, and how much they paid, above an hundred years ago. Do you not think we study this book hard? Nothing is like going to the bottom of things. Many families that paid the parish rates are now extinct, like the race of Hercules. Paleis et umbra sumus. What is nearest us touches us most. The passions rise higher at domestic than at imperial tragedies. I am not wholly unaffected by the revolutions in Sadler Street; nor can I forbear to mourn, when old names vanish away, and new come into their place.”

— Ashbourne, July 20. 1770.

“I came thither on Wednesday, having staid one night at a lodge in the forest of Nedwood. Dr. Taylor’s is a very pleasant house, with a lawn and a lake, and twenty deer and five fawns upon the lawn. Whether I shall by any light see Matlock I do not yet know.

“arret at his book, ["Travels through Spain, Portugal, and France,"] would please you all, I make no doubt. I know not whether the world has ever seen such travels before. Those whose

1 About the end of June he made a visit to the midland counties; some account of which, extracted from his letters to Mrs. Thrale, I have placed in the text, and shall continue to make similar extracts where necessary to fill up lacunae in Mr. Boswell’s narrative — the dates will be sufficient reference to the originals. — Chorier, 1846.

3 At the corner of which stood his own house. I have satisfied myself on the spot that Michael Johnson’s engraving was done in Sadler Street, (enthd, p. 4, n. 5.) for which he paid two shillings and sixpence a year, and a lease of which was renewed to his son, was most probably a shop bow-window, which jutted out into Sadler Street. — Chorier.
lot it is to ramble can seldom write, and those who know how to write very seldom ramble. If Sidney had gone, as he desired, the great voyage with Drake, there would probably have been such a narrative as would have equally satisfied the poet and the philosopher."

"Ashebune, July 23, 1770."

"I have seen the great bull, and very great he is. I have seen likewise his heir apparent, who promises to inherit all the bulk and all the virtues of his sire. I have seen the man who offered an hundred guineas for the young bull, while he was yet little better than a calf. Matlock, I am afraid, I shall not see, but I purpose to see Dovedale; and, after all this seeing, I hope to see you."

JOHN TO JOSEPH WARTON.

"Sept. 21, 1770."

"Dear Sir,—I am revising my edition of Shakspeare, and remember that I formerly misrepresented your opinion of Lear. Be pleased to write the paragraph as you would have it, and send it. If you have any remarks of your own upon that or any other play, I shall gladly receive them. Make my compliments to Mrs. Warton. I sometimes think of wandering for a few days to Winchester, but am apt to delay. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,"

SAM JOHNSON.

JOHN TO FRANCIS BARBER,

At Mrs. Clapp’s, Bishop-Stortford.

"London, Sept. 25, 1770."

"Dear Francis, — I am at last sat down to write to you, and should very much blame myself for having neglected you so long, if I did not impute that and many other failings to want of health. I hope not to be so long silent again. I am very well satisfied with your progress, if you can really perform the exercises which you are set; and I hope Mr. Ellis does not suffer you to impose on him, or on yourself. Make my compliments to Mr. Ellis, and to Mrs. Clapp, and Mr. Smith.

"Let me know what English books you read for your entertainment. You can never be wise unless you love reading. Do not imagine that I shall forget or forsake you; for if, when I examine you, I find that you have not lost your time, you shall want no encouragement from yours affectionately,"

SAM JOHNSON.

JOHN TO FRANCIS BARBER.

"December 7, 1770."

"Dear Francis, — I hope you mind your business. I design you shall stay with Mrs. Clapp these holidays. If you are invited out you may go, if Mrs. Ellis gives leave. I have ordered you some clothes, which you will receive, I believe, next week. My compliments to Mrs. Clapp, and to Mr. Ellis, and to Mr. Smith, &c. — I am your affectionate,"

SAM JOHNSON.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1770.

During this year there was a total cessation of all correspondence between Dr. Johnson and me, without any coldness on either side, but merely from procrastination, continued from day to day; and, as I was not in London, I had no opportunity of enjoying his company and recording his conversation. To supply this blank, I shall present my readers with some Collectanea, obligingly furnished to me by the Rev. Dr. Maxwell, of Falkland, in Ireland, some time assistant preacher at the Temple, and for many years the social friend of Johnson, who spoke of him with a very kind regard.

Collectanea.

"My acquaintance with that great and venerable character commenced in the year 1754. I was introduced to him by Mr. Grierson, his Majesty’s printer at Dublin, a gentleman of uncommon learning, and great withal vivacity. Mr. Grierson died in Germany, at the age of twenty-seven. Dr. Johnson highly respected his abilities, and often observed, that he possessed more extensive knowledge than any man of his years he had ever known. His industry was equal to his talents; and he par-written for Mr. Boswell’s publication from memory, a great many years after the events. — Croker.

1 Dr. Taylor had a remarkably fine breed of cattle; and one bull, in particular, was of celebrated size and beauty. — Croker.

2 Dr. William Maxwell was the son of Dr. John Maxwell, Archdeacon of Downe, in Ireland, and cousin of the Honourable Henry Maxwell, Bishop of Dromore in 1769, and of Meath in 1776, from whom he obtained preferment; but, having a considerable property of his own, he resigned the living when, as it is said, his residence was insisted on; and he fixed himself in Bath, where he died, so late as 1819, at the age of 87. Dr. Maxwell was deservedly proud of his acquaintance with Johnson, and has left a very beautiful style of conversation. Some of his anecdotes are thrilling, others obscure, some misprinted, and several, I suspect, mistaken; which is not surprising, as they seem to have been

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. 217

"Johnson was much attached to London; he observed, that a man stored his mind better there, than any where else; and that in remote situations a man's body might be feasted, but his mind was starved, and his faculties apt to degenerate, from want of exercise and competition. 'No place,' he said, 'cured a man's vanity or arrogance, so well as London; for as no man was either great or good per se, but as compared with others not so good or great, he was sure to find in the metropolis many of his equals, and some his superiors. He observed: so that a man in London was in less danger of falling in love indirectly, than any where else; for there the difficulty of deciding between the conflicting pretensions of a vast variety of objects, kept him safe. He told me, that he had frequently been offered country preferment, if he would consent to take orders; but he could not leave the improved society of the capital, or consent to exchange the exhilarating joys and splendid decorations of public life, for the obscurity, insipidity, and uniformity of rural situations.

'Speaking of Mr. Harte, Canon of Windsor, and writer of 'The History of Gustavus Adolphus,' he much commended him as a scholar, and a man of the most companionable talents he had ever known. He said, the defects in his History proceeded not from imbecility, but from folly. 'He loved, he said, the old black-letter books; they were rich in matter, though their style was inelegant; wonderfully so, considering how conversant the writers were with the best models of antiquity.'

Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy,' he said, was the only book that ever took him out of bed two hours sooner than he wished to rise.

'He frequently exhorted me to set about writing a History of Ireland; and arably remarked, there had been some good Irish writers, and that one Irishman might at least aspire to be equal to another. He had great compassion for the miseries and distresses of the Irish nation, particularly the Papists; and severely reproved the barbarous debilitating policy of the British government, which, he said, was the most detestable mode of persecution. To a gentleman who hinted such policy might be necessary to support the authority of the English government, he replied by saying, 'Let the authority of the English government perish, rather than be maintained by iniquity. Better would it be to restrain the turbulence of the natives by the authority of the sword, and to make them amenable to law and justice by an effectual and vigorous police, than to grind them to powder by all manner of disabilities and incapacities. 'Better,' said he, 'to hang or drown people at once, than by an unrelenting persecution to beggar and starve them.'

The moderation and humanity of the present times have, in some measure, justified the wisdom of his observations.

'Dr. Johnson was often accused of prejudices, nay, antipathy, with regard to the natives of Scotland. Surely, so illiberal a prejudice never entered his mind: and it is well known, many natives of that respectable country possessed a large share in his esteem: nor were any of them ever excluded from his good offices, as far as opportunity permitted. True it is, he considered the Scotch, nationally, as a crafty, designing people, eagerly attentive to their own interest, and too apt to overlook the claims and pretensions of other people. 'While they confine their benevolence, in a manner, exclusively to those of their own country, they expect to share in the good offices of other people. Now,' said Johnson, 'this principle is either right or wrong; if right, we should do well to imitate such conduct; if wrong, we cannot too much detest it.'

'Being solicited to compose a funeral sermon for the daughter of a tradesman, he naturally enquired into the character of the deceased; and being told she was remarkable for her humility and condescension to inferiors, he observed, that those were so laudable qualities, but it might not be so easy to discover who the lady's inferiors were.

'Of a certain player, he remarked, that his conversation usually threatened and announced more than it performed; that he fed you with a continual renovation of hope, to end in a constant succession of disappointment.

'When exasperated by contradiction, he was apt to treat his opponents with too much severity as, 'Sir, you don't see your way through that question.' —'Sir, you talk the language of ignorance.' On my observing to him, that a certain gentleman had remained silent the whole evening, in the midst of a very brilliant and learned society, 'Sir,' said he, 'the conversation overflowed, and drowned him.'

'His philosophy, though austere and solemn, was by no means morose and cynical, and never blunted the laudable sensibilities of his character, or exempted him from the influence of the tender passions. Want of tenderness, he always alleged, was want of parts, and was no less a proof of stupidity on everybody.}

'Speaking of Mr. Hanway, who published 'An Eight Days' Journey from London to Portsmouth,' 'Jonas,' said he, acquired some reputation by travelling abroad, but lost it all by travelling at home.'

'Of the passion of love he remarked, that its violence and ill effects were much exaggerated; for who knows any real sufferings on that head, more than from the exorbitancy of any other passion? '

'He much commended 'Law's Serious Call,' which, he said, was the finest piece of hortatory

1 suspect "frequently" to be an error — the offer of the living of Langton (ante, p. 105, and 160) is the only one mentioned by Boswell.—Croker, 1816.
2 Walter Harte, born about 1707, A. M. of St. Mary Hall, in Oxford, was tutor to Lord Chesterfield's natural son, Mr. Stephens, and was, by his Lordship's interest, made Canon of Windsor; he died in 1774. See more of Harte, post, March 30, 1781. Croker.
3 Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy' is the most amusing and instructive medley of quotations and classical anecdotes I ever perused. If the reader has patience to go through his volumes, he will be more improved for literary conversation than by the perusal of any twenty other works with which I am acquainted." — Byron, vol. i. p. 144. — Wright.

4 Dr. Maxwell was mistaken, and would assuredly not have made such a statement after the publication of this work. Boswell himself confesses the antipathy, but it would be curious to know when it became so strong, and what its cause was, for one would have expected a directly contrary result from the Jacobite principles of his father and himself. — Croker.

thology in any language. "Law," said he, "fell latterly into the revires of Jacob Behmen, 1 whom Law alleged to have been a disciple of a certain "new sect," with Mr. Paul, and to have seen unutterable things." Were it even so," said Johnson, "Jacob would have resembled St. Paul still more, by not attempting to utter them.

"He observed, that the established clergy in general did not preach plain enough; and that polished periods and glittering sentences flew over the heads of the common people without any impression upon their hearts. Something might be necessary, he observed, to excite the affections of the common people, who were sunk in languor and listlessness, and that indeed he supposed that the new concomitants of Methodism might probably produce so desirable an effect. The mind, like the body, he observed, delighted in change and novelty, and, even in religion itself, courted new appearances and modifications. Whatsoever might be thought of some Methodist teachers, he said he could scarcely doubt the sincerity of that man, who travelled nine hundred miles in a month, and preached twelve times in a week; for no adequate reward, merely temporal, could be given for such indefatigable labour."

"Of Dr. Priestley's theological works, he remarked, that they tended to unsettle every thing, and yet settled nothing."

"He was much affected by the death of his mother, and wrote to me to come and assist him to compose his mind; which, indeed, I found greatly agitated. He lamented that all serious and religious conversation was banished from the society of men, and yet great advantages might be derived from it. All acknowledged, he said, what hardly any body practised, the obligations we were under of making the concerns of eternity the governing principles of our lives. Every man, he observed, at last wishes for retreat; he sees his expectations frustrated in the world, and begins to wean himself from it, and to prepare for everlasting separation."

"He observed, that the influence of London now extended every where, and that from all manner of communication being opened, there shortly would be no remains of the ancient simplicity, or places of cheap retreat to be found."

"He was no admirer of blank verse, and said it always failed, unless sustained by the dignity of the subject. In blank verse, he said, the language suffered more distortion, to keep it out of prose, than any inconvenience or limitation to be apprehended from the shackles and circumspection of rhyme."

"He reproved me once for saying grace without mention of the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and hoped in future I would be more mindful of the apostolical injunction. 8"

"He refused to go out of a room before me at Mr. Langton's house, saying he hoped he knew his rank better than to presume to take place of a doctor in divinity. I mention such little anecdotes merely to show the peculiar turn and habit of his mind."

"He used frequently to observe, that there was more to be endured than enjoyed, in the general condition of human life; and frequently quoted those lines of Dryden:—"

Strange cozenage! many would live past years again,
Yet all that charm'd us from what still remain."

For his part, he said, he never passed that week in his life which he would wish to repeat, were an angel to make the proposal to him.

"He was of opinion, that the English nation cultivated both their soil and their reason better than any other people; but admitted that the French, though not the highest, perhaps, in any department of literature, yet in every department were very high. Intellectual pre-eminence, he observed, was the highest superiority; and that every nation derived their highest reputation from the splendour and dignity of their writers. Voltaire, he said, was a good monitor, and that his principal merit consisted in the happy selection and arrangement of circumstances."

"Speaking of the French novels, compared with Richardson's, he said, they might be pretty baubles, but a wen was not an eagle."

"In a Latin conversation with the Père Bosco ev 6, at the house of Mrs. Cholmondely, I heard him maintain the superiority of Sir Isaac Newton over all foreign philosophers, 4 with a dignity and eloquence that surprised that learned foreigner. It being observed to him, that a rage for every thing English prevailed much in France after Lord Ch架构's glorious war, he said, he did not wonder at it, for that we had drubbed those fellows into a proper reverence for us, and that their national petulance required periodic chastisement."

"Lord Lyttleton's Dialogues 6 he deemed a nugatory performance. 'That man,' said he, 'sat down to write a book, to tell the world what the world had all his life been telling him.'"

"Somebody observing that the Scotch Highlanders, in the year 1745, had made surprising efforts, considering their numerous wants and disadvantages; 'Yes, Sir,' said he, 'their wants were numerous; but you have not mentioned the greatest of them all—the want of law.' 7"

He was an inveterate enemy of the University of Heidelberg where he was expelled in 1642. Mr. Law passed many of the latter years of his life in translating Behmen's works, four volumes of which were published after Mr. Law's death. — Croker.

2 Alluding, I suppose, to Ephesians, ch. v. ver. 20.— "Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." But many devout people think that, becoming a general Thanksgiving, at meals may be, the special introduction of the awful word of our Lord Jesus Christ 1 under some external circumstances; or that all the family, if they could be occasionally invited to attend the beginning and end of a dinner is far less edifying. It is, I believe, a modern addition to the old text of the Bible, and is not only not required but absolutely unnecessary. Law, certainly, would have been the least want of an invading army. John d, perhaps, meant either that they had not the law on their side, or they had not legal means of enforcing discipline. I have before (p. 54 n. 2) expressed my suspicion, that Johnson had conceived some personal affront or injustice from the Scotch in 1745; but how or where he could have come across them, I cannot conjecture. — Croker.
"Of Dr. Kennicott's Collations, I observed, that though the text should not be much mended thereby, yet it was no small advantage to know that we had as good a text as the most consummate industry and diligence could procure."

"Johnson observed, that so many objections might be made to every thing, that nothing could overcome them but the necessity of doing something. No man would be of any profession, as simply opposed to not being of it: but every one must do something."

"He remarked, that a London parish was a very comfortless thing: for the clergyman seldom knew the face of one out of ten of his parishioners."

"Of the late Mr. Mallet he spoke with no great respect: said, he was ready for any dirty job; that he had written against Byng at the instigation of the ministry, and was equally ready to write for him, provided he found his account in it."

"A gentleman who had been very unhappy in marriage, married immediately after his wife died: Johnson said, it was the triumph of hope over experience."

"He observed, that a man of sense and education should meet a suitable companion in a wife. It was a miserable thing when the conversation could only be such as whether the mutton should be boiled or roasted, and probably a dispute about that."

"He did not approve of late marriages, observing that more was lost in point of time, than compensated for by any possible advantages. Even ill- assorted marriages were preferable to cheerless celibacy."

"Of old Sheridan he remarked, that he neither wanted parts nor literature; but that his vanity and Quixotism obscured his merits."

"He said, loppery was never cured; it was the bad stamina of the mind, which, like those of the body, were never rectified: once a coxcomb, and always a coxcomb."

"Being told that Gilbert Cooper called him the Caliban of literature. 'Well,' said he, 'I must dub him the Punchinello.'"

"Speaking of the old Earl of Cork and Orrery, he said, 'That man spent his life in catching at an object (literary eminence), which he had not power to grasp.'"

"To find a substitution for violated morality, he said, was the leading feature in all perversions of religion."

"He often used to quote, with great pathos, those fine lines of Virgil: —

"Optima queque dies miseric mortuibus avi
Prima fugit; subeunt morbi, tristisque senectus, Et labor, et durae inclementia mortis."
"Speaking of Homer, whom he venerated as the prince of poets, Johnson remarked, that the advice given to Diomed by his father, when he sent him to the Trojan war, was the noblest exhortation that could be instanced in any heathen writer, and comprised in a single line:—

Αἰνὲς ἀριστεόν καὶ υπεύρχον ζωμέων ἄλλων:

which, if I recollect well, is translated by Dr. Clarke thus:— simper appetere praestantissimo, et omnium alius antecellere.

"He observed, 'it was a most mortifying reflection for any man to consider, what he had done, compared with what he might have done.'

"He said few people had intellectual resources sufficient to forego the pleasures of wine. They could not otherwise contrive how to fill the interval between dinner and supper.

"He went with me, one Sunday, to hear my old master, Gregory Sharpe, preach at the Temple. In Homer's words, and as another, a head of Augustus, as appears from the envelopes of his letters. — CROKER.

"One evening at Mrs. Montagu's, where a splendid company had assembled, consisting of the most eminent literary characters, I thought he seemed highly pleased with the respect and attention that were shown him, and asked him, on our return home, if he was not highly gratified by his visit. 'No, Sir,' said he, 'not highly gratified; yet I do not, a less provision for the poor is the true test of civilisation. Gentleman of education,' he observed, 'were pretty much the same in all countries; the condition of the lower orders, the poor especially, was the true mark of national discrimination.'

2 Dr. Maxwell's memory has deceived him. Glaucus is the person who received this counsel; and Clarke's translation of the passage (I. v. 1. 208.) is as follows:—'Ut simper fortissime versus gerruem, et superior virtute casum alius.' — J. Boswell, jun. Pope's version is—

9 "Spending of a certain prelate," who exerted himself very laudably in building churches and parsonage houses; 'however,' said he, 'I do not find that he is esteemed a man of much professional learning, or a liberal patron of it:— but, it is well where a man possesses any strong positive excellence. Few have all kinds of merit belonging to their character. We must not examine matters too deeply. No, Sir, a fallible being will fail somewhere.

"Talking of the Irish clergy, he said, 'Swift was a man of great parts, and the instrument of much good to his country. Berkeley was a profound scholar, as well as a man of fine imagination; but Usher,' he said, 'was the great luminary of the Irish church; and a greater,' he added, 'no church could boast of; at least in modern times.'

"We dined tête-à-tête at the Mitre, as I was preparing to return to Ireland, after an absence of many years. I regretted much leaving London, where I had formed many agreeable connections: 'Sir,' he said, 'I don't wonder at it: no man, fond of letters, leaves London without regret. But remember, Sir, you have seen and enjoyed a great deal;—you have seen life in its highest decorations, and the world has nothing new to exhibit. No man is so well qualified to leave public life as he who has long enjoyed and known it well. We are always handkerking after untired situations, and imagining greater felicity from them than they can afford. No, Sir. knowledge and virtue may be acquired in all countries, and your local consequence will make you some amends for the intellectual gratifications you relinquish.' Then he quoted the following lines with great pathos:

"He who has early known the pomp of state,
(For things unknown 'tis ignorance to condemn;)
And having view'd the grandy bait,
Can truly be the trifle I content;
With such a one contented could I live,
Contented could I die.'

"He then took a most affecting leave of me; said, he knew it was a point of duty that called me away. — 'We shall all be sorry to lose you,' said he: 'laudato tenui.'"

In 1771 he published another political pamphlet, entitled "Thoughts on the late Transactions respecting Falkland's Islands," in which, upon materials furnished to him by ministry, and upon general topics, expanded in his rich style, he successfully endeavoured to persuade the nation that it was wise and laudable to suffer the question of right to remain undecided, rather than involve our country in another war. It has been suggested by some, with what truth I shall not take upon me to decide, that he rated the consequence of those islands to Great Britain too low. But however this may be, every humane mind must surely applaud the earnestness with which he averted the calamity of war; a calamity so dreadful, that it is astonishing how civilised, nay, Christian nations, can deliberately continue to renew it. His description of its miseries, in

I 'in her best array contented could I live, Contented could I die. But O, my mind,
Imaginary scenes of this degree
With hopes of joys impossible to find.'"

Another instance of Johnson's retaining in his memory verses by obscure authors is given post, Aug. 27, 1773.

In the autumn of 1782, when he was at BRIGHTHelmstone, he frequently accompanied Mr. Philip Metcalfe in his chaise, to take the air; and the conversation in one of their excursions happened to turn on a celebrated historian, [too doubt Gibbon], since deceased, he repeated, with great precision, some verses, as very characteristic of that gentleman. These furnish another proof of what has been above observed; for they are found in a very obscure quarter, among some anonymous poems appended to the second volume of a collection frequently printed by Lintot, under the title of "Pope's Miscellanies":

"See how the wand'ring Danube flows,
Reams and religions parting;
A friend to all true christian foes,
To Peter, Jack, and Martin.

"Now Protestant, and Papist now,
Not constant long to either,
At length an infidel does grow,
And ends his journey neither.

"Thus many a youth I've known set out,
Half Protestant, half Papist,
And rambling long the world about,
Turn infidel or atheist.'"

In reciting these verses, I have no doubt that Johnson substituted some word for infidel [perhaps Musulmam] in the second stanza, to avoid the disagreeable repetition of the same expression.

MALONE.
this pamphlet, is one of the finest pieces of eloquence in the English language. Upon this occasion, too, we find Johnson lashing the party in opposition with unabated severity, and making the fullest use of what he ever reckoned a most effectual argumentative instrument,—contempt. His character of their very able mysterious champion, Junius, is executed with all the force of his genius, and finished with the highest care. He seems to have exulted in sallying forth to single combat against the boasted and formidable hero, who bade defiance to "principalities and powers, and the rulers of this world." 1

This pamphlet, it is observable, was softened in one particular, after the first edition; for the conclusion of Mr. George Grenville's character stood thus: "Let him not, however, be depreciated in his grave. He had powers not universally possessed; could he have enforced payment of the Manilla ransom, he could have counted it." Which, instead of retaining its sly sharp point, was reduced to a mere flat unmeaning expression, or, if I may use the word,—truism: "He had powers not universally possessed: and if he sometimes erred, he was likewise sometimes right.

JOHNSON TO LANGTON.

"March 20, 1771.

Dear Sir,—After much lingering of my own, and much of the ministry, I have, at length, got out my paper. But delay is not yet at an end. Not many had been dispersed, before Lord North ordered the sale to stop. His reasons I do not distinctly know. You may try to find them in the perusal. Before his order, a sufficient number were dispersed to do all the mischief, though, perhaps, not to make all the sport that might be expected from it.

Soon after your departure, I had the pleasure of finding all the danger past with which your navigation was threatened. 2 I hope nothing happens at home to abate your satisfaction; but that Lady Rothes 3, and Mrs. Langton and the young ladies, are all well.

"I was last night at the Club. Dr. Percy has written a long ballad 4 in many fits; it is pretty enough. He has printed, and will soon publish it. Goldsmith is at Bath, with Lord Clare. 5 At Mr. Thrale's, where I am now writing, all are well. I am, dear Sir, your most humble servant,

S. Johnson." 6

Mr. Strahan, the printer, who had been long in intimacy with Johnson, in the course of his literary labours, who was at once his friendly agent in receiving his pension for him, and his banker in supplying him with money when he wanted it; who was himself now a member of parliament, and who loved much to be employed in political negotiation; thought he should do eminent service, both to government and Johnson, if he could be the means of his getting a seat in the House of Commons. With this view, he wrote a letter to one of the Secretaries of the Treasury 7, of which he gave me a copy in his own handwriting, which is as follows:

MR. STRAHAN TO ——.

"New Street, March 30, 1771.

Sir,—You will easily recollect, when I had the honour of waiting upon you some time ago, I took the liberty to observe to you, that Dr. Johnson would make an excellent figure in the House of Commons, and heartily wished he had a seat there.

My reasons are briefly these: "I know his perfect good affection to his Majesty and his government, which I am certain he wishes to support by every means in his power.

He possesses a great share of manly, nervous, and ready eloquence; is quick in discerning the are very comic, and were no doubt drawn from nature; but Goldsmith ought to have confessed that he had borrowed the idea and some of the details from Bolleau. —Croker.

One evening, in the oratorio season of 1771, Mr. Johnson went with Mrs. Thrale to Covent Garden; and though he was for the most part an exceeding bad playhouse companion, as his person drew people's eyes upon the box, and the loudness of his voice made it difficult to hear anybody but himself, he sat surprisingly quiet, and she flattered herself that he was listening to the music. When they got home, however, he repeated these verses, which he said he had made at the oratorio:—

IN THEATRE.

Tertii versus quater orbis lustris,
Quid theatrales tibi, Crispie, pompae?
Quam decet caucis malo literaturos?
Sera voluptas!

Tene mulceti fabulae canoris?
Tene canto rum nostris stupere?
Tene per pictas, oculo elegante,
Crudere formas?

Inter equeles, sine feliibiera,
Codices, veri studiosi, inter,
Rectius vivas: sua quiaque carpent,
Gaudias gratus.

Lusibus gaudent pauer oediobis,
Lusibus oblectat juvenem theatri,
At sensi, luxo sapienter uti Temporis restat. —Croker.

7 The secretaries of the Treasury, at this time, were Sir Grey Cooper and James West, Esq. —Croker.
strength and weakness of an argument; can express himself with clearness and precision, and fears the face of no man alive.

"His known character, as a man of extraordinary sense and unimpeached virtue, would secure him the attention of the House, and could not fail to give him a proper weight there.

"He is capable of the greatest application, and can undergo any degree of labour, where he sees it necessary, and where his heart and affections are strongly engaged. His Majesty's ministers might therefore securely depend on his doing, upon every proper occasion, the utmost that could be expected from him. They would find him ready to vindicate such measures as tended to promote the stability of government, and resolute and steady in carrying them into execution. Nor is any thing to be apprehended from the supposed impetuousity of his temper. To the friends of the king you will find him a lamb, to his enemies a lion.

"For these reasons I humbly apprehend that he would be a valuable and useful member. And I will venture to say, the employment would not be disagreeable to him; and knowing, as I do, his strong affection to the king, his ability to serve him in that capacity, and the extreme ardour with which I am convinced he would engage in that service, I must repeat, that I wish most heartily to see him in the House.

"If you think this worthy of attention, you will be pleased to take a convenient opportunity of mentioning it to Lord North. If his lordship should happily approve of it, I shall have the satisfaction of having been, in some degree, the humble instrument of doing my country, in my opinion, a very essential service. I know your good-nature, and your zeal for the public welfare, will plead my excuse for giving you this trouble. I am, with the greatest respect, Sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

"WILLIAM STRAHAN."

This recommendation, we know, was not effectual; but how, or for what reason, can only be conjectured. It is not to be believed that Mr. Strahan would have applied, unless Johnson had approved of it. I never heard him mention the subject; but at a later period of his life, when Sir Joshua Reynolds told him that Mr. Edmund Burke had said, that if he had come early into parliament, he certainly would have been the greatest speaker that ever was there, Johnson exclaimed, "I should like to try my hand now."

---

1 Hawkins tells us that Mr. Thrale made a like attempt.

"Mr. Thrale, a man of slow conceptions, but of a sound judgment, entertained a design of bringing Johnson into parliament. We must suppose that he had previously determined to furnish him with a legal qualification, and Johnson, it is certain, was willing to accept the trust. Mr. Thrale had two meetings with the minister, who, at first, seemed inclined to find him a seat; but, whether upon con eration he doubted his fitness for his purpose, or that he thought himself in no need of his assistance, the project failed. Johnson was a little sourred at this disappointment; he was not himself in the least concerned in it."

Lord Stowell told me, that it was understood amongst Johnson's friends that "Lord North was afraid that Johnson would be a man of himself and danger. If so, it was certain Mr. Johnson had been sometimes embarrassing." "He perhaps thought, and not unreasonably," added Lord Stowell, "that, like the elephant in the battle, he was quite as likely to trample down his friends as his foes." This, and perhaps some dissatisfac tion with Lord North, concerning the Falkland Islands pamphlet, may, as Hawkins suggests, have given Johnson that distaste that he certainly felt towards Lord North.

2 Dr. Kippis, however, (Biog. Brit. art. "J. Gilbert Cooper," p. 266. n. new edit.) says, that he "once heard Dr. Johnson speak in the Society of Arts and Manufactures, upon a subject relative to mechanics, with a propriety, perspicuity, and energy, which excited general admiration."—Malone. I cannot give credit to Dr. Kippis's account against Johnson's own statement, vouch'd by Lord Stowell and Mr. Harison; but even if we could, one speech in the Society of Arts was not test of what Johnson might have been able to do in parliament; and it may be suspected that, at the age of sixty-two, he, with all his talents, would have failed to acquire that peculiar tact and dexterity, without which even great abilities do not succeed in that very fastidious assem bly. — Croker.
the least abated, yet I have deferred for almost a year and a half to write to him."

In the subsequent part of this letter, I gave him an account of my comfortable life as a married man 1 and a lawyer in practice at the Scotch bar; invited him to Scotland, and promised to attend him to the Highlands and Hebrides.

JOHN TO BOSWELL.

"London, June 20. 1771.

"Dear Sir,—If you are now able to comprehend that I might neglect to write without diminution of affection, you have taught me, likewise, how that neglect may be uneasily felt without resentment. I wished for your letter a long time, and when it came, it amply recompensed the delay, I never was so much pleased as now with your account of yourself; and sincerely hope, that between public business, improving studies, and domestic pleasures, neither melancholy nor caprice will find any place for entrance. Whatever philosophy may determine of material nature, it is certainly true of intellectual nature, that it abhors a vacuum: our minds cannot be empty; and evil will break in upon them, if they are not pre-occupied by good. My dear Sir, mind your studies, mind your business, make your lady happy, and be a good Christian. After this,

3. Portare centis.

"If we perform our duty, we shall be safe and steady, 'Sit per,' &c. whether we climb the Highlands, or are tossed among the Hebrides; and I hope the time may come when we may try our powers both with cliffs and water. I see but little of Lord Elibank, 2 I know not why; perhaps by my own fault. I am this day going into Staffordshire and Derbyshire for six weeks. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate and most humble servant,

S. M. JONSON."

[JOHN TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"Lichfield, June 22. 1771.

"Last night I came safe to Lichfield; this day I was visited by Mrs. Cobb. This afternoon I went to Mrs. Ashton, where I found Miss T[urton], and waited on her home. Miss T[urton] wears spectacles, and can hardly climb the stairs. I was not tired at all, either last night or to-day."

Miss Porter is very kind to me. Her dog and cats are all well.

"Ashbourne, July 3. 1771.

"Last Saturday I came to Ashbourne—Ashbourne in the Peak. Let not the barren name of the Peak terrify you; I have never wanted strawberries and cream. The great bull has no disease but age. I hope in time to be like the great bull."

"Ashbourne, July 7. 1771.

"Poor Dr. Taylor is ill, and under my government: you know that the art of government is learned by obedience; I hope I can govern very tolerably. The old rheumatism is come again into my face and mouth, but nothing yet to the lumber; however, having so long thought it gone, I do not like its return. Miss Porter was much pleased to be mentioned in your letter, and is sure that I have spoken better of her than she deserved. She holds that both Frank and his master are much improved. The master, she says, is not half so lounging and moody as he was; there was no such thing last year as getting him off his chair."

"Ashbourne, July 8. 1771.

"Dr. Taylor is better, and is gone out in the Chase. My rheumatism is better too. I would have been glad to go to Hagley, in compliance with Mr. Lyttleton's kind invitation, for, beside the pleasure of his company, I should have had the opportunity of recollecting past times, and wandering per montes notos et fluminis notas, of recalling the images of sixteen, and reviewing my conversations with poor Ford. 3 But this year will not bring this gratification within my power. I promised Taylor a month. Every thing is done here to please me; and his health is a strong reason against desertion."

JOHN TO REYNOLDS,

In Leicester Fields.

"Ashbourne, July 17. 1771.

"Dear Sir,—When I came to Lichfield, I found that my portrait 4 had been much visited, and much admired. Every man has a lurking wish to appear considerable in his native place; and I was pleased with the dignity conferred by such a testimony of your regard.

"Be pleased, therefore, to accept the thanks of Sir, your most oblig'd, and most humble servant,

S. M. JONSON."

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"Edinburgh, July 27. 1771.

"My dear Sir,—The bearer of this, Mr. Beattie, professor of moral philosophy at Aberdeen, is desirous of being introduced to your acquaintance. His genius and learning, and labours in the service of virtue and religion, render him very worthy of it; and as he has a high esteem of your character, I hope you will give him a favourable reception. I ever am, &c.,

JAMES BOSWELL.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRANE.
(Extract.)

"Lichfield, Saturday, Aug. 3. 1771.

"Having stayed my month with Taylor, I came away on Wednesday, leaving him, I think, in a disposition of mind not very uncommon, at once weary of my stay, and grieved at my departure. My purpose was to have made haste to you and Streatham; and who would have expected that I should have been stopped by Lucy? Hearing me give Francis orders to take our places, she told me that I should not go till after next week. I thought proper to comply; for I was pleased to find that I could please, and proud of showing you that I do not come an universal outcast. Lucy is likewise a very peremptory maiden; and if I had gone without permission, I am not very sure that I might have been welcome at another time."

JOHNSON TO LANGTON,
At Langton.

"August 29, 1771.

"Dear Sir,—I am lately returned from Staffordshire and Derbyshire. The last letter mentions two others which you have written to me since you received my pamphlet. Of these two I never had but one, in which you mentioned a design of visiting Scotland, and, in consequence, put my journey to Langton out of my thoughts. My summer wanderings are now over, and I am engaging in a very great work, the revision of my Dictionary; from which I know not, at present, how to get loose. If you have observed, or been told, any errors or omissions, you will do me a great favour by letting me know them.

"Lady Rothes, I find, has disappointed you and herself. Ladies will have these tricks. The Queen and Mrs. Thrane, both ladies of experience, yet both missed their reckoning this summer. I hope, a few months will recompense your uneasiness.

"Please to tell Lady Rothes how highly I value the honour of her invitation, which it is my purpose to obey as soon as I have disengaged myself. In the mean time I shall hope to hear often of her ladyship, and every day better news and better, till I hear that you have both the happiness, which to both is very sincerely wished, by Sir, your most affectionate and most humble servant.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

In October I again wrote to him, thanking him for his last letter, and his obliging reception of Mr. Beattie; informing him that I had been at Alnwick lately, and had good accounts of him from Dr. Percy.

[JOHNSON TO GARRICK.

"Dear Sir,—I have thought upon your epitaph, but without much effect. An epitaph is no easy thing.

"Of your three stanzas, the third is utterly unworthy of you. The first and third together give no discriminative character. If the first alone were to stand, Hogarth would not be distinguished from any other man of intellectual eminence. Suppose you worked upon something like this:

"The Hand of Art here torpid lies
That traced the essential form of Grace:
Here Death has closed the curious eyes
That saw the manners in the face.

"If Genius warm thee, Reader, stay,
If Merit touch thee, shed a tear;
Be Vice and Dulness far away!
Great Hogarth’s honour’d dust is here."

"In your second stanza, pictured morals is a beautiful expression, which I would wish to retain; but learn and mourn cannot stand for rhymes. Art and nature have been seen together too often. In the first stanza is feeling, in the second feel. Feeling for tenderness or sensibility is a word merely colloquial, of late introduction, not yet sure enough of its own existence to claim a place upon a stone. If thou hast neither, is quite prose, and prose of the familiar kind. Thus easy is it to find faults, but it is hard to make an Epitaph.

"When you have reviewed it, let me see it again: you are welcome to any help that I can give, on condition that you make my compliments to Mrs. Garrick. I am, dear Sir, your most, &c.,—MS."

"SAM. JOHNSON."

In his religious record of this year we observe that he was better than usual, both in body and mind, and better satisfied with the regularity of his conduct. But he is still "trying his ways," too rigorously. He charges himself with not rising early enough; yet he mentions what was surely a sufficient excuse for this, supposing it to be a duty seriously required, as he all his life appears to have thought it:—"One great hindrance is want of rest; my nocturnal complaints grow less troublesome.

provement, of Garrick’s,—who, however, took Johnson’s advice in suppressing an introductory stanza, and certainly adopted some others of his suggestions. The epitaph finally appeared in Chiswick Church in this shape:

Farewell, great painter of mankind, Who reached the noblest point of art; Whose pictured morals charm the mind, And through the eye correct the heart.

If genius fire thee, Reader, stay; If nature touch thee, drop a tear; If neither move thee, turn away.

For Hogarth’s honoured dust lies here!

some towards morning; and I am tempted to repair the deficiencies of the night." [Pr. and Med. p. 104.] Alas! how hard would it be, if this indulgence were to be imputed to a sick man as a crime. In his retrospect on the following Easter-eve, he says, "When I review the last year, I am able to recollect so little done, that shame and sorrow, though perhaps too weakly, come upon me." [p. 109.] Had he been judging of any one else in the same circumstances, how clear would he have been on the favourable side. How very difficult, and in my opinion almost constitutionally impossible, it was for him to be raised early, even by the strongest resolutions, appears from a note in one of his little paper-books (containing words arranged for his Dictionary), written, I suppose, about 1753:—"I do not remember that, since I left Oxford, I ever rose early by mere choice, but once or twice at Edial, and two or three times for the Rambler." I think he had fair ground enough to have quieted his mind on the subject, by concluding that he was physically incapable of what is at best but a commodious regulation.

In 1772 he was altogether quiescent as an author; but it will be found, from the various evidences which I shall bring together, that his mind was acute, lively, and vigorous.

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"Feb. 27, 1772.

Dear Sir,—Be pleased to send to Mr. Banks, whose place of residence I do not know, this note, which I have sent open, that, if you please, you may read it. When you send it, do not use your own seal. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MR. BANKS.

"Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, Feb. 27, 1772.

Perpetua ambitia his terrâ præmia lactis
Hae habet altrici Capra secunda Jovis."

Sir,—I return thanks to you and to Dr. Solander, for the pleasure which I received in yesterday's conversation. I could not recollect a motto for your Goat, but have given her one. You, Sir, may perhaps have an epic poem from some happier pen than, Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"My dear Sir,—It is hard that I cannot prevail on you to write to me oftener. But I am convinced that it is in vain to expect from you a private correspondence with any regularity. I must, therefore, look upon you as a fountain of wisdom, from whence few rills are communicated to a distance, and which must be approached at its source, to partake fully of its virtues."

"I am coming to London soon, and am to appear in an appeal from the Court of Session in the House of Lords. A schoolmaster in Scotland was, by a court of inferior jurisdiction, deprived of his office, for being somewhat severe in the chastisement of his scholars. The Court of Session, considering it to be dangerous to the interest of learning and education, to lessen the dignity of teachers, and make them afraid of too indulgent parents,instigated by the complaints of their children, restored him. His enemies have appealed to the House of Lords, though the salary is only twenty pounds a year. I was counsel for him here. I hope there will be little fear of a reversal; but I must beg to have your aid in my plan of supporting the decree. It is a general question, and not a point of particular law. I am, &c.,

"JAMES BOSWELL."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"March 15, 1772.

Dear Sir,—That you are coming so soon to town I am very glad; and still more glad that you are coming as an advocate, I think nothing more likely to make your life pass happily away, than that consciousness of your own value, which eminence in your profession will certainly confer. If I can give you any collateral help, I hope you do not suspect that it will be wanting. My kindness for you has neither the merit of singular virtue, nor the reproach of singular prejudice. Whether to love you be right or wrong, I have many on my side: Mrs. Thrale loves you, and Mrs. Williams loves you, and, what would have inclined me to love you, if I had been neutral before, you are a great favourite of Dr. Beattie. Of Dr. Beattie I should have thought much, but that his lady puts him out of my head; she is a very lovely woman.

The ejection which you come hither to oppose, appears very cruel, unreasonable, and oppressive. I should think there could not be much doubt of your success.

My health grows better, yet I am not fully recovered. I believe it is held, that men do not recover very fast after three scores. I hope yet to see Beattie's college; and have not given up the western voyage. But however all this may be or not, let us try to make each other happy when we meet, and not refer our pleasure to distant times or distant places.

How comes it that you tell me nothing of your lady? I hope to see her some time, and till then shall be glad to hear of her. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

Dear Sir,—I congratulate you and Lady Rotheries on your little man, and hope you will all be Deserving both her master's care and love.

many years happy together. Poor Miss Langton can have little part in the joy of her family. She this day called her aunt Langton to receive the sacrament with her; and made me talk yesterday on such subjects as suit her condition. It will probably be her viaticum. I surely need not mention again that she wishes to see her mother. I am, Sir, your most humble servant.

[JOHNSON TO MISS LANGTON.

"London, April 17. 1771."

"Madam,—If I could have flattered myself that my letters could have given pleasure, or have alleviated pain, I should not have omitted to write to a lady to whom I do sincerely wish every increase of pleasure, and every mitigation of uneasiness.

"I knew, dear Madam, that a very heavy affliction had fallen upon you; but it was one of those which the established course of nature makes necessary, and to which kind words give no relief. Success is, on these occasions, to be expected only from time.

"Your censure of me, as deficient in friendship, is therefore too severe. I have neither been unfriendly, nor intentionally unfeeling. The notice which with you have honoured me, I have neither forgotten, nor remembered without pleasure. The calamity of ill health, your brother will tell you that I have had, since I saw you, sufficient reason to know and to pity. But this is another evil against which we can receive little help from one another. I can only advise you, and I advise you with great earnestness, to do nothing that may hurt you, and to reject nothing that may do you good. To preserve health is a moral and religious duty: for health is the basis of all social virtues; we can be useful no longer than while we are well.

"If the family knows that you receive this letter, you will be pleased to make my compliments. I flatter myself with the hopes of seeing Langton after Lady Rother's recovery; and then I hope that you and I shall renew our conferences, and that I shall find you willing as formerly to talk and to hear; and shall be again admitted to the honour of being, Madam, your most obedient and most humble servant,

S. J."

On the 21st of March, I was happy to find myself again in my friend's study, and was glad to see my old acquaintance, Mr. Francis Bar- ber, who was now returned home. Dr. John- son received me with a hearty welcome; say- ing, "I am glad you are come, and you are come upon such an errand." (alluding to the cause of the schoolmaster.) Boswell. "I hope, Sir, he will be in no danger. It is a very delicate matter to interfere between a master and his scholars: nor do I see how you can fix the degree of severity that a master may use.

"But if you are of opinion that the school- master be a Scotchman, and you call upon him to check your children, I will not interfere."

"But if you are of opinion that the school- master be a Scotchman, and you call upon him to check your children, I will not interfere."

Johnson. "Why, Sir, till you can fix the de- gree of obstinacy and negligence of the scholars, you cannot fix the degree of severity of the master. Severity must be continued until obstinacy be subdued, and negligence be cured. He mentioned the severity of Hunter, his own master. "Sir," said I, "Hunter is a Scotch name: so it should seem this school- master who beat you so severely was a Scotchman. I can now account for your prejudice against the Scotch."

"Why, Sir, he was not Scotch; and, abating his brutality, he was a very good master."

We talked of his two political pamphlets, "The False Alarm," and "Thoughts concerning Falkland's Islands." Johnson. "Well, Sir, which of them did you think the best?" Boswell. "I liked the second best." Johnson. "Why, Sir, I liked the first best; and Beattie liked the first best. Sir, there is a subtlety of disquisition in the first, that is worth all the fire of the second." Boswell. "Pray, Sir, is it true that Lord North paid you a visit, and that you got two hundred a year in addition to your pension?" Johnson. "No, Sir. Except what I had from the bookseller, I did not get a farthing by them. And, between you and me, I believe Lord North is no friend to me."

Boswell. "How so, Sir?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, you cannot account for the fancies of men. Well, how does Lord Elibank? and how does Lord Monboddo?" Boswell. "Very well, Sir. Lord Monboddo still maintains the superiority of the savage life." Johnson. "What strange narrowness of mind now is that, to think the things we have not known, are better than the things which we have known." Boswell. "Why, Sir, that is a common prejudice." Johnson. "Yes, Sir, but a common prejudice should not be found in one whose trade it is to rectify error."

A gentleman having come in was surprised to see me in the library, and to hear what were the names of the ships destined for the expedition. The gentleman answered, they were once to be called the Drake and the Raleigh, but now they were to be called the Resolution and the Adventure. Johnson. singularity and paradox. He died of a paralytic stroke, at his house in Edinburgh, May 26. 1799. — Croke. He was a devout believer in the virtues of the heroic ages, and the deterioration of civilized mankind; a great con- temporary of luxuries, insomuch that he never used a wheel- carriage. It should be added, that he was a gentleman of the highest rank, and the strictest honour and In- tegrity. — WALTER SCOTT.

1 There was no person in the capacity of mate in either of these ships. Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander did not go with this expedition. The reason which they alleged for abandoning the intention will be found in the Annual Register for 1774, p, 189. — Croke.
“Much better; for had the Raleigh returned without going round the world, it would have been ridiculous. To give them the names of the Drake and the Raleigh was laying a trap for satire.”

“Had not you some desire to go upon this expedition, Sir?”

“Why yes, but I soon laid it aside. Sir, there is very little of intellectual, in the course. Besides, I see but at a small distance. So it was not worth my while to go to see birds fly, which I should not have seen fly; and fishes swim, which I should not have seen swim.”

The gentleman being gone, and Dr. Johnson having left the room for some time, a debate arose between the Rev. Mr. Stockdale and Mrs. Desmoulins, whether Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander were entitled to any share of glory from their expedition. When Dr. Johnson returned to us, I told him the subject of their dispute.

“Why, Sir, it was properly for botany that they went out: I believe they thought only of 'culling of simples.'”

I thanked him for showing civilities to Beattie. “Sir,” said he, “I should thank you. We all love Beattie. Mrs. Thrale says, if ever she has another husband, she'll have Beattie. He sunk upon us that he was married; else we should have shewn his lady more civilities. She is a very fine woman. But how can you show civilities to a nontenity? I did not think he had been married. Nay, I did not think about it one way or other; but he did not tell us of his lady till late.”

He then spoke of St. Kilda, the most remote of the Hebrides. I told him, I thought of buying it.

“Pray do, Sir. We will go and pass a winter amid the blasts there. We shall have fine fish, and we will take some dried tongues with us, and some books. We will have a strong built vessel, and some Orkney men to navigate her. We must build a tolerable house; but we may carry with us a wooden house ready made, and requiring nothing but to be put up. Consider, Sir, by buying St. Kilda you may keep the people from falling into worse hands. We must give them a clergyman, and you shall be one of Beattie’s choosing. He shall be educated at Marischal College. I’ll be your Lord Chancellor, or what you please.”

“Are you serious, Sir, in advising me to buy St. Kilda? For if you should advise me to go to Japan, I believe I should do it.”

“Why yes, Sir, I am serious.”

“Why then, I'll see what can be done.”

I gave him an account of the two parties in the church of Scotland, those for supporting the rights of patrons, independent of the people, and those against it. Johnson. “It should be settled one way or other. I cannot wish well to a popular election of the clergy, when I consider that it occasions such animosities, such unworthy courting of the people, such slanders between the contending parties, and other disadvantages. It is enough to allow the people to remonstrate against the nomination of a minister for solid reasons.” (I suppose he meant heresy or immorality.)

He was engaged to dine abroad, and asked me to return to him in the evening, at nine, which I accordingly did.

We drank tea with Mrs. Williams, who told us a story of second sight, which happened in Wales, where she was born. He listened to it very attentively, and said he should be glad to have some instances of that faculty well authenticated. His elevated wish for more and more evidence for spirit, in opposition to the groveling belief of materialism, led him to a love of such mysterious disquisitions. He again justly observed, that we could have no certainty of the truth of supernatural appearances, unless something was told us which we could not know by ordinary means, or something done which could not be done but by supernatural power; that Pharaoh in reason and justice required such evidence from Moses; nay, that rectify this matter in your new edition. You are at liberty to make what use you please of this letter. My best wishes ever attend you and your family. Believe me to be, with the utmost regard and esteem, dear Sir, &c., “J. Beattie.”

I have, from my respect for my friend Dr. Beattie, and regard to his extreme sensibility, inserted the foregoing letter, though I cannot but wonder at his considering as any impeach a phrase commonly used among the best friends.

“Boswell. There was a cause for this "extreme sensibility," which Boswell probably did not know or had forgotten. Dr. Beattie was conscious that there was something that might give a colour to such an imputation. It became known, shortly after the date of this letter, that the mind of poor Mrs. Beattie had become deranged, and she passed the last years of her life in confinement.”

This is the true distinction; and if Johnson had on all occasions abided by this text, he would have escaped the ridicule and regret which he often occasioned by the appearance of not that reality, of supersitious credulity.

When he said, “that all ages and all nations” believe in these supernatural manifestations (ante, p. 116) and again, “that they are not frequent that they cannot be called fortuitous,” (ante, p. 175) he should have given us the instances in which any thing was clearly and undoubtedly done, which could only have been done by supernatural power.

Appearances, without supernatural facts, are nothing; they may be dreams, or disease. One every sees our Saviour said, "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had had no sin." He had said in the morning, that "Macaulay's History of St. Kilda" was very well written, except some foppery about liberty and slavery. I mentioned to him that Macaulay told me, he was advised to leave out of his book the wonderful story that upon the approach of a stranger all the inhabitants catch cold; but that it had been so well authenticated, he determined to retain it. Johnson. "Sir, to leave things out of a book, merely because people tell you they will not be believed, is meanness. Macaulay acted with more magnanimity."

We talked of the Roman Catholic religion, and how little difference there was in essential matters between ours and it. Johnson. "True, Sir; all denominations of Christians have really little difference in point of doctrine, though they may differ widely in external forms. There is a prodigious difference between the external form of one of your Presbyterian churches in Scotland, and the church in Italy; yet the doctrine taught is essentially the same."

I mentioned the petition to parliament for removing the subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles. Johnson. "It was soon thrown out. Sir, they talk of not many, but if the University subscribe to what they do not understand; but they ought to consider, that our Universities were founded to bring up members for the Church of England, and we must not supply our enemies with arms from our arsenal. No, Sir, the meaning of subscribing is, not that they fully understand all the articles, but that they will adhere to the church of England. Now take it in this way, and suppose that they should only subscribe their adherence to the church of England, there would be still the same difficulty; for still the young men would be subscribing to what they do not understand. For if you should ask them, what do you mean by the church of England? Do you know in what it differs from the Presbyterian church? from the Roman church? from the Greek church? from the Coptic church? they could not tell you. So, Sir, it comes to the same thing." Boswell. "But, would it not be sufficient to subscribe the Bible?" Johnson. "Why no, Sir; for all sects will subscribe the Bible; nay, the Mahometans will subscribe the Bible; for the Mahometans acknowledge Jesus Christ, as well as Moses, but maintain that God sent Mahomet as a still greater prophet than either."

I mentioned the motion which had been made in the House of Commons, to abolish the fast of the 30th of January. Johnson. "Why, Sir, I could have wished that it had been a temporary act, perhaps, to have expired with the century. I am against abolishing it; because that would be declaring it wrong to establish it; but I should have no objection to make an act, continuing it for another century, and then letting it expire."

He disapproved of the Royal Marriage bill; "because," said he, "I would not have the people think that the validity of marriage depends on the will of man, or that the right of a king depends on the will of man. I should not have been against making the marriage of any of the royal family without the approbation of king and parliament, highly criminal."*

In the morning we had talked of old families, and the respect due to them. Johnson. "Sir, you have a right to that kind of respect, and are arguing for yourself. I am for supporting the principle, and am disinclined in doing it, as I have no such right." Boswell. "Why, Sir, it is one more incitement to a man to do well." Johnson. "Yes, Sir, and it is a matter of opinion, very necessary to keep society together. What is it but opinion, by which we have a respect for authority, that prevents us, who are the rabble, from rising up and pulling down you who are gentlemen from your places, and saying, 'We will be gentlemen in our turn?" Now, visions in his sleep, and every body knows that the sick see them in their paroxysms; and there are, we are told, some cases (such as that of Nicolai, the Berlin bookseller), in which persons, awake and not otherwise disordered in mind, have "thick-comening fancies," and see what, if real, would be supernatural; but where, we must again ask, is there, in the present history of the world, one well-authenticated supernatural fact?" — Croker.

1 See ante, p. 191. — C.

2 This was a petition drawn up by Mr. Francis Blackburn, who, though an archbishop of the Church of England, had published several works against her discipline and peculiar doctrines: the petition was presented on the 6th of February, and, after an animated debate, rejected (not being even allowed to lie on the table) by 217 votes against 71. Mr. Gibbon thus notices this debate, in a letter to Lord Sheffield: — "I congratulate you on the late victory of our dear maestas, the Church of England. She had, last Thursday (Feb. 6.), 71 rebellious bishops, who pretended to set aside her will, on account of insanity; but 217 worthy champions, headed by Lord North, Burke, Stanly, Charles Clarke, &c., supported the validity of it with infinite honour. By the by, Charles Fox prepared himself for that holy war, by passing twenty-four hours in the pious exercise of hazard, and his devotion only cost him 5l. 6s. per hour, in all 11,000l." Misc. Works, vol. ii. p. 74. The argument against subscription, which seemed to make most effect in the House, was the requiring it from every youth entering the University, of whatever age, or intended for whatever profession. To this point Johnson's observation particularly alludes. — Croker.

3 Dr. Nowell had preached, as usual, before the House on the 30th of January, and had been followed by several passages. Some days afterwards, Mr. Townshend complained of certain unconstitutional passages in the sermon; and on the 21st of February, after a debate, the thanks were ordered to be expunged from the Journals; and on the 24th of March, Mr. Frederic Montagu moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the observance of that day altogether. This motion was rejected by 125 to 97. — Croker.

4 It is not very easy to understand Dr. Johnson's objection as above stated. Does not the validity of all marriages "depend on the will of man?" that is, are there not in all civilized nations certain legal forms and conditions, requisite to constitute a marriage? And if it be competent to the legislature to make an act highly criminal, does not that imply a competency to forbid it altogether? I do not understand what "the right of a king" has to do with this marriage act, which went rather to increase than to diminish "the right of the living" over his family. Unless indeed, as Mr. Lockhart suggests, Johnson might have been thinking of the divine right of kings. — Croker.
Sir, that respect for authority is much more easily granted to a man whose father has had it, than to an upstart, and so society is more easily supported." Boswell. "Perhaps, Sir, it might be done by the respect belonging to office, as among the Romans, where the dress, the toga, inspired reverence." Johnson. "Why, we know very little about the Romans. But, surely, it is much easier to respect a man who has always had respect, than to respect a man who we know was last year no better than ourselves, and will be no better next year. In republics there is no respect for authority, but a fear of power." Boswell. "At present, Sir, I think riches seem to gain most respect." Johnson. "No, Sir, riches do not gain hearty respect; they only procure external attention. A very rich man, from low beginnings, may buy his election in a borough; but, ceteris paribus, a man of family will be preferred. People will prefer a man for whose father their fathers have voted, though they should get no more money, or even less. That shows that the respect for family is not merely fanciful, but has an actual operation for him. A gentleman of family would allow the rich upstarts to spend their money profusely, which they are ready enough to do, and not vie with them in expense, the upstarts would soon be at an end, and the gentlemen would remain; but if the gentlemen will vie in expense with the upstarts, which is very foolish, they must be ruined."

I gave him an account of the excellent mimicry of a friend of mine in Scotland; observing, at the same time, that some people thought it a very mean thing. Johnson. "Why, Sir, it is making a very mean use of man's powers. But to be a good mimic, requires great powers; great acuteness of observation, great retention of what is observed, and great pliancy of organs, to represent what is observed. I remember a lady of quality in this town, Lady ——, who was a wonderful mimic, and used to make me laugh immoderately. I have heard she is now gone mad." Boswell. "It is amazing how a mimic can not only give you the gestures and voice of a person whom he represents, but even what a person would say on any particular subject." Johnson. "Why, Sir, you are to consider, that the manner and some particular phrases of a person do much to impress you with an idea of him, and you are not sure that he would say what the mimic says in his character." Boswell. "I don't think Foote a good mimic, Sir." Johnson. "No, Sir; his imitations are not like. He gives you something different from himself, but not the character which he means to assume. He goes out of himself, without going into other people. He cannot take off any person unless he is strongly marked, such as George Faulkner. He is like a painter who can draw the portrait of a man who has a wen upon his face, and who therefore is easily known. If a man hops upon one leg, Foote can hop upon one leg. But he has not that nice discrimination which your friend seems to possess. Foote is, however, very entertaining with a kind of conversation between cat and buffoonery."

On Monday, March 29, I found him busy, preparing a fourth edition of his folio Dictionary. Mr. Peyton, one of his original amanuenses, was writing for him. I put him in mind of a meaning of the word side, which he had omitted, viz. relationship; as father's side, mother's side. He inserted it. I asked him, if humiliating was a good word. He said, he had seen it frequently used, but he did not know it to be legitimate English. He would not admit civilization, but only civility. With great deference to him I thought civilization, from to civilize, better in the sense opposed to barbarity, than civility; as it is better to have a distinct word for each sense, than one word with two senses, which civility is, in his way of using it.

He seemed also to be intent on some sort of chemical operation. I was entertained by observing how he contrived to send Mr. Peyton on an errand, without seeming to degrade the Dictionary; but he gives no older authorities than Robertson and Watton. — Lockhart.

6 See ante, p. 67. Of the death of this poor labourer in literature, of whom Mrs. Piozzi says that he had considerable talents, and knew many modern languages. Johnson gave himself the following pathetic account, in a letter to her: —

"Ist April, 1776.

"Poor Peyton expired this morning. He probably — during many years, for which he sat starving by the bed of a wife, not only useless but almost motionless, condemned by poverty to personal attendance, and by the necessity of such attendance, to such a degree of misery, that he was probably thought often how lightly he should try the path of life without his burden. Of this thought the admission was unavoidable, and the indulgence might be forgiven to frailty and distress. His wife died at last, and before she was buried, he was seized by a fever, and is now going to the grave.

"Such misfortunes, when they happen to those on whom many eyes are fixed, fill histories and tragedies; and tears have been shed for the sufferings, and wonder excited by the eternity, of those who neither did nor suffered more than Peyton." Letters, vol. i. p. 312. — Croker.
him: — "Mr. Peyton, Mr. Peyton, will you be so good as to take a walk to Temple-Bar? You will there see a chemist's shop, at which you will be pleased to buy for me an ounce of oil of vitriol; not spirit of vitriol, but oil of vitriol. It will cost three half-pence." Peyton immediately went, and returned with it, and told him it cost but a penny.

I then reminded him of the Schoolmaster's cause, and proposed to read to him the printed papers concerning it. "No, Sir," said he, "I can read quicker than I can hear." So he read them to himself.

After he had read for some time, we were interrupted by the entrance of Mr. Kristrom, a Swede, who was tutor to some young gentlemen in the city. He told me, that there was a very good History of Sweden by Daline. Having at the time an intention of writing the history of that country, I asked Dr. Johnson whether one might write a history of Sweden without going thither. "Yes, Sir," said he, "one for common use."

We talked of languages. Johnson observed, that Leibnitz had made some progress in a work tracing all languages up to the Hebrew. "Why, Sir," said he, "you would not imagine that the French jour, day, is derived from the Latin dies, and yet nothing is more certain; and the intermediate steps are very clear. From dies, comes diurnus. Diu is, by inaccurate ears, or inaccurate pronunciation, easily confounded with giu; then the Italians form a substantive of the ablative of an adjective, and thence giurno, or, as they make it, giorno: which is readily contracted into giour, or jour." 1

It he observed, that the Bohemian language was true Slavonic. "The Swede said, it had some similarity with the German. Johnson. "Why, Sir, to be sure, such parts of Slavonia as confine with Germany will borrow German words; and such parts as confine with Tartary will borrow Tartar words."

He said, he had never had it properly ascertained that the Scotch Highlanders and the Irish understood each other. 2 I told him that my cousin, Colonel Graham, of the Royal Highlanders, whom I met at Drogheda, told me they did. Johnson. "Sir, if the Highlanders understood Irish, why translate the New Testament into Erse, as was lately done at Edinburgh, when there is an Irish translation?"

Boswell. "Although the Erse and Irish are both dialects of the same language, there may be a good deal of diversity between them, as between the different dialects in Italy." The Swede went away, and Mr. Johnson continued his reading of the papers. I said, "I am afraid, Sir, it is troublesome." "Why, Sir," said he, "I do not take much delight in it; but I'll go through it."

We went to the Mitre, and dined in the room where he and I first supped together. He gave me great hopes of my cause. "Sir," said he, "the government of a schoolmaster is somewhat of the nature of military government; that is to say, it must be arbitrary, — it must be exercised by the will of one man, according to particular circumstances. You must show some learning upon this occasion. You must show, that a schoolmaster has a prescriptive right to beat; and that an action of assault and battery cannot be admitted against him unless there is some great excess, some barbarity. This man has maimed none of his boys. They are all left with the full exercise of their corporeal faculties. In our schools in England, many boys have been maimed; yet I never heard of an action against a schoolmaster on that account. Puffendorf, I think, maintains the right of a schoolmaster to beat his scholars." 3

CHAPTER XXVI.

On Saturday, March 27, I introduced to him Sir Alexander Macdonald, 4 with whom

1 Thus Journal assuredly comes from dies, without having a single letter in common. — Chorley.

2 In Mr. Anderson's Historical Sketches of the Native Irish, we find the following observations:

"The Irish and Gaelic languages are the same, and former what was spoken in the Highlands of Scotland was generally called Irish. Those who have attended to the subject must have observed, that the word Irish was gradually changed into Erse, denoting the language that is now generally called Gaelic." Mr. Anderson states that, when he was in Galway, in Ireland, in 1814, he found a vessel there from Lewis, one of the Hebrides, the master of which remarked to him, that the people there spoke a language called Erse, but he understood them easily, and commerce is actually carried on between the Highlanders and the Irish, through the medium of their common language. — P. 182.

My friend, Colonel Meyrick Shawe, told me from his own experience, that were it not for the difference of pronunciation, the Irish and the Highlanders would be perfectly intelligible to each other; and even with that disadvantage, they become so in a short time. The Scotch, as is natural from their position, have many Irish and other foreign words. The Irish have no English words, but many Latin. Sir Walter Scott also informed me, that "there is no doubt the languages are the same, and the difference in pronunciation and construction not very considerable. The Erse or Erish is the Irish; and the race called Scots came originally from Ulster." — Chorley.

3 Puffendorf states that "tutors and schoolmasters have a right to the moderate use of gentle discipline over their pupils." — Chorley, 2. 20.; adding, rather superfluously, Grotius's caveat, that "it shall not extend to a power of death." In our common law courts there have been several instances of action even for over-severity; there can be no doubt of the right of action in a case of maiming. — Chorley.

4 Next brother of Sir James Macdonald, whom Mr. Bos-he had expressed a wish to be acquainted. He received him very courteously.

Sir Alexander observed, that the Chancellors in England are chosen from views much inferior to the office, being chosen from temporary political views. Johnson. "Why, Sir, in such a government as ours, no man is appointed to an office because he is the fittest for it, nor hardly in any other government; because there are so many connections and dependencies to be studied. A despotic prince may choose a man to an office merely because he is the fittest for it. The king of Prussia may do it." Sir A. "I think, Sir, almost all great lawyers, such as at least have written upon law, have known no law, and nothing else." Johnson. "Why, no, Sir; Judge Hale was a great lawyer, and wrote upon law; and yet he knew a great many other things, and had written upon other things. Selden too." Sir A. "Very true, Sir; and Lord Bacon. But was not Lord Coke a mere lawyer?" Johnson. "Why, I am afraid he was; but he would have taken it very ill if you had told him so. He would have prosecuted you for scandal." Boswell. "Lord Mansfield is not a mere lawyer." Johnson. "No, Sir. I never was in Lord Mansfield's company; but Lord Mansfield was distinguished at the wits, Lord Mansfield, when he first came to town, drunk champagne with the wits, as Prior says. He was the friend of Pope." Sir A. "Barristers, I believe, are not so abusive now as they were formerly." I fancy they had less law long ago, and so were obliged to take to abuse, to fill up the time. Now they have such a number of precedents, they have no occasion for abuse." Johnson. "Nay, Sir, they had more law long ago than they have now. As to precedents, to be sure they will increase in course of time; but the more precedents there are, the less occasion is there for law; that is to say, the less occasion is there for investigating principles." Sir A. "I have been correcting several Scotch accents in my friend Boswell. I doubt, Sir, if any Scotchman ever attains to a perfect English pronunciation." Johnson. "Why, Sir, few of them do, because they do not persevere after acquiring a certain degree of it. But, Sir, there can be no doubt that they may attain to a perfect English pronunciation, if they will. We find how near they come to it; and certainly, a man who conquers nineteen parts of the Scottish accent, may conquer the twentieth. But, Sir, when a man has got the better of nine tenths he grows weary, he relaxes his diligence, he finds he has corrected his accent so far as not to be disagreeable, and he no longer desires his friends to tell him when he is wrong; nor does he choose to be told. Sir, when people watch me narrowly, and I do not watch myself, they will find me sure to lose of a particular county. In the same manner, Dunning may be found out to be a Devonshire man. So most Scotchmen may be found out. But, Sir, little aberrations are of no disadvantage. I never caught Mallet in a Scotch accent; and yet Mallet, I suppose, was past five-and-twenty before he came to London."

Upon another occasion I talked to him on this subject, having myself taken some pains to improve my pronunciation, by the aid of the late Mr. Love, of Drury Lane theatre, when he was a player at Edinburgh, and also of old Mr. Sheridan. Johnson said to me, "Sir, your pronunciation is not offensive." With this concession I was pretty well satisfied; and let me give my countrymen of North Britain an advice not to aim at absolute perfection in this respect; not to speak High English, as we are apt to call what is far removed from the Scotch, but which is by no means good English, and makes "the fools who use it" truly ridiculous. Good English is plain, easy, and smooth in the mouth of an unaffected English gentleman. A studied and factitious pronunciation, which requires perpetual attention, and imposes perpetual constraint, is exceedingly disgusting. A small intermixture of provincial peculiarities may, perhaps, have an agreeable effect, as the notes of different birds concur in the harmony of the grove, and please more than if they were all exactly alike. I could name some gentlemen of Ireland, to whom a slight proportion of the accent and recitative of that country is an advantage. The same observation will apply to the gentlemen of...
Scotland. I do not mean that we should speak as broad as a certain prosperous member of parliament from that country 1; though it has been well observed, that "it has been of no small use to him, as it rouses the attention of the House by its uncommonness; and is equal to tropes and figures in a good English speaker." I would give as an instance of what I mean to recommend to my countrymen, the pronunciation of the late Sir Gilbert Elliot 2; and may I presume to add that of the present Earl of Marchmont, who told me with great good humour, that the master of a shop in London, where he was not known, said to him, "I suppose, Sir, you are an American." "Why so, Sir?" said his Lordship. "Because, Sir," replied the shopkeeper,
"you speak neither English nor Scotch, but something different from both, which I conclude is the language of America."
Boswell. "It may be of use, Sir, to have a Dictionary to ascertain the pronunciation." Johnson. "Why, Sir, my Dictionary shows you the accent of words, if you can but remember them." Boswell. "But, Sir, we want marks to ascertain the pronunciation of the vowels. Sheridan, I believe, has finished such a work." Johnson. "Why, Sir, consider how much easier it is to learn a language by the ear, than by any marks. Sheridan's Dictionary may do very well; but you cannot always carry it about with you: and, when you want the word, you have not the Dictionary. It is like a man who has a sword that will not draw. It is an admirable sword, to be sure: but while your enemy is cutting your throat, you are unable to use it. Besides, Sir, what entitles Sheridan to fix the pronunciation of English? He has, in the first place, the disadvantage of being an Irishman; and if he says he will fix it after the example of the best company, why, they differ among themselves. I remember an in-estance: when I published the plan for my Dictionary, Lord Chesterfield told me that the word great should be pronounced so as to rhyme to state; and Sir William Yonge 4 sent me word that it should be pronounced so as to rhyme to seat; and that none but an Irishman would pronounce it grunt. Now, here were two men of the highest rank, the one the best speaker in the House of Lords, the other the best speaker in the House of Commons, differing entirely."
I again visited him at night. Finding him in a very good humour, I ventured to lead him to the subject of our situation in a future state, having much curiosity to know his notions on that point. Johnson. "Why, Sir, the happiness of an unembodied spirit will consist in a consciousness of the favour of God, or in the contemplation of truth, and in the session of felicitating ideas." Boswell. "But, Sir, is there any harm in our forning to ourselves conjectures as to the particulars of our unknowing, though the Scripture has said but very little on the subject? 'We know not what we shall be.'" Johnson. "Sir, there is no harm. What philosophy suggests to us on this topic is probable: what Scripture tells us is certain. Dr. Henry More 5 has carried it as far as philosophy can. You may buy both his theological and philosophical works, in two volumes folio, for about eight shillings." Bowell. "One of the most pleasing thoughts is, that we shall see our friends again."
Johnson. "Yes, Sir; but you must consider, that when we are become purely rational, many of our friendships will be cut off. Many friendships are formed by a community of sensual pleasures: all these will be cut off.
We form many friendships with bad men, because they have agreeable qualities, and they are useful to us; but, after death, they can no longer be of use to us. We form many friendships by mistake, imagining people to be different from what they really are. After death, we shall see every one in a true light.
Then, Sir, they talk of our meeting our relations; but then all relationship is dissolved; and we shall have no regard for one person more than another, but for their real value.
However, we shall either have the satisfaction of meeting our friends, or be satisfied without meeting them." Boswell. "Yet, Sir, we see in Scripture, that Dives still retained an anxious concern about his brethren." Johnson.
"Why, Sir, we must either suppose that passage to be metaphorical, or hold, with many divines and all the Purgatarians, that departed souls do not all at once arrive at the utmost perfection of which they are capable," Boswell. "I think, Sir, that is a very rational supposition." Johnson. "Why yes, Sir; but Walpole's administration, and therefore very odious to Pope, who makes frequent depreciating allusions to him. He died in 1758. — The pronunciation is now settled beyond question in Lord Chesterfield's way. — Croker. 5 Called the Platonist, on account of his voluminous efforts to blend the Platonic philosophy with Christianity. He, Van Helmont, and Valentine Greatrakes, all mystics in their several professions, were patronized by Anne Finch, Lady Conway, (herself a mystic,) and all resided for some time in his house at Ragley, where there is a portrait of Van Hel-mont, and where were found, by Horace Walpole, several letters of Dr. More. — Croker. 6 Bishop Hall, in his Discourse, "discoursing of the different degrees of heavenly glory, and of our mutual knowledge of each other above," holds the affirmative on both these questions. — Malone.
we do not know it is a true one. There is no harm in believing it: but you must not compel others to make it an article of faith; for it is not revealed.” Boswell. “Do you think, Sir, it is wrong in a man who holds the doctrine of Purgatory, to pray for the souls of his deceased friends.” Johnson. “Why no, Sir.” Boswell. “I have been told, that in the liturgy of the episcopal church of Scotland, there was a form of prayer for the dead.” Johnson. “Sir, it is not in the liturgy which Laud framed for the episcopal church of Scotland: if there is a liturgy older than that, I should be glad to see it.” Boswell. “As to our employment in a future state, the sacred writings say little. The Revelation, however, of St. John gives us many ideas, and particularly mentions music.” Johnson. “Why, Sir, ideas must be given you by means of something which you know: and as to music, there are some philosophers and divines who have maintained, that we shall not be spiritualised to such a degree, but that something of matter, very much refined, will remain. In that case, music may make a part of our future felicity.”

Boswell. “I do not know whether there are any well-attested stories of the appearance of ghosts. You know there is a famous story of the appearance of Mrs. Veal, prefixed to Drelincourt on Death.” Johnson. “I believe, Sir, that is given up. I believe the woman declared upon her death-bed that it was a lie.” Boswell. “This objection is made against the truth of ghosts appearing: that if they are in a state of happiness, it would be a punishment to them to return to this world; and if they are in a state of misery, it would be giving them a respite.” Johnson. “Why, Sir, as the happiness or misery of embodied spirits does not depend upon place, but is intellectual, we cannot say that they are less happy or less miserable by appearing upon earth.”

We went down between twelve and one to Mrs. Williams’s room, and drank tea. I mentioned that we were to have the Remains of Mr. Gray, in prose and verse, published by Mr. Mason. Johnson. “I think we have had enough of Gray. I see they have published a splendid edition of Akenside’s works. One bad ode may be suffered; but a number of them together makes one sick.” Boswell. “Akenside’s distinguished poem is his Pleasures of Imagination; but for my part, I never could admire it so much as most people do.” Johnson. “Sir, I could not read it through.” Boswell. “I have read it through; but I did not find any great power in it.”

I mentioned Elwol, the heretic, whose trial Sir John Pringle had given me to read. Johnson. “Sir, Mr. Elwol was, I think, an ironmonger at Wolverhampton; and he had a mind to make himself famous, by being the founder of a new sect, which he wished much should be called Elwillians. He held, that every thing in the Old Testament that was not typical, was to be of perpetual observance; and so he wore a riband in the plaits of his coat, and he also wore a beard. I remember I had the honour of dining in company with Mr. Elwol. There was one Barter, a Miller, who wrote against him; and you had the controversy between Mr. Elwol and Mr. Barter. To try to make himself distinguished, he wrote a letter to King George the Second, challenging him to dispute with him, in which he said, ‘George, if you be afraid to come by yourself, to dispute with a poor old man, you may bring a thousand of your black-guards with you; and if you should still be afraid, you may bring a thousand of your red guards.’ The letter had something of the impudence of Junius to our present King. But the men of Wolverhampton were not so inflammable as the common council of London; so Mr. Elwol failed in his scheme of making himself a man of great consequence.”

On Tuesday, March 31, he and I dined at General Paoli’s. A question was started, whether the state of marriage was natural to man. Johnson. “Sir, it is so far from being natural for a man and woman to live in a state of marriage, that we find all the motives which they have for remaining in that connection, and the restraints which civilised society imposes to prevent separation, are hardly sufficient to keep them together.” The General said, that in a state of nature a man and woman uniting together would form a strong and constant affection, by the mutual pleasure each would receive; and that the same causes of dissension would not arise between them, as occur between husband and wife in a civilised state. Johnson. “Sir, they would have dissensions enough, though of another kind. One would choose to go a hunting in this wood, the other in that; one would choose to go a fishing in this lake, the other in that; or, perhaps, one would choose to go a hunting, when the other would choose to go a fishing; and so they would part. Besides, Sir, a savage man and a savage woman meet by chance: and when the man sees another woman that pleases him better, he will leave the first.”

We then fell into a disquisition, whether there is any beauty independent of utility. The General maintained there was not. Dr. Johnson maintained that there was; and he instanced a coffee cup which he held in his hand, the painting of which was of no real use, as the cup would hold the coffee equally well if plain; yet the painting was beautiful.

We talked of the strange custom of swearing in conversation. The General said, that all barbarous nations swore from a certain violence of temper, that could not be confined to earth, but was always reaching at the powers above. He said, too, that there was greater variety of swearing, in proportion as there was a greater variety of religious ceremonies.

Dr. Johnson went home with me to my lodgings in Conduit Street and drank tea, previous to our going to the Pantheon, which neither of us had seen before.

He said, "Goldsmith's Life of Parnell is poor; not that it is poorly written, but that he had poor materials; for nobody can write the life of a man, but those who have eat and drunk and lived in social intercourse with him.”

I said, that if it was not troublesome and presuming too much, I would request him to tell me all the little circumstances of his life; what schools he attended, when he came to Oxford, when he came to London, &c. &c. He did not disapprove of my curiosity as to these particulars; but said, "They'll come out by degrees, as we walk together."

He censured Ruffhead's Life of Pope; and said, "he knew nothing of Pope, and nothing of poetry.” He praised Dr. Joseph Wartrn's Essay on Pope; but said, "he supposed we should have no more of it, as the author had not been able to persuade the world to think of Pope as he did.” Boswell, "Why, Sir, should that prevent him from continuing his work? He is an ingenious counsel, who has made the most of his cause: he is not obliged to gain it.” Johnson. "But, Sir, there is a difference, when the cause is of a man's own making."

We talked of the proper use of riches. Johnson. "If I were a man of a great estate, I would drive all the rascals whom I did not live out of the county, at an election."

I asked him, how far he thought wealth should be employed in hospitality. Johnson. "You are to consider that ancient hospitality, of which we hear so much, was in an uncommercial country, when men, being idle, were glad to be entertained at rich men's tables. But in a commercial country, a busy country, time becomes precious, and therefore hospitality is not so much valued. No doubt there is still room for a certain degree of it; and a man has a satisfaction in seeing his friends eating and drinking around him. But promisuous hospitality is not the way to gain real influence. You must help some people at table before others; you must ask some people how they like their wine oftener than others. You therefore offend more people than you please. You are like the French statesman, who said, when he granted a favour, 'J'ai fait diz mécents et un ingrat.' Besides, Sir, being entertained ever so well at a man's table, impresses no lasting regard or esteem. No, Sir, the way to make sure of power and influence is, by lending money confidentially to your neighbours at a small interest, or perhaps at no interest at all, and having their bonds in your possession.”

Boswell. "May not a man, Sir, employ his riches to advantage, in educating young men of merit?" Johnson. "Yes, Sir, if they fall in your way; but if it be understood that you patronise young men of merit, you will be harassed with solicitations. You will have numbers forced upon you, who have no merit; some will force them upon you from mistaken partiality; and some from downright interested motives, without scruple; and you will be disgraced.”

"Were I a rich man, I would propagate all kinds of trees that will grow in the open air. A greenhouse is childish. I would introduce foreign animals into the country; for instance, the rein-deer."

The conversation now turned on critical subjects. Johnson. "Bayes, in The Rehearsal, is a mighty silly character. If it was intended to be like a particular man, it could only be diverting while that man was remembered. But I question whether it was meant for Dryden, as has been reported; for we added he, 'keeping a diary, in hopes of using it for that purpose some time."

I suspect that there is here a good deal of error; the allusion to Oxford exploits (as well as the story of the shoes, ante, p. 18,) seems inconsistent with the evidence of the books of Pembroke and Christ Church Colleges, that Johnson had left Oxford before Taylor came thither. There is also manifest inconsistency in the reference to Hawkesworth for his early London life, with the statement, that their intimacy began in 1735 when Johnson had been already sixteen years in London. — CRocker.

2 Owen Ruffhead was born in 1723, and died in 1769; in whom year his Life of Pope” was published. The materials were supplied by Dr. Warburton, who corrected the proof sheets. — Wright.

3 This "French statesman” was Louis the Fourteenth. — Lockhart.

4 This project has since been realised. Sir Henry Liddell, who made a spirited tour into Lapland, brought two rein-deer to his estate in Northumberland, where they bred; but the race has unfortunately perished. — Boswell.
know some of the passages said to be ridiculed were written since the Rehearsal: at least a passage mentioned in the Preface is of a later date. I have seen it acknowledged that it had merit as a general satire on the self-importance of dramatic authors. But even in this light he held it very cheap.

We then walked to the Pantheon. The first view of it did not strike us so much as Ranelagh, of which he said, the coup d'oeil was the finest thing he had ever seen. The truth is, Ranelagh is of a more beautiful form; more of it, or rather indeed the whole rotunda, appears at once, and it is better lighted. However, as Johnson observed, we saw the Pantheon in time of mourning, when there was a dull uniformity; whereas we had seen Ranelagh when the view was enlivened with a gay profusion of colours. Mrs. Boswell, of Gunthwait, in Yorkshire, joined us, and entered into conversation with us. Johnson said to me afterwards, "Sir, this is a mighty intelligent lady."

I said there was not half a guinea's worth of pleasure in seeing this place. Johnson. "But, Sir, there is half a guinea's worth of inferiority to other people in not having seen it." Boswell. "I doubt, Sir, whether there are many happy people here." Johnson. "Yes, Sir, there are many happy people here. There are many people here who are watching hundreds, and who think hundreds are watching them."

Happening to meet Sir Adam Ferguson, I presented him to Dr. Johnson. Sir Adam expressed some apprehension that the Pantheon would encourage luxury. "Sir," said Johnson, "I am a great friend to public amusements; for they keep people from vice. You now," addressing himself to me, "would have been with a wench, had you not been here. Oh! I forgot you were married."

Sir Adam suggested, that luxury corrupts a people, and destroys the spirit of liberty. Johnson. "Sir, that is all visionary. I would not give half a guinea to live under one form of government rather than another. It is of no moment to the happiness of an individual, Sir, the danger of the abuse of power is nothing to a private man. What Frenchman is prevented from passing his life as he pleases?"

Sir Adam. "But, Sir, in the British constitution it is surely of importance to keep up a spirit in the people, so as to preserve a balance against the crown." Johnson. "Sir, I perceive you are a vile Whig. Why all this childish jealousy of the power of the crown? The crown has not power enough. When I say that all governments are alike, I consider that in no government power can be abused long. Mankind will not bear it. If a sovereign oppresses his people to a great degree, they will rise and cut off his head. There is a remedy in human nature against tyranny, that will keep us safe under every form of government. Had not the people of France thought themselves honoured in sharing in the brilliant actions of Louis XIV., they would not have endured him; and we may say the same of the King of Prussia's people." Sir Adam introduced the ancient Greeks and Romans. Johnson. "Sir, the mass of both of them were barbarians. The mass of every people must be barbarous where there is no printing, and consequently knowledge is not generally diffused. Knowledge is diffused among our people by the newspapers." Sir Adam mentioned the orators, poets, and artists of Greece. Johnson. "Sir, I am talking of the mass of the people. We see even what the boasted Athenians were. The little effect which Demosthenes' orations had upon them shows that they were barbarians."

Sir Adam was unlucky in his topics; for he suggested a doubt of the propriety of bishops having seats in the House of Lords. Johnson. "How so, Sir? Who is more proper for having the dignity of a peer, than a bishop, provided a bishop be what he ought to be? and if improper bishops be made, that is not the fault of the bishops, but of those who make them."

1 Dr. Johnson seems to have meant the address to the reader, with a key, which has been prefixed to the later editions; he did not know, it appears, that several additions were made to "The Rehearsal," after the first edition. The ridicule on the passages here alluded to is found among those additions. — Malon. Bayes was perhaps originally sketched for Sir William Davenant, as the brown paper patch on his nose indicates, but there is no doubt that the finished picture was meant for Dr. Dryden: he himself complains bitterly that it was so; and Johnson, better informed when he came to write Dryden's Life, expressly says, that "he was characterization under the name of Bayes in "The Rehearsal."" — Croker.

2 Ranelagh, so called because its site was that of a villa of Viscount Ranelagh, near Chelsea, was a place of entertainment, of which the principal room was a Rotunda of great dimensions, and an orchestra in the centre, and tiers of boxes all round. The chief amusement was promenading, as it was called, round and round the circular area below, and taking refreshments in the boxes, while the orchestra executed different pieces of music. The Pantheon, in Oxford Street, was built in 1722, after Wyatt's designs, as a kind of town Rotunda. Formerly one of the boxes was the centre of the orchestra (the purposes of which it was sometimes applied). Both these places had a considerable vogue for a time, but are now almost forgotten: the last appearance (if one may use the expression) of Ranelagh was at the installation ball of the Knights of the Bath. In 1808, when I saw it, as I have described, very brilliant in company, but somewhat faded in its own decorations. It has since been razed to the ground, and no vestige of that once fairy palace remains. The original Pantheon was burned down in 1792, but was rebuilt on its own foundations, and was here for a while a masquerade; but it has not been opened to the public for the last twenty years. Croker. In 1834, the building was converted into a tavern. — Wigram.

3 Diana Wentworth, wife of Godfrey Bosville, Esq., of Gunthwait, whose daughter had married, in 1776, Sir Alexander (afterwards created Lord Macaulay. — Croker.

4 Sir Adam Ferguson of Keillermarr, Bart., member of Parliament, who held his seat from 1774 to 1803. — Croker.

5 This again is "tactyc of talk." If a Frenchman had written any thing like Johnson's "Norfolk Prophecy," or talked of Louis XV., as Johnson did of George the Second, he would have been either forced to fly, or would have expiated his indiscretion in the Bastille; poor Marmontel we know, was for a time excised, and the period of a few lines in a play, at which a lord of the bedchamber happened to be offended. — Croker.

6 It is accompanied and softened by some jocular expression of condescension or imitation of voice; for, rude as Johnson often was, it is hardly possible that he should have seriously said such a thing to a gentleman whom he saw for the first time. — Croker.
On Sunday, April 5, after attending divine service at St. Paul's church, I found him alone. Of a schoolmaster 1 of his acquaintance, a native of Scotland, he said, "He has a great deal of good about him; but he is also very defective in some respects. His inner part is good, but his outer part is mighty awkward. You in Scotland do not attain that nice critical skill in languages, which we get in our schools in England. I would not put a boy to him, whom I intended for a man of learning. But for the sons of citizens, who are to learn a little, get good morals, and then go to trade, he may do very well."

I mentioned a cause in which I had appeared as counsel at the bar of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, where a Proclamation (as one licensed to preach, but not yet ordained, is called) was opposed in his application to be inducted, because it was alleged that he had been guilty of fornication five years before. Johnson. "Why, Sir, if he has repented, it is not a sufficient objection. A man who is good enough to go to heaven, is good enough to be a clergyman." This was a humane and liberal sentiment. But the clergyman of 1750 is more sacred than that of an ordinary Christian. As he is to instruct with authority, he should be regarded with reverence, as one upon whom divine truth has had the effect to set him above such transgressions, as men less exalted by spiritual habits, and yet upon the whole not to be excluded from heaven, have been betrayed into by the predominance of passion. That clergyman may be considered as sinners in general, as all men are, cannot be denied; but this reflection will not counteract their good precepts so much, as the absolute knowledge of their having been guilty of certain specific immoral acts. I told him, that by the rules of the Church of Scotland, in their "Book of Discipline," if a second, as it is called, is not prosecuted for five years, it cannot afterwards be proceeded upon, "unless it be of a heinous nature, or again become flagrant;" and that hence a question arose, whether fornication was a sin of a heinous nature; and that I had maintained, that it did not deserve that epithet, inasmuch as it was not one of those sins which argue very great depravity of heart: in short, was not, in the general acceptance of mankind, a heinous sin. Johnson. "No, Sir, it is not a heinous sin." A heinous sin is that for which a man is punished with death or banishment." Boswell. "But, Sir, after I had argued that it was not a heinous sin, an old clergyman rose up, and repeating the text of scripture denouncing judgment against whoremongers, asked, whether, considering this, there could be any doubt of fornication being a heinous sin." Johnson. "Why, Sir, observe the word whoremonger. Every sin, if persisted in, will become heinous. Whoremonger is a dealer in whores, as ironmonger is a dealer in iron. But as you don't call a man an ironmonger for buying and selling a penknife; so you don't call a man a whoremonger for getting one wench with child."

I spoke of the inequality of the livings of the clergy in England, and the scanty provisions of some of the curates. Johnson. "Why yes, Sir; but it cannot be helped. You must consider, that the revenues of the clergy are not at the disposal of the state, like the pay of an army. Different men have founded different churches; and some are better endowed, some worse. The state cannot interfere and make an equal division; what has been particularly appropriated. Now when a clergyman has but a small living, or even two small livings, he can afford very little to the curate."

He said, he went more frequently to church when there were prayers only, than when there was also a sermon, as the people required more an example for the one than the other; it being much easier for them to hear a sermon, than to fix their minds on prayer.

On Monday, April 6, I dined with him at Sir Alexander Macdonald's, where was a young officer in the regimentals of the Scots Royal, who talked with a vivacity, fluency, and precision so uncommon, that he attracted particular attention. He proved to be the Honourable Thomas Erskine, youngest brother to the Earl of Buchan, who has since risen into such brilliant reputation at the bar in Westminster Hall.

Fielding being mentioned, Johnson exclaimed, "He was a blockhead;" and upon my expressing my astonishment at so strange an assertion, he said, "What I mean by his being a blockhead is, that he was a barren rascal." Boswell. "Will you not allow, Sir, that he draws very natural pictures of human life?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, it is of very low life. Richardson used to say, that he had not known who Fielding was, he should have believed he was a baron by the title of Lord Erskine, soon after which time my acquaintance with him began. He died in 1823. Neither his conversation (even to the last remarkable for fluency and vivacity, though certainly not for precision) nor his parliamentary speeches ever bore any proportion to the extraordinary force and brilliancy of his forensic eloquence. Those who only know him in private, or in the House of Commons, had some difficulty in believing the effect he produced at the bar. During the last years of his life, his conduct was eccentric, to a degree that justified a suspicion, and even a hope, that his understanding was impaired." —Croker.

1 Mr. Elphinstone: see ante, p. 63. n. 4. —Croker.
2 It must not be presumed that Dr. Johnson meant to give any countenance to licentiousness, though in the character of an advocate he made a just and subtle distinction between occasional and habitual transgression. —Boswell. I confess that I could have wished that Boswell had not repeated this loose talk. Johnson's coarse illustration does little credit to the philologist, and none at all to the moralist, and could hardly have been his real opinion. —Croker.
3 Born in 1749; entered the navy as a midshipman in 1761, and the army as an ensign in the Royal in 1760. He was called to the bar in 1779; appointed a King's counsel in 1783; and, in 1806, Lord Chancellor of England, and created was an ostler. Sir, there is more knowledge of the heart in one letter of Richardson's, than in all "Tom Jones." I, indeed, never read
"Joseph Andrews." Erskine. "Surely, Sir,
Richardson is very tedious." Johnson. "Why, Sir, if you were to read Richardson for the story, your impatience would be so much fretted that you would hang yourself. But you must read him for the sentiment, and consider the story as only giving occasion to the sentiment." I have already given my opinion of Fielding; but I cannot refrain from repeating here my wonder at Johnson's excessive and unaccountable depreciation of one of the best writers that England has produced.
"Tom Jones" has stood the test of public opinion with such success, as to have established its great merit, both for the story, the sentiments, and the manners, and also the varieties of diction, so as to leave no doubt of its having an animated truth of execution throughout.
A book of travels, lately published under the title of Coriat Junior, and written by Mr. Paterson, was mentioned. Johnson said, this book was in imitation of Sterne, and not of Coriat, whose name Paterson had chosen as a whimsical one. "Tom Coriat," said he, "was a humorist about the court of James the First. He had a mixture of learning, of wit, and of buffoonery. He first travelled through Europe, and published his travels. He afterwards travelled on foot through Asia, and had made many remarks; but he died at Maida-non, and his remarks were lost."
We talked of gaming, and animadverted on it with severity. Johnson. "Nay, gentlemen, let us not aggravate the matter. It is doctrine to play with a man who is ignorant of the game, while you are master of it, and so win his money; for he thinks he can play better than you, as you think you can play better than he; and the superior skill carries it." Erskine. "He is a fool, but you are not a rogue, Sir." Johnson. "Too much about the truth, Sir. It must be considered, that a man who only does what every one of the society to which he belongs would do, is not a dishonest man. In the republic of Sparta it was agreed, that stealing was not dishonourable if not discovered. I do not commend a society where there is an agreement that what would not otherwise be fair, shall be fair; but I maintain, that an individual of any society, who practises what is allowed, is not a dishonest man." Boswell. "So then, Sir, you do not think ill of a man who wins perhaps forty thousand pounds in a winter?" Johnson.
"Sir, I do not call a gasmer a dishonest man;
but I call him an unsocial man, an unprofitable man. Gaming is a mode of transferring proerty without producing any intermediate good. Trade gives employment to numbers, and so produces intermediate good."
Mr. Erskine told us that, when he was in the island of Minorca, he not only read prayers, but preached two sermons to the regiment. He seemed to object to the passage in scripture, where we are told that the angel of the Lord smote in one night forty thousand Assyrians."6 "Sir," said Johnson, "you should recollect that there was a supernatuar interposition; they were destroyed by pestiulence. You are not to suppose that the ange1 of the Lord went about and stabbed each of them with a dagger, or knocked them on the head, man by man."
After Mr. Erskine was gone, a discussion took place, whether the present Earl of Buchan, when Lord Cardross, did right to refuse to go secretary of the embassy to Spain, when Sir James Gray, a man of inferior rank, went ambassador. Dr. Johnson said, that perhaps in point of interest he did wrong; but in point of dignity he did well. Sir Alexander insisted that he was right, and said that Mr. Pitt intended it as an advantageous thing for him.
"Why, Sir," said Johnson, "Mr. Pitt might think it an advantageous thing for him to make him a vintner, and get him all the Portugal trade; but he would have demeaned himself strangely, had he accepted of such situation. Sir, you gone because while his inferior was ambas-Sador, he would have been a trifler to his rank and family."7
I talked of the little attachment which substituted between near relations in London.
"Sir," said Johnson, "in a country so commercial as ours, where every man can do for himself, there is not so much occasion for that

1 Johnson's severity against Fielding did not arise from any viciousness in his style, but from his loose life, and the profligacy of almost all his male characters. Who would venture to read one of his novels aloud to modest women? — Burney.

2 Mr. Samuel Paterson, eminent for his knowledge of books.—Boswell. He was the son of a woolen-drapcr: he kept a bookseller's shop, chiefly for old books, and was afterwards an auctioneer; but seems to have been unsuccessful in all his attempts at business. He was the author of several celebrated libraries. He died in 1823, aged 77. — Croker.

3 Mr. Paterson, in a pamphlet, produced some evidence to show that his work was written before Sterne's "Sentimental Journey" appeared. — Boswell.

4 Under the title of "Crudities," hastily gibbled up in France, Italy, Greece, Turkey, etc. Coriat was born in 1757, educated at Westminster school and Oxford, and died in 1797, at Sorrent, after he had left Maida. — Croker.

5 Lord Erskine was fond of this anecdote. He told it to me the first time that I had the honour of being in his compny, and often repeated it, boasting that he had been a sailor, a soldier, a lawyer, and a parson. The latter he affected to think the greatest of his efforts, and to support that opinion would quote the prayer for the clergy in the liturgy, from the expression of which he would (in no commandable spirit of jocularity) infer, that the enlightening them was one of the "greater works" which could be worked. — Croker.

6 One hundred and eighty-five thousand. See Isaiah,

7 If this principle were to be admitted, the young nobility would be excluded from all the professions; for the superiors in the world, who often go in frequent company of those of personal rank, would have dissipated Lord Cardross from entering on the military profession, because at his outset he would have been commended by a person inferior in personal rank? This, if ever it was a subject of real doubt, is no longer so, and young men of the highest rank think it no degradation to enter into the junior ranks of the military, naval, and diplomatic and official professions. — Croker.
attachment. No man is thought the worse of here, whose brother was hanged. 1 In uncommercial countries, many of the branches of a family must depend on the stock; so, in order to make the head of the family take care of them, they are represented as connected with his reputation, that, self-love being interested, he may exert himself to promote their interest. You have, first, large circles, or clans; as commerce increases, the connection is confined to families; by degrees, that too goes off, as having become unnecessary, and there being few opportunities of intercourse. One brother is a merchant in the city, and another is an officer in the guards: how little intercourse can these two have! I argued warmly for the old feudal system. Sir Alexander opposed it, and talked of the pleasure of seeing all men free and independent. Johnson. "I agree with Mr. Boswell, that there must be high satisfaction in being a feudal lord; but we are to consider, that we ought not to wish to have a number of men unhappy for the satisfaction of one." I maintained that numbers, namely, the vassals or followers, were not unhappy; for that there was a reciprocal satisfaction between the lord and them, he being kind in his authority over them, they being respectful and faithful to him. On Thursday, April 9, I called on him to beg he would go and dine with me at the Mitre tavern. He had resolved not to dine at all this day. I know not for what reason; and I was so unwilling to be deprived of his company, that I was content to submit to suffer a want, which was at first somewhat painful; but he soon made me forget it: and a man is always pleased with himself when he finds his intellectual inclinations predominate. He observed, that to reason philosophically on the nature of prayer, was very unprofitable. Talking of ghosts, he said, he knew one friend, who was an honest man and a sensible man, who told him he had seen a ghost; old Mr. Edward Cave, the printer at St. John's Gate. He said, Mr. Cave did not like to talk of it, and seemed to be in great horror whenever it was mentioned. Boswell. "Pray, Sir, what did he say was the appearance?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, something of a shadowy being."

I mentioned witches, and asked him what they properly meant. Johnson. "Why, Sir, they properly mean those who make use of the aid of evil spirits." Boswell. "There is no doubt, Sir, a general report and belief of their having existed." Johnson. "You have not only the general report and belief, but you have many voluntary solemn confessions." He did not affirm any thing positively upon a subject which it is the fashion of the times to laugh at as a matter of absurd credulity. He only seemed willing, as a candid inquirer after truth, however strange and inexplicable, to show that he understood what might be urged for it. 2

CHAPTER XXVII.

On Friday, April 10, I dined with him at General Oglethorpe's, where we found Dr. Goldsmith. Armorial bearings having been mentioned, Johnson said, they were as ancient as the siege of Thebes, which he proved by a passage in one of the tragedies of Euripides. 3 I started the question, whether duelling was consistent with moral duty. The brave old general fired at this, and said, with a lofty air, "Undoubtedly a man has a right to defend his honour." Goldsmith (turning to me). "I ask you first, Sir, what would you do if you were affronted?" I answered, I should think it necessary to fight. "Why then," replied Goldsmith, "that solves the question." Johnson. "No, Sir, it does not solve the question. It does not follow, that what a man would do is therefore right." I said, I wished to have it settled, whether duelling was contrary to the laws of Christianity. Johnson immediately entered on the subject, and treated it in a masterly manner; and, so far as I have been able to recollect, his thoughts were these: "Sir, as men become in a high degree refined, various causes of offence arise; which are considered to be of such importance, that life must be staked to atone for them, though in reality they are not so. A body that has received a very fine polish may be easily hurt. Before men arrive at this artificial refinement, if one tells his neighbour—he lies, his neighbour tells him—he lies; if one gives his neighbour a blow, his neighbour gives him a blow; but in a state of highly polished society, an affront is held to be a serious injury. It must, therefore, be resisted, or rather a duel must be fought upon it; as men have agreed to banish from society one who puts up with an affront without fighting a duel. Now, Sir, it is never unlawful to fight in self-defence. He, then, who fights a duel, does not fight from passion against his antagonist, but out of self-defence; to avert the stigma of the world, and to prevent himself from being driven out of society. I could wish there was not that superfluity of refinement; but while such notions prevail, no doubt a man may lawfully fight a duel."

"Let it be remembered, that this justification is applicable only to the person who receives an affront. All mankind must condemn the aggressor." The General told us, that, when he was a very young man, I think only fifteen, serving under Prince Eugene of Savoy, he was sitting in a company at table with a prince of Wirtemberg. The prince took up a glass of wine, and, by a fillip, made some of it fly in Oglethorpe's face. Here was a dilemma. To have challenged him instantly, might have fixed a quarrelsome character upon the young soldier: to have taken no notice of it, might have been considered as cowardice. Oglethorpe, therefore, keeping his eye upon the prince, and smiling all the time, as if he took what his highness had done in jest, said "Mon Prince, (I forget the French words he used; the purport however was) "That's a good joke; but we do it much better in England;" and threw a whole glass of wine in the prince's face. An old general, who sat by, said, "Il a bien fait, mon prince, vous l'avez commencé;" and thus all ended in good humour."

Dr. Johnson said, "Pray, General, give me a recount of the siege of Belgrade." Upon which the general, pouring a little wine upon the table, described every thing with a wet finger: "Here we were; here were the Turks," &c. &c. Johnson listened with the closest attention.

A question was started, how far people who disagree in a capital point can live in friendship together. Johnson said they might. Goldsmith said they could not, as they had not the idem vello alque idem nolle—the same likings and the same aversions. Johnson. "Why, Sir, you must shun the subject as to which you disagree. For instance, I can live very well with Burke: I love his knowledge, his genius, his diffusion, and affluence of conversation; but I would not talk to him of the Rockingham party." Goldsmith. "But, Sir, when people live together who have something as to which they disagree, and which they want to shun, they will be in the situation mentioned in the story of Bluebeard: 'You may look into all the chambers but one.' But we should have the greatest inclination to look into that chamber, to talk of that subject." Johnson (with a loud voice). "Sir, I am not saying that you could live in friendship with a man from whom you differ as to some point; I am only saying that I could do it. You put me in mind of Sappho in Ovid." Goldsmith told us, that he was now busy in writing a Natural History; and, that he might have full leisure for it, he had taken lodgings at a farmer's house, near to the six mile-stone, on the Edgeware-road, and had carried down his books in two returned post-

1 The frequent disquisitions on this subject bring painfully to recollection the death of Mr. Boswell's eldest son, Sir Alexander, who was killed in a duel, arising from a political dispute, on the 26th of March, 1782, by Mr. Stuart, of Dunearn. See post, 24th Oct. 1778. CROKER. This conversation on duelling was quoted on Mr. Stuart's trial by his counsel. LOCKHART.

6 Of which Mr. Burke was a zealous member. CROKER. Mr. Malone and Mr. James Boswell, junior, both consider Boswell's statement as obscure, and endeavour severally to explain the allusion to Sappho. Malone thinks it refers to the expression, "omnifera a parte placebatur." Ovid. Epist. Sapp. ad Phaenomen. I. 51. Boswell junior rather conjectures that the passage was I. 45.

And adds. "The lines which I have quoted are thus expanded in Pope's Paraphrase:" which, to say the truth, I suspect was at this moment more in Johnson's recollection than the original:—
chaises. He said, he believed the farmer's family thought him an odd character, similar to that in which the Spectator appeared to his landlady and her children: he was The Gentleman. Mr. Mickle, the translator of "The Lusiad," and I, went to visit him at this place a few days afterwards. He was not at home; but, having a curiosity to see his apartment, we went in, and found curious scraps of descriptions of animals, scrawled upon the wall with a black-lead pencil.

The subject of ghosts being introduced, Johnson repeated what he had told me of a friend of his [Cave], an honest man, and a man of sense, having asserted to him that he had seen an apparition. Goldsmith told us, he was assured by his brother, the Reverend Mr. Goldsmith, that he also had seen one. General Oglethorpe told us, that Prendergast, an officer in the Duke of Marlborough's army, had mentioned to many of his friends, that he should die on a particular day; that upon that day a battle took place with the French; that after it was over, and Prendergast was still alive, his brother officers, while they were yet in the field, jestingly asked him, where was his prophecy now? Prendergast gravely answered, "I shall die, notwithstanding what you see." Soon afterwards, there came a shot from a French battery, to which the orders for a cessation of arms had not yet reached, and he was killed upon the spot. Colonel Cecil, who possessed his effects, found in his pocket-book the following solemn entry:—

[Here the date.] "Dreamt—or Sir John Friend meets me:!* (here the very day on which he was killed was mentioned.)"

Prendergast had been connected with Sir John Friend, who was executed for high treason. General Oglethorpe said, he was with Colonel Cecil when Pope came, and inquired into the truth of this story, which made a great noise at the time, and was then confirmed by the colonel.

On Saturday, April 11th, he appointed me to come to him in the evening, when he should be at leisure to give me some assistance for the defence of Hastic, the schoolmaster of Campbelltown, for whom I was to appear in the House of Lords. When I came, I found him unwilling to exert himself; I pressed him to write down his thoughts upon the subject. He said, "There's no occasion for my writing: I'll talk to you." He was, however, at last prevailed on to dictate to me, while I wrote.

"This, Sir," said he, "you are to turn in your mind, and make the best use of it you can in your speech."

Of our friend Goldsmith he said, "Sir, he is so much afraid of being unnoticed, that he often talks merely lest you should forget that he is in the company." Boswell. "Yes, he stands forward." Johnson. "True, Sir; but if a man is to stand forward, he should wish to do it, not in an awkward posture, not in rags, not so as that he shall only be exposed to ridicule."

"For my part, I like very well to hear honest Goldsmith talk away carelessly," Johnson. "Why, yes, Sir; but he should not like to hear himself."

On Tuesday, April 14th, the decree of the court of sessions in the Schoolmaster's cause was reversed in the House of Lords, after a very eloquent speech by Lord Mansfield, who showed himself an adept in school discipline, but I thought was too rigorous towards my client. On the evening of the next day I supped with Dr. Johnson, at the Crown and Anchor tavern, in the Strand, in company with Mr. Langton and his brother-in-law, Lord Binning.* I repeated a sentence of Lord Mansfield's speech, of which, by the aid of Mr. Longlands, the solicitor on the other side, who obligingly allowed me to compare his note with my own, I have a full copy:— "My Lords, severity is not the way to govern other boys or men." "Nay," said Johnson, "it is the way to govern them. I know not whether it be the way to mend them."

I talked of the recent 5 expulsion of six students from the University of Oxford, who were Methodists, and would not desist from publicly praying and exhorting. Johnson. "Sir, that expulsion was extremely just and proper. What have they to do at an uni-

1 William Julius Mickle, the son of a Scotch clergyman, was born at Langholm, Dumfriesshire, in 1734. He lived the life that poets lived in those days; that is, in difficulties and distress, till 1779, when, being appointed secretary to Commodore Johnson, he realised by private agencies a moderate competence. He retired to Forest Hill, near Oxford, where he died in 1788. His translation of the Lusiad is still in some repute: and his ballad of "Comnor Hall" suggested "Kennilworth" to Scott; but his other works are almost all forgotten. — Croker.

2 Here was a blank, which may be filled up thus:— "was told that he was executed," the writer being probably uncertain whether he was asleep or awake, when his mind was impressed with the solemn presentation with which the fact afterwards happened so wonderfully to correspond. — Boswell.

3 Lord Hardinge, when Secretary at War, informed me, that it appears that Colonel Sir Thomas Prendergast, of the twenty-second foot, was killed at Malplaquet, August 31, 1709; but no trace can be found of any Colonel Cecil in the army at that period. The well-known Jacobite, Colonel William Cecil, who was sent to the Tower in 1744, could hardly have been, in 1769, of the age, rank, and station which Oglethorpe's anecdotest seems to imply. Is it not very strange, if this story made so great a noise, we should read of it nowhere else? and, as so much curiosity was excited, that the paper should not have been preserved, or, at least, so generally shown as to be mentioned by some other witness? — Croker.

4 This, and some similar law arguments, which would very much interrupt the narrative, will be found collected in the Appendix.

5 Charles Lord Binning, afterwards eighth Earl of Had-wick, was the son of Mary Holt, who, by a first marriage with Mr. Lloyd, was the mother of Lady Rothes. Mr. Lang-ton's wife. Lord Haddington died in 1782. — Croker.

6 Not very recent, if he alluded to six members of St. Edmund Hall, who were expelled, May 1769. See Gent. Mag., vol. xxxvii, p. 225. But probably Boswell, writing, or at least publishing, at an interval of twenty years, thought that 1765 was, in 1779, recent. — Croker.
versity, who are not willing to be taught, but will presume to teach? Where is religion to be learnt but at an university? Sir, they were examined, and found to be mighty ignorant fellows." Boswell. "But, was it not hard, Sir, to expel them; for I am told they were good beings?" Johnson. "I believe they might be good beings; but they were not fit to be in the University of Oxford. A cow is a very good animal in the field; but we turn her out of a garden." Lord Elphinstone used to repeat this as an illustration uncommonly happy.

Desirous of calling Johnson forth to talk, and exercise his wit, though I should myself be the object of it, I resolutely ventured to undertake the defence of convivial indulgence in wine, though he was not to-night in the most genial humour. After urging the common plausible topics, I at last had recourse to the maxim, in vino veritas, a man who is well warmed with wine will speak truth. Johnson. "Why, Sir, that may be an argument for drinking if you suppose men in general to be liars. But, Sir, I would not keep company with a fellow who lies as long as he is sober, and whom you must make drunk before you can get a word of truth out of him." 1

Mr. Langton told us he was about to establish a school upon his estate; but it had been suggested to him, that it might have a tendency to make the people less industrious. Johnson. "No, Sir; while learning to read and write is a distinction, the few who have that distinction may be the less inclined to work; but when everybody learns to read and write, it is no longer a distinction. A man who has a laced waistcoat is too fine a man to work; but if everybody had laced waistcoats, we should have people working in laced waistcoats. There are no people whatever more industrious, none who work more, than our manufacturers; yet they have all learnt to read and write. Sir, you must not neglect doing a thing immediately good, from fear of remote evil; from fear of its being abused. A man who has candles may sit up too late, which he would not do if he had not candles; but nobody will deny that the art of making candles, by which light is continued to us beyond the time that the sun gives us light, is a valuable art, and ought to be preserved." Boswell. "But, Sir, would it not be better to follow nature, and go to bed and rise just as nature gives us light or withholds it?" Johnson. "No, Sir; for then we should have no kind of equality in the partition of our time between sleeping and waking. It would be very different in different seasons and in different places. In some of the northern parts of Scotland how little light is there in the depth of winter!"

We talked of Tacitus, and I hazarded an opinion that, with all his merit for penetration, shrewdness of judgment, and terseness of expression, he was too compact, too much broken into hints, as it were, and, therefore, too difficult to be understood. To my great satisfaction, Dr. Johnson sanctioned this opinion. "Tacitus, Sir, seems to me rather to have made notes for an historical work, than to have written a history." 2

At this time, it appears, from his "Prayers and Meditations," that he had been more than commonly diligent in religious duties, particularly in reading the Holy Scriptures. It was Passion Week, that solemn season which the Christian world has appropriated to the commemoration of the mysteries of our redemption, and during which, whatever embers of religion are in our breasts, will be kindled into pious warmth.

I paid him short visits both on Friday and Saturday; and, seeing his large folio Greek Testament before him, beheld him with a reverential awe, and would not intrude upon his time. While he was thus employed to such good purpose, and while his friends in their intercourse with him constantly found a vigorous intellect and a lively imagination, it is melancholy to read in his private register, "My mind is unsettled and my memory confused. I have of late turned my thoughts with a very useless earnestness upon past incidents. I have yet got no command over my thoughts: an unpleasing incident is almost certain to hinder my rest." [p. 111.] What philosophical heroism was it in him to appear with such manly fortitude to the world, while he was inwardly so distressed! We may surely believe that the mysterious principle of being "made perfect through suffering," was to be strongly exemplified in him.

On Sunday, April 19, being Easter-day, General Paoli and I paid him a visit before dinner. We talked of the notion that blind persons can distinguish colours by the touch. Johnson said, that Professor Saunders 3 mentions his having attempted to do it, but that he found he was aiming at an impossibility; that, to be sure, a difference in the surface makes the difference of colours; but that difference is so fine, that it is not sensible to the 1 Mrs. Piozzi, in her "Anecdotes," p. 261, has given an erroneous account of this incident, as of many others. She pretends to relate it from recollection, as if she herself had been present. The fact is, that it was communicated to her by me. She has represented it as a personality, and the true point has escaped her. — Boswell. He misrepresents the lady more than she the anecdote; it is either way but a trifle, and only worth notice as marking Boswell's jealousy of Mrs. Piozzi's book. — Croker.

touch. The General mentioned jugglers and fraudulent gamesters, who could know cards by the torch. Dr. Johnson said, "The cards used by such persons must be less polished than ours commonly are."

We talked of sounds. The General said, there was no beauty in a simple sound, but only in an harmonious composition of sounds. I presumed to differ from this opinion, and mentioned the soft and sweet sound of a fine woman's voice. Johnson. "No, Sir, if a serpent or a toad uttered it, you would think it ugly." Boswell. "So you would think, Sir, were a beautiful tune to be uttered by one of these animals." Johnson. "No, Sir, it would be admired. We have seen fine fiddlers whom we liked as little as toads" (laughing).

Talking on the subject of taste in the arts, he said, that difference of taste was, in truth, difference of skill. Boswell. "But, Sir, is there not a quality called taste, which consists merely in perception or in liking? for instance, we find people differ much as to what is the best style of English composition. Some think Swift's the best; others prefer a fuller and grander way of writing." Johnson. "Sir, you must first define what you mean by style, before you can judge who has a good taste in style, and who has a bad. The two classes of persons whom you have mentioned, don't differ as to good and bad. They both agree that Swift has a good neat style; but one loves a neat style, another loves a style of more splendour. In like manner, one loves a plain coat, another loves a laced coat; but neither will deny that each is good in its kind."

While I remained in London this spring, I was with him at several other times, both by himself and in company. I dined with him one day at the Crown and Anchor tavern, in the Strand, with Lord Elmbank, Mr. Langton, and Dr. Vansittart, of Oxford. Without specifying each particular day, I have preserved the following memorable things.

I regretted the reflection, in his preface to Shakspeare, against Garrick, to whom we cannot but apply the following passage: "I collated such copies as I could procure, and wished for more, but have not found the collectors of these rarities very communicative." I told him, that Garrick had complained to me of it, and had vindicated himself by assuring me, that Johnson was made welcome to the full use of his collection, and that he left the key of it with a servant, with orders to have a fire and every convenience for him. I found Johnson's notion was, that Garrick wanted to be courted for them, and that, on the contrary, Garrick should have courted him, and sent him the plays of his own accord. But, indeed, considering the slovenly and careless manner in which books were treated by Johnson, it could not be expected that scarce and valuable editions should have been lent to him.

A gentleman having, to some of the usual arguments for drinking, added this:—"You know, Sir, drinking drives away care, and makes us forget whatever is disagreeable. Would not you allow a man to drink for that reason?" Johnson. "Yes, Sir, if he sat next you."

I expressed a liking for Mr. Francis Osborne's works, and asked him what he thought of that writer. He answered, "A conceited fellow. Were a man to write so now, the boys would throw stones at him." He, however, did not alter my opinion of a favourite author, to whom I was first directed by his being quoted in "The Spectator," and in whom I have found much shrewd and lively sense, expressed, indeed, in a style somewhat quaint; which, however, I do not dislike. His book has an air of originality. We figure to ourselves an ancient gentleman talking to us.

When one of his friends endeavoured to maintain that a country gentleman might contrive to pass his life very agreeably, "Sir," he said, "you cannot give me an instance of any man who is permitted to lay out his own time, contriving not to have tedious hours." This observation, however, is equally applicable to gentlemen who live in cities; and are of no profession.

He said, "There is no permanent national

1 The following meditations, made about this period, are very interesting sketches of his feelings:—

"April 26. I was some way hindered from continuing this contemplation in the usual manner, and therefore try, at the distance of a week, to review the last [Easter] Sunday."

"I went to church early, having first, I think, used my prayer. When I was there, I had very little perturbation of mind. During the usual time of meditation, I considered the Christian duties under the three principles of soberness, righteousness, and godliness; and purposed to forward godliness by the annexed prayer of the Bible, righteousness by doing something for charity, and soberness by early hours. I commended, as usual, with preface of permission, and, I think, to the gentleman at his return home, and found Poole and Boswell waiting for me. What services I used after my return home, I do not distinctly remember. I went to prayers in the evening; and, I think, entered late.

"On Good Friday, I paid Peyton, without requiring work."

"It is a comfort to me, that, at last, in my sixty-third year, I have not been tormented with this, or any other, disease, not hastily, confusedly, and imperfectly, what my Bible contains.

"Having missed church in the morning (April 26), I went this evening, and afterwards sat with Southwell." Pr. and Med. pp. 115, 117, 185. — COCKER.

2 Robert Vansittart, L.L.D. See p. 117. n. 4. — COCKER.

3 Cooke in His Life of Foote records an instance of Johnson's treating Garrick's library very roughly — opening the books so wide as to crack the backs, and throwing them on the floor, to poor Garrick's very natural displeasure. No portion of Johnson's character is so painful to a general admirer as his treatment of Garrick. — COCKER.

4 I believe Boswell himself. — COCKER.

He had attached himself to the Pembroke family; and, like Earl Philip, whom Walpole designates by the too gentle appellation of munificent simpleton, joined the Parliamentarians. He died in 1659. — COCKER.

character: it varies according to circumstances. Alexander the Great swept India; now the Turks sweep Greece."

A learned gentleman [Dr. Vansittart], who, in the course of conversation, wished to inform us of this simple fact, that the counsel upon the circuit of Shrewsbury were much bitten by fleas, took, I suppose, seven or eight minutes in relating it circumstantially. He sat in a plenteous phrase told us, that large bales of woollen cloth were lodged in the town-hall; that by reason of this, fleas nestled there in prodigious numbers; the lodgings of the counsel were near the town-hall; and that those little animals moved from place to place with wonderful agility. Johnson sat in great impatience till the gentleman had finished his tedious narrative, and then burst out (playfully however), "It is a pity, Sir, that you have not seen a lion; for a flea has taken you such a time, that a lion must have served you a twelvemonth.""

He would not allow Scotland to derive any credit from Lord Mansfield; for he was educated in England. "Meh," said he, "may be made of a Scotchemist, if he be caught young." Talking of a modern historian and a modern moralist, he said, "There is more truth in the moralist than in the historian. There is but a shallow stream of thought in history." Boswell. "But, surely, Sir, an historian has reflection?" Johnson. "Why, yes, Sir; and so has a cat when she catches a mouse for her kitten; but she cannot write like [Beattie]; neither can [Robertson]."

He said, "I am very unwilling to read the manuscripts of authors, and give them my opinion. If the authors who apply to me have money, I bid them boldly print without a name; if they have written in order to get money, then to go to the booksellers and make the best bargain they can." Boswell. "But, Sir, if a bookseller should bring you a manuscript to look at?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, I would desire the bookseller to take it away."

I mentioned a friend of mine who had resided long in Spain, and was unwilling to return to Britain. Johnson. "Sir, he is attached to some woman." Boswell. "I rather believe, Sir, it is the fine climate which keeps him there." Johnson. "Nay, Sir, how can you talk so? What is climate to happiness? Place me in the heart of Asia; should I not be exiled? What proportion does climate bear to the complex system of human life? You may advise me to go to live at Bologna to eat sausages. The sausages there are the best in the world; they lose much by being carried."

On Saturday, May 9, Mr. Dempster and I had agreed to dine by ourselves at the British Coffee-house. Johnson, on whom I happened to call in the morning, said he would join us; which he did, and we spent a very agreeable day, though I recollect but little of what passed.

He said, "Walpole was a minister given by the King to the people: Pitt was a minister given by the people to the King,—as an adjunct."

"The misfortune of Goldsmith in conversation is this: he goes on without knowing how he is to get off. His genius is great, but his knowledge is small. As they say of a generous man, it is a pity he is not rich, we may say of Goldsmith, it is a pity he is not knowing. He would not keep his knowledge to himself!"

Before leaving London this year, I consulted him upon a question purely of Scotch law. It was held of old, and continued for a long period to be an established principle in that law, that whoever intermeddled with the effects of a person deceased, without the interposition of legal authority to guard against embezzlement, should be subjected to pay all the debts of the deceased, as having been guilty of what was technically called vicious intromission. The court of session had gradually relaxed the strictness of this principle, where the interference proved had been inconsiderable. In a case which came before that court the preceding winter, I had laboured to persuade the judge to return to the ancient law. It was my own sincere opinion, that they ought to adhere to it; but I had exhausted all my powers of reasoning in vain. Johnson thought as I did; and, in order to assist me in my application to the Court for a revision and alteration of the judgment, he dictated to me the following Argument. [See Appendix.]

With such comprehension of mind, and such clearness of penetration, did he thus treat a subject altogether new to him, without any other preparation than my having stated to him the arguments which had been used on each side of the question. His intellectual powers appeared with peculiar lustre, when tried against those of a writer of such fame as Lord Kames, and that, too, in his Lordship's own department.

1 This seems somewhat obscure, but the meaning, I suppose, is, that Greece, which formerly sent forth the conquerors of Asia, had sunk to be the province of an Asiatic empire.

2 Mrs. Piozzi, to whom I told this anecdote, has related it as if the gentleman had given "the natural history of the mouse." Ancistro, p. 191. — Boswell. The "learned gentleman" was certainly Dr. Vansittart, as is proved by two passages in the correspondence between Mrs. Thrale and Dr. Johnson, July and August, 1773. She writes to the Dr. in Scotland, "I have seen the man that save the mouses." — Croker.

3 The historian and the moralist, whose names Mr. Boswell had left in blank, are Doctors Robertson and Beattie. — Croker.

4 Probably Mr. Boswell's brother David. See post, April 29. 1780. — Croker.

5 Wilson against Smith and Armour. — Boswell.
This masterly argument, after being prefixed and concluded with some sentences of my own, and garnished with the usual formularies, was actually printed and laid before the lords of session, but without success. My respected friend Lord Hailes, however, one of that honourable body, had critical sagacity enough to discover a more than ordinary hand in the petition. I told him Dr. Johnson had favoured me with his pen. His lordship, with wonderful acumen, pointed out exactly where his composition began, and where it ended. But, that I may do impartial justice, and conform to the great rule of courts, Sum cuique tributo, I must add, that their lordships in general, though they were pleased to call this a "well-drawn paper," preferred the former very inferior petition, which I had written; thus confirming the truth of an observation made to me by one of their number, in a merry mood:—"My dear Sir, give yourself no trouble in the composition of the papers you present to us; for, indeed, it is casting pearls before swine."1

I renewed my solicitations that Dr. Johnson would this year accomplish his long-intended visit to Scotland.

JOHNSTON TO BOSWELL.

August 13, 1772.

"*Dear Sir,— The regret has not been little with which I have missed a journey so pregnant with pleasing expectations, as that in which I could promise myself not only the gratification of curiosity, both rational and fanciful, but the delight of seeing those whom I love and esteem. But such has been the course of things, that I could not come; and such has been, I am afraid, the state of my body, that it would not well have seconded my inclination. My body, I think, grows better, and I refer my hopes to another year; for I am very sincere in my design to pay the visit, and take the ramble. In the mean time, do not omit any opportunity of keeping up a favourable opinion of me in the minds of any of my friends. Beattie's book is, I believe, every day more liked; at least, I like it more, as I look more upon it."

"I am glad if you got credit by your cause; and am yet of opinion that our cause was good, and that the determination ought to have been in your favour. Poor Hastie [the Schoolmaster], I think, had but his deserts.

"You promised to get me a little Pindar; you may add to it a little Anacreon.

"The leisure which I cannot enjoy, it will be a pleasure to hear that you employ upon the antiquities of the feudal establishment. The whole system of ancient tenures is gradually passing away; and"

I wish to have the knowledge of it preserved adequate and complete; for such an institution makes a very important part of the history of mankind. Do not forget a design so worthy of a scholar who studies the law of his country, and of a gentleman who may naturally be curious to know the condition of his own ancestors. I am, dear Sir, yours with great affection.

SAM. JOHNSON"

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"Edinburgh, Dec. 28, 1772.

"*My dear Sir,— I was much disappointed that you did not come to Scotland last autumn. However, I must own that your letter prevents me from complaining; not only because I am sensible that the state of your health was but too good an excuse, but because you write in a strain which shows that you have agreeable views of the scheme which we have so long proposed.

"I communicated to Beattie what you said of his book in your last letter to me. He writes to me thus:—"I am very rightly in supposing that Dr. Johnson's favourable opinion of my book must give me great delight. Indeed, it is impossible for me to say how much I am gratified by it; for there is not a man upon earth whose good opinion I would be more ambitious to cultivate. His talents and his virtues I reverence more than any words can express. The extraordinary civilities (the paternal attentions I should rather say), and the many instructions I have had the honour to receive from him, will to me be a perpetual source of pleasure in the recollection,—"

"* Dum memor ipsa mei, dum spiritus hos reget artus."

"I had still some thoughts, while the summer lasted, of being obliged to go to London on some little business; otherwise I should certainly have troubled him with a letter several months ago, and given some vent to my gratitude and admiration. This I intend to do as soon as I am left a little at leisure. Meantime, if you have occasion to write to him: — you would offer him my most respectful compliments, and assure him of the sincerity of my attachment and the warmth of my gratitude.

"I am, &c.,

JAMES BOSWELL"

"Lichfield, Oct. 19. 1772.— I set out on Thursday day, at nine, and arrived at Lichfield on Friday night, at eleven, no otherwise incommended than with want of sleep, which, however, I enjoyed very comfortably the first night. I think a stage coach is not the worst bed.

"Ashbourne, Nov. 4. 1772.— Since I came to Ashbourne I have been out of order. I was well at Lichfield. You know sickness will drive me to you; so, perhaps, you very heartily wish me better:"

1 This application of the scriptural phrase was not very becoming, but the meaning was correct; the facts and the law only ought to be considered by the judge — the verbal decorations of style should be of no weight. It is probable that the judge who used it was barring Boswell on some pleading in which there was, perhaps, more ornament than substance. — Croker.

5 It appears from the extracts of his letters to Mrs. Thrale, which I have given in the text, that in the autumn of this year Johnson again visited Lichfield and Ashbourne, where he was somewhat indisposed; and on his return to town had a fit of the gout, accompanied by a cough, which gave him more trouble. — Croker.
but you know likewise that health will not hold me away.

"Ashbourne, Nov. 27. 1772. — If you are so kind as to write to me on Saturday, the day on which you will receive this, I shall have it before I leave Ashbourne. I am to go to Lichfield on Wednesday, and purpose to find my way to London through Birmingham and Oxford. I was yesterday at Chatsworth. It is a very fine house. I wish you had been with me to see it; for then, as we are apt to want matter of talk, we should have gained something new to talk on. They complimented me with playing the fountain, and opening the cascade. But I am of my friend’s opinion, that, when one has seen the ocean, cascades are but little things.”]

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In 1773, his only publication was an edition of his folio Dictionary, with additions and corrections; nor did he, so far as is known, furnish any productions of his fertile pen to any of his numerous friends or dependants, except the Preface* to his old amanuensis Macbean’s "Dictionary of Ancient Geography," His Shakespeare, indeed, which had been received with high approbation by the public, and gone through several editions, was this year republished by George Steevens, Esq., a gentleman not only deeply skilled in ancient learning, and of very extensive reading in English literature, especially the early writers, but at the same time of acute discernment and elegant taste.

It is almost unnecessary to say, that by his great and valuable additions to Dr. Johnson’s work, he justly obtained considerable reputation:

"Divisum imperium cum Jove Caesar habet." [JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE. (Extracts.)

"Last night was very tedious, and this day makes no promises of much ease. However, I have this day put on my shoe, and hope that gout is gone. I shall have only the cough to contend with; and I doubt whether I shall get rid of that without change of place. I caught cold in the coach as I went away, and am disordered by very little things. Is it accent or age?"

"Feb. 10. 1773.

"I think I am better, but cannot say much more than that I think so. I was yesterday with Miss Lucy Southwell and Mrs. Williams, at Mr. Southwell’s. Miss Frances Southwell is not well. I have an invitation to dine at Sir Joshua Reynolds’s on Tuesday. May I accept it?"

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, Feb. 22. 1773.

"Dear Sir, — I have read your kind letter much more than the elegant Pindar which it accompanied. I am always glad to find myself not forgotten; and to be forgotten by you would give me great uneasiness. My northern friends have been unkind to me: I have from you, dear Sir, testimonies of affection, which I have not often been able to excite; and Dr. Buffie rates the testimony I was desirous of paying to his merit, much higher than I should have thought it reasonable to expect.

"I have heard of your masquerade. What says your synod to such innovations? I am not studiously scrupulous, nor do I think a masquerade either evil in itself, or very likely to be the occasion of evil; yet, as the world thinks it a very licentious relaxation of manners, I would not have been one of the first masquers in a country where no masquerade had ever been before.

"A new edition of my great Dictionary is printed, from a copy which I was persuaded to revise; but, having made no preparation, I was able to do very little. Some superfluities I have expunged, and some faults I have corrected, and here and there have scattered a remark; but the main fabric of the work remains as it was. I had looked very little into it since I wrote it; and, I think, I found it full as often better, as worse, than I expected.

The two ladies mentioned were, probably, daughters of the first lord: Frances, born in 1718, and Lucy, born in 1718.

4 There had been masquerades in Scotland; but not for a very long time. — BOSWELL. This masquerade was given on the 16th of January, by the Countess Dowager of Fife. Johnson had no doubt seen an account of it in the Gentleman’s Magazine for January, where it is said to have been the first masquerade ever seen in Scotland. Mr. Boswell himself appeared in the character of a Dumb Conjuror. — CROKER.

1 He, however, wrote, or partly wrote, an Epitaph on Mrs. Bell, wife of his friend John Bell, Esq., brother of the Rev. Dr. Bell, Prebendary of Westminster, which is printed in his works. It is in English prose, and has so little of his manner, that I did not believe he had any hand in it, till I was satisfied of the fact by the authority of Mr. Bell. — BOSWELL. 2 Dr. Johnson’s early friend, Mr. Edmond Southwell, third son of the first Lord Southwell, born in 1705, had died in the preceding November, aged 67: the Mr. Southwell here mentioned was, probably, Thomas Arthur, afterwards the fourth Lord and second Viscount. (See ante, p. 126.)

It was long since observed by Horace, that no ship could leave care behind: you have been attended in your voyage by other powers,—by benevolence and constancy; and I hope care did not often show her face in their company.

I received the copy of Rasselas. The impression is not magnificent, but it flatters an author, because the printer seems to have expected that it would be scattered among the people. "Johnson's Court, March 4. 1773.

Sir, Of all those whom the various accidents of life have brought within my notice, there is scarce any man whose acquaintance I have more desired to cultivate than yours. I cannot indeed charge you with neglecting me, yet our mutual inclination could never gratify itself with opportunities. The current of the day always bore us away from one another, and now the Atlantic is between us.

"Whether you carried away an impression of me as pleasing as that which you left me of yourself; I know not; if you did, you have not forgotten me, and will be glad that I have not forgotten you. They hope to find an open ocean, but I suspect it is one mass of perpetual congelation. I do not much wish well to discoveries, for I am always afraid they will end in conquest and robbery.

"G[oldsmith] is so distressed with abuse about his play, that he has solicited Goldsmith to take him off the rack of the newspapers. M[ickle] is preparing a whole pamphlet against G[arrick], and G[arrick] is, I suppose, collecting materials to confute M[ickle].

Jennens has published Hamlet, but without a preface, and S[teevens] declares his intention of letting him pass the rest of his life in peace. Here is news."

On Saturday, April 3., the day after my arrival in London this year, I went to his house late in the evening, and sat with Mrs. Williams till he came home. I found in the London Chronicle, Dr. Goldsmith's apology to the public for beating Evans, a bookseller, on account of a paragraph in a newspaper published by him, which Goldsmith thought impertinent to him and to a lady of his acquaintance. The apology was written to much in Dr. Johnson's manner, that both Mrs. Williams and I supposed it to be his; but when he came home, he soon undeceived us. When he said to Mrs. Williams, "Well, Dr. Goldsmith's manifesto has got into your paper," I asked him if Dr. Goldsmith had written it, with an air that made him see I suspected it was his, though subscribed by Goldsmith. Johnson, "Sir, Dr. Goldsmith would no more have asked me to write such a thing as that for him, than he would have asked me to feed him with a spoon, or to do any thing else that denoted his imbecility. I as much believe that he wrote it, as if I had seen him do it. Sir, had he shown it to any one friend, he would not have been allowed to publish it. He has, indeed, done it very well; but it is a foolish thing well done. I suppose he has been so much elated with the success of his new comedy, that he has thought every thing that concerned him must be of

1 The late Winfane Samuel Johnson of Connecticut. This gentleman spent several years in England about the middle of the last century. He received the degree of Doctor of Civil Law from the University of Oxford; and this circumstance, together with the accidental similarity of name, recommended him to the acquaintance of Dr. Samuel Johnson. Two letters passed between them, after the American Dr. Johnson had returned to his native country; of which, however, this is the only one remaining. — Gent. Mag. — Croker.

2 The play in question was Goldsmith's new comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer." Johnson calls it "Colman's Play," because Colman was the manager of Covent Garden Theatre, where it had been produced (15th March) contrary to the wishes of the manager, who thought it very ill adapted for success on the stage. The piece, however, was completely successful; and some of the friends of Goldsmith, and some of the small wits about town, filled the newspapers with verses to Colman, which would appear to have annoyed the manager so much, that he, as Johnson says, solicited Goldsmith "to take him off the rack of the newspapers." Some of the squibs have been reprinted by Prior in his Life of Goldsmith. — P. CUNNINGHAM.

3 See Garrick's letter to Boswell, post, Oct. 23. 1773: the quarrel was on the subject of the "Siege of Marsailles." — Croker.

4 Charles Jennens, of Gopall, Esq., a man of large fortune, but questionable taste, meditated an edition of Shakespeare, and published two or three plays as specimens. Something in his preface to King Lear stirred the rivalry and bile of Steevens, who for some time persecuted the old amateur with a malignity more personal than critical, but accepted it, appears, the publication of Hamlet without a preface, as a peace-offering; but Jennens did not long enjoy this tranquillity, for he died the same year. — Croker.

5 The offence given was a long abusive letter in the London Packet. A particular account of this transaction, and Goldsmith's Vindication (for such it was, rather than an Apology), may be found in the Life of that poet, prefixed to his Miscellaneous Works. — Malone.
importance to the public,” Boswell. “I fancy, Sir, this is the first time that he has been engaged in such an adventure.” Johnson. “Why, Sir, I believe it is the first time he has beat,” he may have been beaten before. This, Sir, is a new plume to him.”

I mentioned Sir John Dalrymple’s “Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland,” and his discoveries to the prejudice of Lord Russell and Algernon Sidney. Johnson. “Why, Sir, every body who has just notions of government thought them rascals before. It is well that all mankind is not deemed to be rascals.” Boswell. “But, Sir, may not those discoveries be true without their being rascals?” Johnson. “Consider, Sir; would any of them have been willing to have had it known that they intrigued with France? Depend upon it, Sir, he who does what he is afraid should be known, has something rotten about him. This Dalrymple seems to be an honest fellow; for he tells equally what makes against both sides. But nothing can be poorer than his mode of writing; it is the mere bumbling of a schoolboy: Great He! but greater She! and such stuff.”

I could not agree with him in this criticism; for though Sir John Dalrymple’s style is not regularly formed in any respect, and one cannot help smiling sometimes at his affected grandiloquence, there is in his writing a pointed vivacity, and much of a gentlemanly spirit.

At Mr. Thrale’s, in the evening, he repeated his usual paradoxical declamation against action in public speaking. “Action can have no effect upon reasonable minds. It may augment noise, but it never can enforce argument. If you speak to a dog, you use action; you hold up your hand thus, because he is a brute; and in proportion as men are removed from brutes, action will have the less influence upon them.” Mrs. Thrale. “What then, Sir, becomes of Demosthenes’ saying? ‘Action, action, action!’” Johnson. “Demosthenes, Madam, spoke to an assembly of brutes; to a barbarous people.”

I thought it extraordinary, that he should deny the power of rhetorical action upon human nature, when it is proved by innumerable facts in all stages of society. Reasonable beings are not solely reasonable. They have fancies which may be pleased, passions which may be roused. Lord Chesterfield being mentioned, Johnson remarked, that almost all of that celebrated nobleman’s witty sayings were puns. He, however, allowed the merit of good wit to his lordship’s saying of Lord Tyrwhale and himself, when both very old and infirm: “Tyrwhale and I have been dead these two years; but we don’t choose to have it known.”

He talked with approbation of an intended edition of ‘The Spectator;’ with notes; two volumes of which had been prepared by a gentleman eminent in the literary world, and the materials which he had collected for the remainder had been transferred to another hand. He observed, that all works which describe manners, require notes in sixty or seventy years, or less; and told us, he had communicated all he knew that could throw light upon ‘The Spectator.’ He said, “Addison had made his Sir Andrew Freeport a true Whig, arguing against giving charity to beggars, and throwing out other such ungracious sentiments; but that he had thought better, and made amends by making him found an hospital for decayed farmers.” He called for the volume of ‘The Spectator’ in which that account is contained, and read it aloud to us. He read so well, that every thing acquired additional weight and grace from his utterance.

The conversation having turned on modern imitations of ancient ballads, and some one having praised their simplicity, he treated them with that ridicule which he always displayed when that subject was mentioned. 3

He disapproved of introducing scripture phrases into secular discourse. This seemed to me a question of some difficulty. A scripture expression may be used, like a highly classical phrase, to produce an instantaneous strong impression; and it may be done without being at all improper. Yet I own there is danger, that applying the language of our sacred book to ordinary subjects may tend to lessen our reverence for it. If therefore it be introduced at all, it should be with very great caution.

On Thursday, April 8, I sat a good part of the evening with him, but he was very silent.

1 Mr. Chalmers, in the article “Goldsmith,” in the Biog. Dict., states, on the authority of Evans, that he had beaten Goldsmith, and not Goldsmith him; and Mr. Peter, who seldom conceals anything to Goldsmith’s disparagement, produces the recollections of Harris the bookseller, late of St. Paul’s Church Yard, who was Evans’s shopman, and present at the fray, which gave Goldsmith rather the worst of it. Goldsmith alleged in defence of his proceeding, that the article was disrespectful to a young lady, Mr. Hornecks (ante, p. 138, n. 2); but the allusion to her was very slight, and hardly disrespectful. Goldsmith was obliged to compromise the assault by paying 50 to a Welsh charity. — Croker.

2 A bombastic ode of Oldham’s on Ben Jonson, begins thus: “Great thou, Oldham! whose great name is memorized. — Malone. Mr. Malone’s note is absurd. Johnson, as Mr. Hlattam observed to me, clearly meant Dalrymple’s description of the parting of Lord and Lady Russell: ‘He great in this last act of his life, but she greater.’ — Croker, 1853.

3 Johnson might have better replied, that Demosthenes never used this term in our sense, here alluded to, of theatrical gesture—he probably meant energy. It must be remembered, Danton’s requisite for a revolutionary leader, “de l’audace, encore de l’audace, toujours de l’audace.” — Croker.

4 James O’Hara, Lord Tyrwhale, a general officer, was born in 1690, and died July 13, 1775. His name, I fear, was meant to fill a blank in Pope’s satire — — or level T.-g’s crew. — Croker.

5 Mr. Chalmers (who, himself, has performed this task) informs me, that the first of these gentlemen was Dr. Percy, and the second Dr. John Calder, of whom some account will be found, Gent. Mag. vol. Ixxxv, p. 354.— Croker.

6 Boswell, good-naturedly reluctant to publish Johnson’s frequent ridicule on Bishop Percy (who was still alive), here suppressed details, which however may be sufficiently guessed at from what we shall see subsequently, post, March 21, 1776, and April, 1778. — Croker.
He said, "Burnet's 'History of his own Times' is very entertaining. The style, indeed, is mere chit-chat. I do not believe that Burnet intentionally lied; but he was so much pre-judiced, that he took no pains to find out the truth. He was like a man who resolves to regulate his time by a certain watch; but will not inquire whether the watch is right or not.

Though he was not disposed to talk, he was unwilling that I should leave him; and when I looked at my watch, and told him it was twelve o'clock, he cried, "What's that to you and me?" and ordered Frank to tell Mrs. Williams that we were coming to drink tea with her, which we did. It was settled that we should go to church together next day.

On the 9th of April, being Good Friday, I breakfasted with him on tea and cross-buns; Doctor Levett, as Frank called him, making the tea. He carried me with him to the church of St. Clement Danes, where he had his seat; and his behaviour was, as I had imaged to myself, solemnly devout. I never shall forget the tremulous earnestness with which he pronounced the awful petition in the Litany: "In the hour of death, and at the day of judgment, good Lord deliver us."

We went to church both in the morning and evening. In the interval between the two services we did not dine; but he read in the Greek New Testament, and I turned over several of his books.

In Archbishop Laud's Diary, I found the following passage, which I read to Dr. Johnson:

"1625. February 1st. Sunday. I stood by the most illustrious Prince Charles, \(^1\) at dinner. He was then very merry, and talked occasionally of many things with his attendants. Among other things, he said, that if he were necessitated to take any particular profession of life, he could not be a lawyer, adding his reasons: 'I cannot,' saith he, 'defend a bad, nor yield in a good cause.'"

Johnson. "Sir, this is false reasoning; because every cause has a bad side; and a lawyer is not overcome, though the cause which he has endeavoured to support be determined against him."

I told him that Goldsmith had said to me a few days before, "As I take my shoes from the shoemaker, and my coat from the tailor, so I take my religion from the priest." I regretted this loose way of talking. Johnson. "Sir, he knows nothing; he has made up his mind about nothing."

To my great surprise he asked me to dine with him on Easter Day. I never supposed that he had a dinner at his house; for I had not then heard of any one of his friends having been entertained at his table. He told me, "I generally have a meat pie on Sunday: it is baked at a public oven, which is very properly allowed, because one man can attend it; and thus the advantage is obtained of not keeping servants from church to dress dinners."

April 11, being Easter Sunday, after having attended divine service at St. Paul's, I repaired to Dr. Johnson's. I had gratified my curiosity much in dining with Jean Jaques Rousseau, while he lived in the wilds of Neuchâtel: I had as great a curiosity to dine with Dr. Samuel Johnson, in the dusky recess of a court in Fleet Street. I supposed we should scarcely have knives and forks, and only some strange, uncouth, ill-drest dish: but I found every thing in very good order. We had no other company but Mrs. Williams and a young woman whom I did not know. As a dinner here was considered as a singular phenomenon, and as I was frequently interrogated on the subject, my readers may perhaps be desirous to know our bill of fare. Foote, I remember, in allusion to Francis, the negro, was willing to suppose that our repast was black broth. But the fact was, that we had a very good soup, a boiled leg of lamb and spinach, a veal pie, and a rice pudding.

Of Dr. John Campbell, the author, he said, "He is a very inquisitive and a very able man, and a man of good religious principles, though I am afraid he has been deficient in practice. Campbell is radically right; and we may hope that in time there will be good practice."

He owned that he thought Hawkins was one of his imitators, but he did not think Goldsmith was. Goldsmith, he said, had great merit, \(^1\) of Boswell. "But Sir, he is much indebted to you for his getting so high in the public estimation." Johnson. "Wily, Sir, he has, perhaps, got sooner to it by his intimacy with me."

Goldsmith, though his vanity often excited him to occasional competition, had a very high regard for Johnson, which he had at this time expressed in the strongest manner in the Dedication of his comedy, entitled, "She Stoops to Conquer."\(^4\)

Johnson observed, that there were very few books printed in Scotland before the union. He had seen a complete collection of them in the possession of the Hon. Archibald Campbell, a non-juring bishop.\(^5\) I wish this collection had been kept entire. Many of them are in years in intimacy with you. It may serve the interests of mankind also to inform them, that the greatest wit may be found in a character, without impairing the most unaffected pietie." – Boswell.

the library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh. I told Dr. Johnson that I had some intention to write the life of the learned and worthy Thomas Ruddiman. He said, "I should take pleasure in helping you to do honour to him. But his farewell letter to the Faculty of Advocates, when he resigned the office of their librarian, should have been in Latin."

I put a question to him upon a fact in common life, which he could not answer, nor have I found any one else who could. What is the reason that women servants, though obliged to be at the expense of purchasing their own clothes, have much lower wages than men servants, to whom a great proportion of that article is furnished, and when in fact our female house-servants work much harder than the male?

He told me that he had twelve or fourteen times attempted to keep a journal of his life, but never could persevere. He advised me to do it. "The great thing to be recorded," said he, "is the state of your own mind; and you should write down every thing that you remember, for you cannot judge at first what is good or bad; and write immediately while the impression is fresh, for it will not be the same a week afterwards."

I again solicited him to communicate to me the particulars of his early life. He said, "You shall have them all for twopence. I hope you shall know a great deal more of me before you write my Life." He mentioned to me this day many circumstances, which I wrote down when I went home, and have interwoven in the former part of this narrative.

On Tuesday, April 13, he and Dr. Goldsmith dined at General Oglethorpe's. Goldsmith expatiated on the common topic, that the race of our people was degenerated, and that this was owing to luxury. Johnson, "Sir, in the first place, I doubt the fact." I believe there are as many tall men in England now, as ever there were. But, secondly, supposing the stature of our people to be diminished, that is not owing to luxury; for, Sir, consider to how very small a proportion of our people luxury can reach. Our soldiers, surely, are not luxurious, who live on sixpence a day; and the same remark will apply to almost all the other classes. Luxury, so far as it reaches the poor, will do good to the race of people; it will strengthen and multiply them. Sir, no nation was ever hurt by luxury; for, as I said before, it can reach but to a very few. I admit that the great increase of commerce and manufactures hurts the military spirit of a people; because it produces a competition for something else than martial honours. — a competition for riches. It also hurts the bodies of the people; for you will observe, there is no man who works at any particular trade, but you may know him from his appearance to do so. One part or the other of his body being more used than the rest, he is some degree deformed: but, Sir, that is not luxury. A tailor sits cross-legged; but that is not luxury," Goldsmith. "Come, you're just going to the same place by another road." Johnson. "Nay, Sir, I say that is not luxury. Let us take a walk from Charing Cross to White-chapel, through, I suppose, the greatest series of shops in the world; what is there in any of these shops (if you except gin-shops) that can do any human being any harm?" Goldsmith. "Well, Sir, I'll accept your challenge. The very next shop to Northumberland House is a pickle-shop." Johnson. "Well, Sir; do we not know that a maid can in one afternoon make pickles sufficient to serve a whole family for a year? say, that five pickle-shops can serve all the kingdom? Besides, Sir, there is no harm done to any body by the making of pickles, or the eating of pickles."

We drank ten with the ladies; and Goldsmith sang Tony Lumpkin's song in his comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," and a very pretty one, to an Irish tune, which he had designed for Miss Hardecastle; but as Mrs. Bulkeley, who played the part, could not sing, it was left out. He afterwards wrote it down for me, by which means it was preserved, and now appears amongst his poems.

1 There is a greater variety of employment for men, than for women; therefore the demand raises the price. — Kerney. And there is more specialty, and generally greater difficulty and responsibility, in the duties of the men. — Croker. The following is his own minute but not uninteresting memorandum of this day:

"April 11, 1773. I had more disturbance in the night than has been customary for some weeks past. I rose before nine in the morning, and prayed and drank tea. I came, I think, to church in the beginning of the prayers. I did not distinctly hear the Psalms, and that I had been reading the Psalms for Good Friday. I went through the Litany, after a short disturbance, with tolerable attention.

My prayer in the pew, then went nearer the altar, and being introduced into another pew, used my prayer again, and recommended my relations, with Bathurst and [Miss] Beeothey, then my wife again by herself. Then I went nearer the altar, and read the collect chosen for meditation. I prayed for Salisbury, [Mrs. Thrale's mother] and her family; and an acquaintance, who was dead) and, I think, the Thrales. Then I communicated with calmness, used the collect for Easter Day, and returning to the first pew, prayed my prayer the third time. I came home again; used my prayer and the Easter Collect. Then went into the study to Boswell, and read the Greek Testament. Then dined, and when Boswell went away, ended the four first chapters of St. Matthew, and the Beatitudes of the fifth.

I then went to Evening prayers, and was composed. I gave the pew-keepers each five shillings and three-pence."— Prayers and Meditations. Quarter guineas of Mr. Sd. went at that time in circulation. — Croker.

There seems so much reason to believe the fact: old colins and old armour do not designate a taller race of men. Pope tells us that Colley Cibber obtained King Edward's armour from the Tower, and wore it in a theatrical procession; and I have never seen any ancient armour of extraordinary size. The doors, windows, and ceilings of old houses are not in proportion of the height of the rooms itself, too, cannot have degenerated in size by the luxury of man; and they seem, by all evidence, to have borne in old times the same proportion to the human figure that they now bear. — Croker.

4 The humour of Ballamagary. — Boswell. This air, which is lastly related to me, I believe would have been very ill suited to the character of Miss Hardecastle, even as the Chambermaid. It was long after more appropriately employed by Colman for Lowery Mackinder in his farce of the Wags of Windsor. — Mr. Moore has since tried to bring it in his way home, stopped at my lodgings in Piccadilly, and sat with me, drinking tea a second time, till a late hour.

I told him that Mrs. Macaulay said, she wondered how he could reconcile his political principles with his moral: his notions of inequality and subordination with wishing well to the happiness of all mankind, who might live so agreeably, had they all their portions of land, and none to domineer over another. Johnson. "Why, Sir, I reconcile my principles very well, because mankind are happier in a state of inequality and subordination. Were they to be in this pretty state of equality, they would soon degenerate into brutes; they would become Monboddo's nation; their tails would grow. Sir, all would be losers, were all to work for all: they would have no intellectual improvement. All intellectual improvement arises from leisure; all leisure arises from one working for another."

Talking of the family of Stuart, he said, "It should seem that the family at present on the throne has now established as good a right as the former family, by the long consent of the people; and that to disturb this right might be considered as culpable. At the same time I own, that it is a very difficult question, when considered with respect to the house of Stuart. To oblige people to take oaths as to the disputed right, is wrong. I know not whether I could take them; but I do not blame those who do." So conscientions and so delicate was he upon this subject, which has occasioned so much clamour against him.

Talking of law cases, he said, "The English reports, in general, are very poor; only the half of what has been said is taken down; and of that half, much is mistaken. Whereas, in Scotland, the arguments on each side are deliberately put in writing, to be considered by the court. I think a collection of your cases upon subjects of importance, with the opinions of the Judges upon them, would be valuable."

On Thursday, April 15, I dined with him and Dr. Goldsmith at General Paoli's. We found here Signor Martinelli 1 of Florence, author of a History of England in Italian, printed at London. I spoke of Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd," in the Scottish dialect, as the best pastoral that had ever been written; not only abounding with beautiful rural imagery, and just and pleasing sentiments, but being a real picture of manners; and I offered to teach Dr. Johnson to understand it. "No, Sir," said he, "I won't learn it. You shall retain your superiority by not knowing it."

This brought on a question whether one man is lessened by another's acquiring an equal degree of knowledge with him. Johnson asserted the affirmative. I maintained that the position might be true in those kinds of knowledge which produce wisdom, power, and force, so as to enable one man to have the government of others; but that a man is not in any degree lessened by others knowing as well as he what ends in mere pleasure:—

"eating fine fruits, drinking delicious wines, reading exquisite poetry."

The General observed, that Martinelli was a Whig. Johnson. "I am sorry for it. It shows the spirit of the times: he is obliged to temporise." Boswell. "I rather think, Sir, that Toryism prevails in this reign." Johnson. "I know not why you should think so, Sir. You see your friend Lord Lyttelton, a nobleman, is obliged in his History (of Henry II.) to write the most vulgar Whiggism."

An animated debate took place whether Martinelli should continue his History of England to the present day. Goldsmith. "To be sure he should." Johnson. "No, Sir; he would give great offence. He would have to tell of almost all the living great what they do not wish told." Goldsmith. "It may, perhaps, be necessary for a native to be more cautious; but a foreigner who comes among us without prejudice, may be considered as holding the place of a judge, and may speak his mind freely." Johnson. "Sir, a foreigner, when he sends a work from the press, ought to be on his guard against catching the error and mistaken enthusiasm of the people among whom he happens to be." Goldsmith. "Sir, he wants only to sell his history, and to tell truth; one an honest, the other a laudable motive."

Johnson. "Sir, they are both laudable motives. It is laudable in a man to wish to live by his labours; but he should write so as he may live by them, not so as he may be knocked on the head. I would advise him to be at Calais before he publishes his history of the present age. A foreigner who attaches himself to a political party in this country, is in the worst state that can be imagined: he is looked upon as a mere intermeddler. A native may do it from interest." Boswell. "Or principle."

Goldsmith. "There are people who tell a hundred political lies every day, and are not hurt by it. Surely, then, one may tell truth with safety." Johnson. "Why, Sir, in the first place, he who tells a hundred lies has disarmed the force of his lies. But, besides; a man had rather have a hundred lies told of him, than one truth which he does not wish should be told." Goldsmith. "For my part, I'd tell truth, and shame the devil." Johnson. "Yes, Sir; but the devil will be angry. I wish to shame the devil as much as you do, but I should choose to be out of the reach of his claws." Goldsmith. "His claws can do you no harm, when you have the shield of truth."

1 Vincenzo Martinelli instructed many of our nobility in his native idiom. His History of England, in two quarto volumes, is a mere compilation from Rapi. An octavo volume of his "Lettere Familiarie" is rather amusing, for the complacency of the writer respecting his own importance, and the narratives of his visits to various noblemen, whose names spangle his pages. —Croker.

It having been observed that there was little hospitality in London: Johnson. "Nay, Sir, any man who has a name, or who has the power of pleasing, will be very generally invited in London. The man Sterne, I have been told, has had engagements for three months." Goldsmith. "And a very dull fellow." Johnson. "Why, no, Sir."

Martinelli told us, that for several years he lived much with Charles Townshend, 2 and that he ventured to tell him he was a bad joker. Johnson. "Why, Sir, thus much I can say upon the subject. One day he and a few more agreed to go and dine in the country, and each of them was to bring a friend in his carriage with him. Charles Townshend asked Fitzherbert to go with him, but told him, "You must find somebody to bring you back: I can only carry you there." Fitzherbert did not much like this arrangement. He however consented, observing sarcastically, "It will do very well; for then the same jokes will serve you in returning as in going."

An eminent public character 3 being mentioned: Johnson. "I remember being present when he showed himself to be so corrupted, or at least something so different from what I think right, as to maintain, that a member of parliament should go along with his party, right or wrong. Now, Sir, this is so remote from native virtue, from scholastic virtue, that a good man must have undergone a great change before he can reconcile himself to such a doctrine. It is maintaining that you may lie to the public; for you lie when you call that right which you think wrong, or the reverse. A friend of ours, who is too much an echo of that gentleman, observed, that a man who does not stick uniformly to a party, is only waiting to be bought. Why then, said I, he is only waiting to be what that gentleman is already."

We talked of the king's coming to see Goldsmith's new play [She Stoops to Conquer].— "I wish he would," said Goldsmith: adding, however, with an affected indifference, "Not that it would do me the least good." Johnson. "Well, then, Sir, let us say it would do him good (laughing). No, Sir, this affectation will not pass; it is mighty idle. In such a state as ours, who would not wish to please the chief magistrate?" Goldsmith. "I do wish to please him. I remember a line in Dryden,—

"And every poet is the monarch's friend."

It ought to be reversed." Johnson. "Nay, there are finer lines in Dryden on this subject:—

'For colleges on bounteous Kings depend, And never rebel was to arts a friend."

General Paoli observed, that successful rebels might. Martinelli. "Happy rebellions." Goldsmith. "We have no such phrase." General Paoli. "But have you not the thing?" Goldsmith. "Yes; all our happy revolutions. They have hurt our constitution, and will hurt it, till we mend it by another happy revolution."

"I never before discovered that my friend Goldsmith had so much of the old prejudice in him. General Paoli, talking of Goldsmith's new play, said, "Il a fait un compliment très-gauche à une certaine grande dame;" meaning a duchess of the first rank. 4 I expressed a doubt whether Goldsmith intended it, in order that I might hear the truth from himself. It, perhaps, was not quite fair to endeavour to bring him to a confession, as he might not wish to avow positively his taking part against the Court. He smiled and hesitated. The General at once relieved him, by this beautiful image: "Monsieur Goldsmith est comme la mer, qui jette des perles et beaucoup d'autres belles choses, sans s'en appercevoir." Goldsmith. "Très-bien dit, et très-délicatement."

A person was mentioned, who it was said could take down in short-hand the speeches in

1 Sterne, as may be supposed, was no great favourite with Dr. Johnson; and a lady once ventured to ask him how he liked Dr. Johnson's "works." "You know, Madam," was his reply. But some time afterwards, forgetting himself, he severely censured them, and the lady very aptly retorted, "I understood you to say, Sir, that you had never read them." "No, madam, I did read them, but it was in a stage-coach. I should never have deigned even to look at them had I been at large." — Croker's Men. p. 928. — Chorley.

2 The Right Hon. Charles Townshend, brother of the first Marquis Townshend, whose great but eccentric talents have so been celebrated by Horace Walpole and immortalized by Johnson'sBiographia Literaria, had just concluded his new "Political Satires." — B. Johnson, Life of Johnson, A.D. 1773, 2 vol. 1. 302.

3 This is an instance, as Sir James Mackintosh observed to me, "which proves that the task of elucidating Boswell has not been undertaken too soon." Sir James Lord Wellesley, Mr. Chalmers, and I doubted, at first, whether the "cunning public character" was not Mr. Fox, and the friend of Johnson's, "too much the echo" of the former. Mr. Burke; but we finally agreed that Mr. Burke and Sir Joshua Reynolds were meant; the designation of cunning

4 Public character was, in 1773, more appropriate to Burke than to Fox. Mr. Fox, too, had lately changed his party, while Burke always maintained (see post, 13th August, 1773) and was, indeed, the first who, in his "Thoughts on the Present Discontents," openly avowed and advocated the principle of inviolable adherence to political connections. "putting," as Mr. Prior says, "to silence the hitherto common reproach applied to most public characters of party-men." — Life of Burke, vol. 1. p. 252. This supposition being correct, the other was no doubt Sir Joshua Reynolds. — Chorley.

5 The lady was Anne Luttrell, sister of Lord Carhampston, widow of Mr. Horton, whose marriage with the Duke of Cumberland had originally made a great noise, and was marked with the severe disapprobation of the King. The "compliment" no doubt was Hastings's speech to Miss Neville, in the second act, when he proposes to her to fly "to France, where, even among slaves, the laws of marriage are respected." The audience the first night applied this to the Duke of Cumberland, who happened to be present, with a burst of applause: but this, though it could not have pleased the king, did not prevent his ordering the play on its tenth night. — Chorley.
parliament with perfect exactness. Johnson. "Sir, it is impossible. I remember one Angel, who came to me to write for him a preface or dedication to a book upon short-hand, and he professed to write as fast as a man could speak. In order to try him, I took down a book, and read while he wrote; and I favoured him, for I read more deliberately than usual. I had proceeded but a very little way, when he begged I would desist, for he could not follow me." Hearing now for the first time of this preface or dedication, I said, "What an expense, Sir, do you put us to in buying books, to which you have written prefaces or dedications?" Johnson. "Why, I have dedicated to the royal family all round; that is to say, to the last generation of the royal family." Goldsmith. "And perhaps, Sir, not one sentence of wit in a whole dedication." Johnson. "Perhaps not, Sir." Boswell. "What then is the reason for applying to a particular person to do that which any one may do as well?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, one man has greater readiness at doing it than another." "I spoke of Mr. Harris, of Salisbury, as being a very learned man, and in particular an eminent Grecian. Johnson. "I am not sure of that. His friends give him out as such, but I know not who of his friends are able to judge of it." Goldsmith. "He is what is much better: he is a worthy humane man." Johnson. "Nay, Sir, that is not to the purpose of our argument: that will as much prove that he can play upon the fiddle as well as Giardini, as that he is an eminent Grecian." Goldsmith. "The greatest musical performers have but small endoments. Giardini, I am told, does not get above seven hundred a year." Johnson. "That is indeed but little for a man to get, who does best that which so many endeavour to do. There is nothing, I think, in which the power of art is shown so much as in playing on the fiddle. In all other things we can do something at first. Any man will forge a bar of iron, if you give him a hammer; not so well as a smith, but tolerably. A man will saw a piece of wood, and make a box, though a clumsy one; but give him a fiddle and a fiddlestick, and he can do nothing."

On Monday, April 19th, he called on me with Mrs. Williams, in Mr. Strahan’s coach, and carried me out to dine with Mr. Elphinston, at his academy at Kensington. A printer having acquired a fortune sufficient to keep his coach, was a good topic for the credit of literature. Mrs. Williams said, that another printer, Mr. Hamilton, had not waited so long as Mr. Strahan, but had kept his coach several years sooner. Johnson. "He was in the right. Life is short. The sooner that a man begins to enjoy his wealth, the better."

Mr. Elphinston talked of a new book that was much admired, and asked Dr. Johnson if he had read it. Johnson. "I have looked into it." "What," said Elphinston, "have you not read it through?" Johnson, offended at being thus pressed, and so obliged to own his cursory mode of reading, answered tartly, "No, Sir; do you read books through?"

He this day again defended duelling, and put his argument upon what I have ever thought the most solid basis; that if public war be allowed to be consistent with morality, private war must be equally so. Indeed we may observe what strained arguments are used to reconcile war with the Christian religion. But, in my opinion, it is exceedingly clear that duelling, having better reasons for its barbarous violence, is more justifiable than war, in which thousands go forth without any cause of personal quarrel, and massacre each other.

On Wednesday, April 21st, I dined with him at Mr. Thrale’s. A gentleman attacked Garrick for being vain. Johnson. "No wonder, Sir, that he is vain; a man who is perpetually flattered in every mode that can be conceived. So many bellows have blown the fire, that one wonders he is not by this time become a cinder." Boswell. "And such bellows too! Lord Mansfield with his cheeks like to burst: Lord Chatham like an Eolus. I have read such notes from them to him, as were enough to turn his head." Johnson. "True. When whom every body else flatters, flatters me, I then am truly happy." Mrs. Thrale. "The sentiment is in Congreve, I think." Johnson. "Yes, Madam, in ‘The Way of the World’:

‘If there’s delight in love, ’tis when I see That heart which others bleed for, bleed for me.”

No, Sir, I should not be surprised though Garrick chained the ocean and lashed the winds." Boswell. "Should it not be, Sir, lashed the ocean and chained the winds?" Johnson. "No, Sir; recollect the original:—

1 Mr. Boswell does not include this dedication of "Angela’s Sceophrapy," published in 1738, in his list of Johnson’s compositions. — Croker.
2 James Harris, Esq., father of the first Earl of Malmesbury, was born in 1709, and died in 1760. In 1801, his son published a magnificent edition of his works in two volumes quarto. — Wright. Johnson had a strong prejudice against Mr. Harris; I know not why. Of the Dedication to his "Hermes," Mrs. Piozzi heard Johnson observe, that, though but fourteen lines long, there were six grammatical faults in it. (See sec. 111, Nov. 1773, where he calls him "a coxcomb." — Croker.
3 The Hamiltons were respectable publishers for three generations. — Croker.
4 Lord Chatham addressed to him, while on a visit at Mount Edgecumbe, the pretty lines:

‘Leave, Garrick, leave the landscape, proudly gay,
Docks, forts, and navies, bright’ning all the bay;
To my plain roof repair, primeval seat!
Yet there no wonders your quick eye can meet,
Save should you deem it wonderful to find
Ambition cured, and an unpassion’d mind . . .
Come, then, immortal spirit of the stage,
Great nature’s proxy, glass of every age,
Come, taste the simple life of patriarchs old,
Who, rich in rural peace, never thought of pomp or gold.” — Croker.
This does very well, when both the winds and the sea are personified, and mentioned by their mythological names, as in Juvenal; but when they are mentioned in plain language, the application of the epithets suggested by me is the most obvious; and accordingly my friend himself, in his imitation of the passage which describes Xerxes, has—

"The waves he lashes, and enchains the wind."

The modes of living in different countries, and the various views with which men travel in quest of new scenes, having been talked of, a learned gentleman who holds a considerable office in the law, expatiated on the happiness of a savage life; and mentioned an instance of an officer who had actually lived for some time in the wilds of America, of whom, when in that state, he quoted this reflection with an air of admiration, as if it had been deeply philosophical:—"Here am I, free and unrestrained, amidst the rude magnificence of Nature, with this Indian woman by my side, and this gun, with which I can procure food when I want it: what more can be desired for human happiness?" It did not require much sagacity to foresee that such a sentiment would not be permitted to pass without due animadversion.

JOHNSON. "Do not allow yourself, Sir, to be imposed upon by such gross absurdity. It is sad stuff; it is brutal. If a bull could speak, he might as well exclaim,—Here am I with this cow and this grass; what being can enjoy greater felicity?"

We talked of the melancholy end of a gentleman who had destroyed himself. JOHNSON. "It was owing to imaginary difficulties in his affairs, which, had he talked of with any friend, would soon have vanished." BOSWELL. "Do you think, Sir, that all who commit suicide are mad?" JOHNSON. "Sir, they are often not universally disordered in their intellects, but one passion presses so upon them, that they yield to it, and commit suicide, as a passionate man will stab another." He added, "I have often thought, that after a man has taken the resolution to kill himself, it is not courage in him to do anything; however des-ultimate decision of an important cause by the supreme judicature of the nation?" Johnson. "No, Sir, I do not think it was wrong to publish these letters. If they are thought to do harm, why not answer them? But they will do no harm... If Mr. Douglas be indeed the son of Lady Jane, he cannot be hurt; if he be not her son, and yet has the great estate of the family of Douglas, he may well submit to have a pamphlet against him by Andrew Stuart, Sir. I think such a publication does good, as it does good to show us the possibilities of human life. And, Sir, you will not say that the Douglas cause was a cause of easy decision, when it divided your Court as much as it could do, to be determined at all. When your judges are seven and seven, the casting vote of the president must be given on one side or other; no matter, for my argument, on which; one or the other must be taken; as when I am to move, there is no matter which leg I move first. And then, Sir, it was otherwise determined here. No, Sir, a more dubious determination of any question cannot be imagined."

7 Boswell makes no mention of this excursion, which, I suppose, did not take place, as Boswell saw him in London on the 27th, and Johnson attended Boswell's election at the Club on the 30th.—CROKER.

He said, "Goldsmith should not be for ever attempting to shine in conversation: he has not temper for it, he is so much mortified when he fails. Sir, a game of jokes is composed partly of skill, partly of chance; a man may be beat at times by one who has not the tenth part of his wit. Now Goldsmith's putting himself against another, is like a man laying a hundred to one, who cannot spare the hundred. It is not worth a man's while. A man should not lay a hundred to one, unless he can easily spare it, though he has a hundred chances for him: he can get but a guinea, and may lose a hundred. Goldsmith is in this state. When he contends, if he gets the better, it is a very little addition to a man of his literary reputation: if he does not get the better, he is miserably vexed."

Johnson's own superlative powers of wit set him above any risk of such uneasiness. Garrick had remarked to me of him, a few days before, "Rabelais and all other wits are nothing compared with him. You may be divested by them; but Johnson gives you a forcible hug, and shakes laughter out of you, whether you will or no."

Goldsmith, however, was often very fortunate in his witty contests, even when he entered the lists with Johnson himself. Sir Joshua Reynolds was in company with them one day, when Goldsmith said, that he thought he could write a good fable, mentioned the simplicity which that kind of composition requires, and observed, that in most fables the animals introduced seldom talk in character. "For instance," said he, "the fable of the little fishes, who saw birds fly over their heads, and, envying them, petitioned Jupiter to be changed into birds. The skill," continued he, "consists in making them talk like little fishes." While he indulged himself in this fanciful reverie, he observed Johnson shaking his sides, and laughing. Upon which he smartly proceeded, "Why, Dr. Johnson, this is not so easy as you seem to think: for if you were to make little fishes talk, they would talk like whales."

Johnson, though remarkable for his great variety of composition, never exercised his talents in fable, except we allow his beautiful [fairy] tale [the Fountains] published in Mrs. Williams's Miscellanies to be of that species. I have, however, found among his manuscript collections the following sketch of one:

"Glow-worm lying in the garden saw a candle in a neighbouring palace, — and complained of the littleness of its own light; — another observed — wait a little: — soon dark, — have outlasted πᾶλα [many] of these glaring lights, which are only brighter as they haste to nothing."

On Thursday, April 29, I dined with him at General Ogilthorpe's, where were Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Langton, Dr. Goldsmith, and Mr. Thrale. I was very desirous to get Dr. Johnson absolutely fixed in his resolution to go with me to the Hebrides this year; and I told him that I had received a letter from Dr. Robertson, the historian, upon the subject, with which he was much pleased, and now talked in such a manner of his long intended tour, that I was satisfied he meant to fulfil his engagement.

The custom of eating dogs at Otheite being mentioned, Goldsmith observed, that this was also a custom in China; that a dog-butcher is as common there as any other butcher; and that when he walks abroad all the dogs fall on him. Johnson, "That is not owing to his killing dogs, Sir. I remember a butcher at Lichfield, whom a dog that was in the house where I lived, always attacked. It is the smell of carcage which provokes this, let the animal he has killed be what they may." Goldsmith, "Yes, there is a general abhorrence in animals at the signs of massacre. If you put a tub full of blood into a stable, the horses are like to go mad." Johnson, "I doubt that." Goldsmith, "Nay, Sir, it is a fact well authenticated." Thrale, "You had better prove it before you put it into your book on natural history. You may do it in my stable if you will." Johnson. "Nay, Sir, I respectably ascertained, than by the judgment of the most august tribunal in the world; a judgment in which Lord Mansfield and I were united in 1762, and from which only five of a numerous body entered a protest. — Boswell."

1 I regretted that Dr. Johnson never took the trouble to study a question which interested nations. He would not even read a pamphlet which I wrote upon it, entitled, "The Essence of the Douglas Cause;" which, I have reason to flatter myself, had considerable effect in favour of Mr. Douglas; of whose legitimate filiation I was then, and am still, firmly convinced. Let me add, that no fact can be more would not have him prove it. If he is content to take his information from others, he may get through his book with little trouble, and without much endangering his reputation. But if he makes experiments for so comprehensive a book as his, there would be no end to them; his erroneous assertions would then fall upon himself; and he might be blamed for not having made experiments as to every particular.

The character of Mallet having been introduced, and spoken of slightly by Goldsmith;—Johnson. "Why, Sir, Mallet had talents enough to keep his literary reputation alive as long as he himself lived; and that, let me tell you, is a good deal." Goldsmith. "But I cannot agree that it was so. His literary reputation was dead long before his natural death. I consider an author's literary reputation to be alive only while his name will insure a good price for his copy from the booksellers. I will get you (to Johnson) a hundred guineas for any thing whatever that you shall write, if you put your name to it." Dr. Goldsmith's new play, "She Stoops to Conquer," being mentioned;—Johnson. "I know of no comedy for many years that has so much exhilarated an audience, that has answered so much the great end of comedy—making an audience merry."

Goldsmith having said, that Garrick's compliment to the Queen, which he introduced into the play of "The Chances," which he had altered and revised this year, was mean and gross flattery;—Johnson. "Why, Sir, I would not write, I would not give solemnly under my hand, a character beyond what I thought really true; but a speech on the stage, let it flutter ever so extravagantly, is formal. It has always been formal to chatter kings and queens; so much so, that even in our church-service we have 'our most religious king,' used indiscriminately, whoever is king. Nay, they even chatter themselves;—we have been graciously pleased to grant. No modern flattery, however, is so gross as that of the Augustan age, where the emperor was deified;—"Præsens Deus habebitur Augustus." And as to meanness"—(rising into warmth)—"how is it mean in a player,—a showman,—a fellow who exhibits himself for a shilling, to flatter his queen? The attempt, indeed, was dangerous; for if it had missed, what became of Garrick, and what became of the queen? As Sir William Temple says of a great general, it is necessary not only that his designs be formed in a masterly manner, but that they should be attended with success. Sir, it is right, at a time when the royal family is not generally liked, to let it be seen that the people like at least one of them." Sir Joshua Reynolds. "I do not perceive why the profession of a player should be despised; for the great and ultimate end of all the employments of mankind is to produce amusement. Garrick produces more amusement than any body." Boswell. "You say, Dr. Johnson, that Garrick exhibits himself for a shilling. In this respect he is only on a footing with a lawyer, who exhibits himself for his fee, and even will maintain any nonsense or absurdity, if the case require it. Garrick refuses a play or a part which he does not like: a lawyer never refuses." Johnson. "Why, Sir, what does this prove? only that a lawyer is worse. Boswell is now like Jack in 'The Tale of a Tub,' who, when he is puzzled by an argument, hangs himself. He thinks I shall cut him down, but I'll let him hang"—(laughing vociferously). Sir Joshua Reynolds. "Mr. Boswell thinks that the profession of a lawyer being unquestionably honourable, if he can show the profession of a player to be more honourable, he proves his argument."

CHAPTER XXIX.

On Friday, April 30, I dined with him at Mr. Beaumclerk's, where were Lord Charlemont, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and some more members of the Literary Club, whom he had obligingly invited to meet me, as I was this evening to be balloted for as candidate for admission into that distinguished society. Johnson had done me the honour to propose me, and Beaumclerk was very zealous for me.

Goldsmith being mentioned;—Johnson. "It is amazing how little Goldsmith knows. He seldom comes where he is not more ignorant than any one else." Sir Joshua Reynolds. "Yet there is no man whose company is more liked." Johnson. "To be sure, Sir. When people find a man of the most distinguished abilities as a writer, their inferior while he is with them, it must be highly gratifying to them. What Goldsmith comically says of himself is very true,—he always gets the better when he argues alone; meaning, that he is master of a subject in his study, and can write well upon it; but when he comes into company, grows confused, and unable to talk. Take him as a poet, his 'Traveller' is a very fine performance; ay, and so is his 'Deserted Village,' were it not sometimes too much the echo of his 'Traveller.' Whether, indeed, we take him as a poet,—as a comic writer,—or as an historian, he stands in the first class." Boswell. "An historian! My dear Sir, you surely will not rank his compilation of the Roman History with the works of other historians of this age?" Johnson. "Why, who are before him?" Boswell. "Hume,—Robertson,—Lord Lyttelton." (Johnson's antipathy to the Scotch beginning to rise). "I have not read Hume; but, doubtless, Goldsmith's History is better than the verbiage of Robertson, or the foppery of Dalrymple." Boswell. "Will you not admit the superiority of Robertson, in whose History we find such penetration, such painting?" Johnson. "Sir, you must consider how that penetration and that painting are employed. It is not history, it is imagination. He who describes what he never saw, draws from fancy. Robertson paints minds as Sir Joshua paints faces in a history-piece: he imagines an heroic countenance. You must look upon Robertson's work as romance, and try it by that standard. History it is not. Besides, Sir, it is the great excellence of a writer to put into his book as much as his book will hold. Goldsmith has done this in his History. Now Robertson might have put twice as much into his book. Robertson is like a man who has packed gold in wool: the wool takes up more room than the gold. No, Sir; I always thought Robertson would be crushed by his own weight, would be buried under his own ornaments. Goldsmith tells you shortly all you want to know: Robertson detains you a great deal too long. No man will read Robertson's cumbrous detail a second time; but Goldsmith's plain narrative will please again and again. I would say to Robertson what an old tutor of a college said to one of his pupils: 'Read over your compositions, and wherever you meet with a passage which you think is particularly fine, strike it out.' Goldsmith's abridgement is better than that of Lucius Florus or Eutropius; and I will venture to say, that if you compare him with Vertot, in the same places of the Roman History, you will find that he excels Vertot. Sir, he has the art of compiling, and of saying every thing he has to say in a pleasing manner. He is now writing a Natural History, and will make it as entertaining as a Persian tale."

I cannot dismiss the present topic without observing, that it is probable that Dr. Johnson, who owned that he often "talked for victory," rather urged plausible objections to Dr. Robertson's excellent historical works, in the arduous of contest, than expressed his real and decided opinion; for it is not easy to suppose, that he should so widely differ from the rest of the literary world.

Johnson. "I remember once being with Goldsmith in Westminster Abbey. While we surveyed the Poets' Corner, I said to him, "Forsitan et nostrum nomen miscelbatur istis." When we got to Temple Bar he stopped me, pointed to the heads upon it, and softly whispered me, "Forsitan et nostrum nomen miscelbatur istis."

Johnson praised John Bunyan highly. "His 'Pilgrim's Progress' has great merit, both for invention, imagination, and the conduct of the story; and it has had the best evidence of its merit, the general and continued approbation of mankind. Few books, I believe, have had a more extensive sale. It is remarkable, that it begins very much like the poem of Dante; yet there was no translation of Dante when Bunyan wrote. There is reason to think that he had read Spenser." A proposition which had been agitated, that monuments to eminent persons should, for the time to come, be erected in St. Paul's church, as well as in Westminster Abbey, was mentioned; and it was asked, who should be honoured by having his monument first erected there. Somebody suggested Pope. Johnson. "Why, Sir, as Pope was a Roman Catholic, I would not have his to be first. I think Milton's rather should have the precedence."

1 Robertson's Charles V. and Goldsmith's Roman History were both published in 1769.—WRIGHT.
2 See ante. Mr. Boswell's friendship for both Johnson and Robertson is here severely perplexed—but there seems no ground for doubting that 'his real and decided opinion' of Robertson's works was very low.—he, on every occasion, repeats it with contemptuous consistency.—CROKER.

more highly of him now than I did at twenty. There is more thinking in him and in Butler, than in any of our poets."

Some of the company expressed a wonder why the author of this so excellent a book as "The Whole Duty of Man" should conceal himself? Johnson. "There may be different reasons assigned for this, any one of which would be very sufficient. He may have been a clergyman, and may have thought that his religious counsels would have less weight when known to come from a man whose profession was theology. He may have been a man whose practice was not suitable to his principles, so that his character might injure the effect of his book, which he had written in a season of penitence. Or he may have been a man of rigid self-denial, so that he would have no reward for his pious labours while in this world, but refer it all to a future state."

The gentlemen went away to their club, and I was left at Beauclerk's till the fate of my election should be announced to me. I sat in a state of anxiety which even the charming conversation of Lady Di Beauclerk could not entirely dissipate. In a short time I received the agreeable intelligence that I was chosen. I hastened to the place of meeting, and was introduced to such a society as can seldom be found. Mr. Edmund Burke, whom I then saw for the first time, and whose splendid talents had long made me ardently wish for his acquaintance; Dr. Nugent, Mr. Garrick, Dr. Goldsmith, Mr. (afterwards Sir William) Jones, and the company with whom I had dined. Upon my entrance, Johnson placed himself behind a chair, on which he leaned as on a desk or pulpit, and with humorous formality gave me a charge, pointing out the conduct expected from me as a good member of this club.

Goldsmith produced some very absurd verses which had been publicly recited to an audience for money. Johnson. I can match this non-sense. There was a poem called "Eugenio," which came out some years ago, and concludes thus:—

"And now, ye trifling, self-assuming elves, Brimful of pride, of nothing, of yourselves,
Survey Eugenio, view him o'er and o'er,
Then sink into yourselves, and be no more."

Nay, Dryden, in his poem on the Royal Society, has these lines:

"Then we upon our globe's last verge shall go,
And see the ocean leaning on the sky;
From thence our rolling neighbours we shall know,
And on the lunar world securely pry."

Talking of puns, Johnson, who had a great contempt for that species of wit, designed to allow that there was one good pun in "Menagiana," I think on the word corps.4

"Much pleasant conversation passed, which Johnson relished with great good humour. But his conversation alone, or what led to it, or was interwoven with it, is the business of this work.

On Saturday, May 1st, we dined by ourselves at our old rendezvous, the Mitre Tavern. He was placid, but not much disposed to talk. He observed, that "the Irish mix better with the English than the Scotch do; their language is nearer to English; as a proof of which, they succeed very well as players, which Scotchmen do not. Then, Sir, they have not that extreme nationality which we find in the Scotch. I will do you, Boswell, the justice to say, that you are the most unscottified of your countrymen. You are almost the only instance of a Scottishman that I have known, who did not at every other sentence bring in some other Scotchant.

We drank tea with Mrs. Williams. I introduced a question which has been much agitated in the church of Scotland, whether the claim of lay-patrons to present ministers to parishes be well founded; and supposing it to be well the patience and good nature with which Swift read and corrected this stupid poem.—Croker.

1 There is no such poem;—the lines are part of an allusion to the Royal Society, in the Annuis Mirabilia, stanza 164.—Croker.

2 I formerly thought that I had perhaps mistaken the word, and imagined it to be corps, from its similarity of sound to the real one. For an accurate and shrewd unknown gentleman, to whom I am indebted for some remarks on my work, observes on this passage:—"Q. if not on the word, fort? A. A vociferous French preacher said of Bourdaloue, 'Il preche fort bien, et moi bien fort.'—Menagiana. See also Anecdotes littéraires, art. Bourdaloue." But my ingenuity and obliging correspondent, Mr. Abercrombie of Philadelphia, has pointed out to me the following passage, which renders the preceding conjecture unnecessary, and confirms the original statement:—

3 Madame de Bourdoune, chanoiness of Remiremont, venoit d'entendre un discours plein de feu et d'esprit, mais fort peu de maîtrise et de trés-regular. Une des ses amis, qui y prenait Intérêt pour l'orateur, lui dit en sortant, 'Eh bien, Madame, que vous semble-t-il de ce que vous venez d'entendre ?' 'Oh! y a un chef !' 'Il y a un tant,' répondit Madame de Bourdoune, 'que je n'y ai pas vu de corps.'—Menagiana, tome ii. p. 64.—Boswell.

4 Boswell confesses that Garrick used to rally him on his nationality, and there are abundant instances in these volumes to show that he was not exempt from that amiable prejudice.—Croker.

Mr. Reed informs me that the author of Eugenio, Thomas Bewick, a wine-merchant at Wrexham in Denbighshire, soon after its publication, viz. May 17, 1737, cut his own throat; and that it appears by Swift's works, that the poem had been shown to him, and received some of his corrections. Johnson had read "Eugenio" on his first coming to town, for we see it mentioned in one of his letters to Mr. Cave, which has been inserted in this work.—Boswell. One wonders at founded, whether it ought to be exercised without the concurrence of the people? That church is composed of a series of judicatures: a presbytery, a synod, and finally, a general assembly; before all of which this matter may be contended: and in some cases the presbytery having refused to induct or settle, as they call it, the person presented by the patron, it has been found necessary to appeal to the General Assembly. He said, I might see the subject well treated in the "Defence of Pluralities;" and although he thought that a patron should exercise his right with tenderness to the inclinations of the people of a parish, he was very clear as to his right. Then, supposing the question to be pleaded before the General Assembly, he dictated to me what follows. [See Appendix.]

Though I present to my readers Dr. Johnson's masterly thoughts on the subject, I think it proper to declare, that notwithstanding I am myself a lay patron, I do not entirely subscribe to his opinion.

On Friday, May 7th, I breakfasted with him at Mr. Thrale's in the Borough. While we were alone, I endeavoured as well as I could to apologise for a lady who had been divorced from her husband by act of parliament. I said that he had used her very ill, had behaved brutally to her, and that she could not continue to live with him without having her delicacy compromised; that all affection for her was thus destroyed; that the essence of conjugal union being gone, there remained only a cold form, a mere civil obligation; that she was in the prime of life, with qualities to produce happiness; that these ought not to be lost; and, that the gentleman on whose account she was divorced had gained her heart while thus unhappily situated. Seduced, perhaps, by the charms of the lady in question, I thus attempted to palliate what I was sensible could not be justified; for when I had finished my harangue, my venerable friend gave me a proper check: "My dear Sir, never accus tomy mind to mingle virtue and vice. The woman's a — and there's an end on't."

He described the father of one of his friends thus: "Sir, he was so exuberant a talker at public meetings, that the gentlemen of his county were afraid of him. No business could be done for him."

He did not give me full credit when I mentioned that I had carried on a short conversation by signs with some Esquimaux, who were then in London, particularly with one of them, who was a priest. He thought I could not make them understand me. No man was more incredulous as to particular facts which were at all extraordinary; and therefore no man was more scrupulously inquisitive, in order to discover the truth.

I dined with him this day at the house of my friends, Messieurs Edward and Charles Dilly, booksellers in the Poultry: there were present, their elder brother Mr. Dilly of Bedfordshire, Dr. Goldsmith, Mr. Langton, Mr. Claxton, Rev. Dr. Mayo, a dissenting minister, the Rev. Mr. Toplady, and my friend the Rev. Mr. Temple.

Hawkesworth's compilation of the Voyages to the South Sea being mentioned; — Johnson: "Sir, if you talk of it as a subject of commerce, it will be gainful; if as a book that is to increase human knowledge, I believe there will not be much of that. Hawkesworth can tell only what the voyagers have told him; and they have found very little, only one new animal, I think." Bowles: "But many insects, Sir." Johnson: "Why Sir, as to insects, Ray reckons of British insects twenty thousand species. They might have staid at home and discovered enough in that way."

Talking of birds, I mentioned Mr. Daines Barrington's ingenious Essay against the received notion of their migration. Johnson: "I think we have as good evidence for the migration of woodcocks as can be desired. We find they disappear at a certain time of the year, and appear again at a certain time of the year; and some of them, when weary in their flight, have been known to alight on the rigging of ships far out at sea." One of the company observed, that there had been instances of some of them found in summer in Essex. Johnson: "Sir, that strengthens our argument. Exceptio probat regulam. Some being found shows that, if all remained, many would be found. A few sick or lame ones may be found." Goldsmith: "There is a partial mis

2 No doubt Lady Diana Spencer, daughter of Charles Duke of Marlborough, born in 1734, married in 1757 to Viscount Bolingbroke, from whom she was divorced in 1758, and married immediately after Mr. Topham Beauclerk. All that Johnson says is very true; he could have been better entitled to hold such high language if he had not practically waived his right by living in that lady's private society; for he should either, as a strict moralist, have refused her his countenance, or, as a man of honour and gratitude, been silent as to her frailties. It was not fair to enjoy her society, and disparage her character. — Croker.

3 "One evening," says Mrs. Piozzi, "in the rooms at Bright-helmstone, he fell into a comical discussion with Lord Bolingbroke, that lady's first husband; happening to sit by him, he chose to harangue very loudly about the nature, and use, and abuse of divorces. Many people gathered round them to hear what was said, and when my husband called him away, and told him to whom he had been talking, he received an answer which I will not venture to write down. Something, no doubt, equivalent to what Boswell repeats in the text. — Croker.

7 In his letter to Mrs. Thrale, 9th May, 1773, he says, "dined yesterday in a large company at a Dissenting book seller's, and disputed against toleration with one Dr. Meyer." — Croker.

8 In his letter to the Rev. Mr. Thrale, 29th May, 1773, he says, "cannot reconcile the dates, and the mention of the death of 1 Queen of Denmark, which happened on the 16th May, 1772, ascertains that the date of the letter is correct. Boswell made many of his notes on mere scraps, and in a very confused way, must, I think, have misdated and misplace his note of this conversation. — Croker.
Boswell. "I am well assured that the people of Otahite, who have the bread tree, the fruit of which serves them for bread, laughed heartily when they were informed of the tedious process necessary with us to have bread; plowing, sowing, harrowing, reaping, threshing, grinding, baking." Johnson. "Why, Sir, all ignorant savages will laugh when they are told of the advantages of civilised life. Were you to tell men who live without houses, how we pile brick upon brick, and rafter upon rafter, and that after a house is raised to a certain height, a man tumbles off a scaffold, and breaks his neck; he would laugh heartily at our folly in building; but it does not follow that men are better without houses. No, Sir, (holding up a slice of a good loaf), this is better than the bread tree."

He repeated an argument which is to be found in his "Rambler," against the notion that the brute creation is endowed with the faculty of reason: "Birds build by instinct; they never improve; they build their first nest as well as any one they ever build." Goldsmith. "Yet we see, if you take away a bird's nest with the eggs in it, she will make a sligher nest and lay again." Johnson. "Sir, that is because at first she has full time, and makes her nest deliberately. In the case you mention she is pressed to lay, and must therefore make her nest quickly, and consequently it will be slight." Goldsmith. "The nidification of birds is what is least known in natural history, though one of the most curious things in it."

I introduced the subject of toleration.1 Johnson. "Every society has a right to preserve public peace and order, and therefore has a good right to prohibit the propagation of opinions which have a dangerous tendency. To say the magistrate has this right, is using an inadequate word: it is the society for which the magistrate is agent.2 He may be morally or theologically wrong in restraining the propagation of opinions which he thinks dangerous, but he is politically right." Mayo. "I am of opinion, Sir, that every man is entitled to liberty of conscience in religion; and that the magistrate cannot restrain that right." Johnson. "Sir, I agree with you. Every man has a right to liberty of conscience, and with that the magistrate cannot interfere. People confound liberty of thinking with liberty of talking; nay, with liberty of preaching. Every man has a physical right to think as he pleases; for it cannot be discovered how he thinks. He has not a moral right, for he ought to inform himself, and think justly. But, Sir, no member of a society has a right to teach any doctrine contrary to what the society holds to be true. The magistrate, I say, may be wrong in what he thinks: but while he thinks himself right, he may and ought to enforce what he thinks." Mayo. "Then, Sir, we are to remain always in error, and truth never can prevail; and the magistrate was right in persecuting the first Christians." Johnson. "Sir, the only method by which religious truth can be established is by martyrdom. The magistrate has a right to enforce what he thinks; and he who is conscious of the truth has a right to suffer. I am afraid there is no other way of ascertaining the truth, but by persecution on the one hand and enduring it on the other." Goldsmith. "But how is a man to act, Sir? Though firmly convinced of the truth of his doctrine, may he not think it wrong to expose himself to persecution? Has he a right to do so? Is it not, as it were, committing voluntary suicide?" Johnson. "Sir, as to voluntary suicide, as you call it, there are twenty thousand men in an army who will go without scruple to be shot at, and mount a breach for fivepence a day." Goldsmith. "But have they a moral right to do this?" Johnson. "Nay, Sir, if you will not take the universal opinion of mankind, I have nothing to say. If mankind cannot defend their own way of thinking, I cannot defend it. Sir, if a man is in doubt whether it would be better for him to expose himself to martyrdom or not, he should not do it. He must be convinced that he has a delegation from heaven." Goldsmith. "I would consider whether there is the greater chance of good or evil upon the whole. If I see a man who has fallen into a well, I would wish to help him out; but if there is a greater probability that he shall pull me in, than that I shall pull him out, I would not attempt it. So, were I to go to Turkey, I might wish to convert the grand signior to the Christian faith; but when I considered that I should probably be put to death without effectuating my purpose in any degree, I should keep myself quiet." Johnson. "Sir, you must consider that we have perfect and imperfect obligations. Perfect obligations, which are generally not to do something, are clear and positive; as, 'Thou shalt not kill.' But charity, for instance, is not definable by limits. It is a duty to give to the poor; but no man can say how much another should give to the poor, or when a man has given too little to save his soul. In the same manner it is a duty to instruct the ignorant, and of consequence to convert infidels to Christianity; but no man in the common course of things is obliged to carry this to such a degree as to incur the danger of martyrdom, as no man is obliged to strip himself to the shirt in order to give charity. I have said, that a man must be persuaded that he has a particular delegation from heaven." Goldsmith. "How is this to be known? Our first reformers, who were burnt for not believing bread and wine to be Christ—" Johnson (interrupting him). "Sir, they were not burnt for not believing bread and wine to be Christ, but for insulting those who did believe it. And, Sir, when the first reformers began, they did not intend to be martyred; as many of them ran away as could." Boswell. "But, Sir, there was your countryman Elwal, who told you me challenged King George with his black-guards, and his red-guards." Johnson. "My countryman, Elwal, Sir, should have been put in the stocks—a proper pulp for him; and he'd have had a numerous audience. A man who preaches in the stocks will always have hearers enough." Boswell. "But Elwal thought himself in the right." Johnson. "We are not providing for mad people; there are places for them in the neighbourhood" (meaning Moorfields). Mayo. "But, Sir, is it not very hard that I should not be allowed to teach my children what I really believe to be the truth?" Johnson. "Why, Sir, you might contrive to teach your children extrâ scandalum; but, Sir, the magistrate, if he knows it, has a right to restrain you. Suppose you teach your children to be thieves?" Mayo. "This is making a joke of the subject." Johnson. "Nay, Sir, take it thus:—that you teach them the community of goods; for which there are as many plausible arguments as for most erroneous doctrines. You teach them that all things at first were in common, and that no man had a right to anything but as he laid his hands upon it; and that this still is, or ought to be, the rule amongst mankind. Here, Sir, you sap a great principle in society,—property. And don't you think the magistrate would have a right to prevent you? Or, suppose you should teach your children the notion of the Adamites, and they should run naked into the streets, would not the magistrate have a right to flog 'em into their doublets?" Mayo. "I think the magistrate has no right to interfere till there is some overt act?" Boswell. "So, Sir, though he sees an enemy to the state charging a blunderbuss, he is not to interfere till it is fired off!" Mayo. "He must be sure of its direction against the state." Johnson. "The magistrate is to judge of that. He has no right to restrain your thinking, because the evil centres in yourself. If a man were sitting at this table, and chopping off his fingers, the magistrate, as guardian of the community, has no authority to restrain him, however he might do it from kindness as a parent. —Though, indeed, upon more consideration, I think he may; as it is probable, that he who is chopping off his own figures, may soon proceed to chop off those of other people. If I think it right to steal Mr. Dilly's plate, I am a bad man; but he can say nothing to me. If I make an open declaration that I think so, he will keep me out of his house. If I put forth my hand, I shall be sent to Newgate. This is the gradation of thinking, preaching, and acting; if a man thinks erroneously, he may keep his thoughts to himself, and nobody will trouble him; if he preaches erroneous doctrine, society may expel him; if he acts in consequence of it, the law takes place, and he is hanged." Mayo. "But, Sir, ought not Christians to have liberty of conscience?" Johnson. "I have already told you so, Sir? You're coming back to where you were." Boswell. "Dr. Mayo is always taking a return post-chaise, and going the stage over again. He has it at half-price." Johnson. "Dr. Mayo, like other champions for unlimited toleration, has got a set of words. Sir, it is no matter, politically, whether the magistrate be right or wrong. Suppose a club were to be formed, to drink confusion to King George the Third, and a happy restoration to Charles the Third, this would be very bad with respect to the state; but every member of that club must either conform to its rules, or be turned out of it. Old Baxter, I remember, maintains, that the magistrate should 'tolerate all things that are tolerable.' This is no good definition of toleration upon any principle; but it shows that he thought some things were not tolerable." Toplady. "Sir, you have untwisted this difficult subject with great dexterity." During this argument, Goldsmith sat in restless agitation, from a wish to get in and shine. Finding himself excluded, he had taken his hat to go away, but remained for some time with it in his hand, like a gamer, who, at the close of a long night, lingers for a little while, to see if he can have a favourable opening to finish with success. Once, when he was beginning to speak, he found himself overpowered by the loud voice of Johnson, who was at the opposite end of the table, and did not perceive Goldsmith's attempt. Thus disappointed of his wish to obtain the attention of 1 This seems to be altogether contrary to the fact. The first reformers, whether of Germany or England, were certainly not burnt for insulting individuals; they were burnt for heresy; and formidable as that was, it was less insupportable than what Johnson is said to have stated, that they were burnt for insulting individuals: but, indeed, I can hardly doubt that Boswell's note of this rapid discussion at a dinner table was very imperfect.—Croker, 1831. 1846. 2 See ante, p. 234.—C. 3 The Magistrate must for better reasons: either suspecting insanity; or, because he that mutilates himself becomes a burden upon others; or, because no citizen of a state has a right to disable himself from the performance of his active duties.—Croker. 4 Dr. Mayo's calm temper and steady perseverance, rendered him an admirable subject for the exercise of Dr. Johnson's powerful abilities. He never flinched; but, after reiterated blows, remained seemingly unmoved as at the first. The scintillations of Johnson's genius flashed every time he was struck, without his receiving any injury. Hence he obtained the epithet of The Literary Anvil.—Boswell. Boswell talks as if these encounters were so frequent as to have obtained Dr. Mayo a distinctive epithet: but it is certain that a phrase had not been in use in this day, when he did not even know his name; and I cannot trace that he met him more than once again.—Croker.
the company, Goldsmith in a passion threw down his hat, looking angrily at Johnson, and exclaiming in a bitter tone, "Take it." When Toplady was going to speak, Johnson uttered some sound, which led Goldsmith to think that he was beginning again, and taking the words from Toplady. Upon which, he seized this opportunity of venting his own envy and spleen, under the pretext of supporting another person: '"Sir," said he to Johnson, "the gentleman has heard you patiently for an hour;
pray allow us now to hear him." Johnson (sternly). "Sir, I was only interrupting the gentleman. I was only giving him a signal of my attention. Sir, you are impertinent." Goldsmith made no reply, but continued in the company for some time.

A gentleman present1 ventured to ask Dr.
Johnson if there was not a material difference as to toleration of opinions which lead to action, and opinions merely speculative; for instance, would it be wrong in the magistrate to tolerate those who preach against the doctrine of the Trinity? Johnson was highly offended, and said, "I wonder, Sir, how a gentleman of your piety can introduce this subject in a mixed company." He told me afterwards, that the impropriety was, that perhaps some of the company might have talked on the subject in such terms as might have shocked him; or he might have been forced to appear in their eyes a narrow-minded man. The gentleman, with submissive deference, said, he had only hinted at the question from a desire to hear Dr. Johnson's opinion upon it. Johnson. "Why then, Sir, I think that permitting men to preach any opinion contrary to the doctrine of the established church, tends, in a certain degree, to lescen the authority of the church, and, consequently, to lessen the influence of religion.
"It may be considered," said the gentleman,
"whether it would not be politic to tolerate in such a case." Johnson. "Sir, we have been talking of right: this is another question. I think it is not politic to tolerate in such a case."

Though he did not think it fit that so awful a subject should be introduced in a mixed company, and therefore at this time waved the theological question; yet his own orthodox belief in the sacred mystery of the Trinity is evinced beyond doubt, by the following passage in his private devotions: —

"O Lord, hear my prayer, for Jesus Christ's sake; to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God, be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen." [Pr. and Med., p. 40.]

son (bursting forth with a generous indignation). "The Irish are in a most unnatural state; for we see there the minority prevailing over the majority. There is no instance, even in the ten persecutions, of such severity as that which the Protestants of Ireland have exercised against the Catholics. Did we tell them that we have conquered them, it would be above board:

to punish them by confiscation and other penalties, as rebels, was monstrous injustice. King William was not their lawful sovereign: he had not been acknowledged by the parliament of Ireland, when they appeared in arms against him."

I here suggested something favourable of the Roman Catholics. Toplady. "Does not their invocation of saints suppose omnipresence in the saints?" Johnson. "No, Sir; it supposes only pluri-presence; and when spirits are divested of matter, it seems probable that they should see with more extent than when in an embodied state. There is, therefore, no approach to an invasion of any of the divine attributes, in the invocation of saints. But I think it is will-worship, and presumption. I see no command for it, and therefore think it is safer not to practise it."

He and Mr. Langton and I went together to the Club, where we found Mr. Burke, Mr.
Garrick, and some other members, and amongst them our friend Goldsmith, who sat silently brooding over Johnson's reprimand to him after dinner. Johnson perceived this, and said aside to some of us, — "I'll make Goldsmith forgive me," and then called to him in a loud voice,
"Dr. Goldsmith, something passed to-day where you and I dined: I ask your pardon." Goldsmith answered placidly, "It must be much from you, Sir, that I take ill." And so at once the difference was over, and they were on as easy terms as ever, and Goldsmith ratted away as usual.

In our way to the Club to-night, when I regretted that Goldsmith would, upon every occasion, endeavour to shine, by which he often exposed himself, Mr. Langton observed, that he was not like Addison, who was content with the fame of his writings, and did not aim also at excellency in conversation, for which he found himself unfit: and that he said to a lady who complained of his having talked little in company, "Madam, I have but nine-pence in ready money, but I can draw for a thousand pounds." I observed that Goldsmith had a great deal of gold in his cabinet, but, not content with that, was always taking out his purse.
Johnson. "Yes, Sir, and that so often an empty purse!"

Goldsmith's incessant desire of being conspicuous in company was the occasion of his sometimes appearing to such disadvantage as one should hardly have supposed possible in a man of his genius. When his literary reputation had risen deservedly high, and his society was much courted, he became very jealous of the extraordinary attention which was everywhere paid to Johnson. One evening, in a circle of wits, he found fault with me for talking of Johnson as entitled to the honour of unquestionable superiority. "Sir," said he, "you are for making a monarchy of what should be a republic." 1

He was still more mortified, when, talking in a company with fluent vivacity, and, as he flattered himself, to the admiration of all who were present, a German who sat next him, and perceived Johnson rolling himself as if about to speak, suddenly stopped him, saying, "Stay, stay — Doctor Shonson is going to say something." This was, no doubt, very provoking, especially to one so irritable as Goldsmith, who frequently mentioned it with strong expressions of indignation.

It may also be observed, that Goldsmith was sometimes content to be treated with an easy familiarity, but upon occasions would be consequential and important. An instance of this occurred in a small particular. Johnson had a way of contracting the names of his friends: as, Beauclerk, Beau; Boswell, Boszy; Langton, Lunki; Murphy, Mur; Sheridan, Sherry. I remember one day, when Tom Davies was telling that Dr. Johnson said, "We are all in labour for a name to Goldy's play." Goldsmith seemed displeased that such a liberty should be taken with his name, and said, "I have often desired him not to call me Goldy." Tom was remarkably attentive to the most minute circumstance about Johnson. I recollect his telling me once, on my arrival in London, "Sir, our great friend has made an improvement on his appellation of old Mr. Sheridan: he calls him now Sherry derry."

JOHNSON TO THE REV. MR. BAGSHAW, 2
At Bromley.

"May 8, 1773.

SIR, — I return you my sincere thanks for your additions to my Dictionary; but the new edition has been published some time, and therefore I cannot now make use of them. Whether I shall ever revise it more, I know not. If many readers had been as judicious, as diligent, and as communicative as yourself, my work had been better. The world must at present take it as it is. I am, Sir, your most obligéd and most humble servant.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

On Sunday, May 5, 3 I dined with Johnson at Mr. Langton's with Dr. Beattie and some other company. He descanted on the subject of literary property. "There seems," said he, "to be in authors a stronger right of property than that by occupancy; a metaphysical right, a right, as it were, of creation, which should from its nature be perpetual; but the consent of nations is against it; and indeed reason and the interests of learning are against it; for were it to be perpetual, no book, however useful, could be universally diffused among mankind, should the proprietor take it into his head to restrain its circulation. No book could have the advantage of being edited with notes, however necessary to its elucidation, should the proprietor perversely oppose it. For the general good of the world, therefore, whatever valuable work has once been created by an author, and issued out by him, should be understood as no longer in his power, but as belonging to the public; at the same time the author is entitled to an adequate reward. This he should have by an exclusive right to his work for a considerable number of years."

He attacked Lord Monboddo's strange speculation on the primitive state of human nature; observing, "Sir, it is all conjecture about a thing useless, even were it known to be true. Knowledge of all kinds is good. Conjecture, as to things useful, is good; but conjecture as to what it would be useless to know, such as whether men went upon all four, is very idle."

On Monday, May 9, 4 as I was to set out or my return to Scotland next morning, I was desirous to see as much of Dr. Johnson as I could. But I first called on Goldsmith to take leave of him. The jealousy and envy, which though possessed of many most amiable qualities, he frankly avowed, broke out violently at this interview. 5 Upon another occasion when Goldsmith confessed himself to be of an envious disposition, I contended with Johnson that we ought not to be angry with him, he was so candid in owning it. "Nay, Sir," said...
Johnson, "we must be angry that a man has such a superabundance of an odious quality, that he cannot keep it within his own breast, but it boils over." In my opinion, however, Goldsmith had not more of it than other people have, but only talked of it freely.

He now seemed very angry that Johnson was going to be a traveller; said "he would be a dead weight for me to carry, and that I should never be able to lug him along through the Highlands and Hebrides." Nor would he patiently allow me to enlarge upon Johnson's wonderful abilities; but exclaimed, "Is he like Burke, who winds into a subject like a serpent?" "But," said I, "Johnson is the Hercules who strangled serpents in his cradle."

I dined with Dr. Johnson at General Paoli's. He was obliged, by indisposition, to leave the company early; he appointed me, however, to meet him in the evening at Mr. (now Sir Robert) Chamber's, in the Temple, where he accordingly came, though he continued to be very ill. Chambers, as is common on such occasions, prescribed various remedies to him. Johnson (sitting by pain). "Pr'ythee don't tease me. Stay till I am well, and then you shall tell me how to cure myself." He grew better, and talked with a noble enthusiasm of keeping up the representation of respectable families. His zeal on this subject was a circumstance in his character exceedingly remarkable, when it is considered that he himself had no pretensions to blood. I heard him once say, "I have great merit in being zealous for subordination and the honours of birth; for I can hardly tell who was my grandfather." He maintained the dignity and propriety of male succession, in opposition to the opinion of one of our friends, who had that day employed Mr. Chambers to draw his will, devising his estate to his three sisters, in preference to a remote heir male. Johnson called them "three dowelles," and said, with as high a spirit as the boldest baron in the most perfect days of the feudal system, "An ancient estate should always go to males. It is mighty foolish to let a stranger have it because he marries your daughter, and takes your name. As for an estate newly acquired by trade, you may give it, if you will, to the dog Tusher, and let him keep his own name."

I have known him at times exceedingly diverted at what seemed to others a very small sport. He now laughed immoderately, without any reason that we could perceive, at our friend's making his will; called him the testator.

and added, "I dare say he thinks he has done a mighty thing. He won't stay till he gets home to his seat in the country, to produce this wonderful deed: he'll call up the landlord of the first inn on the road; and, after a suitable preface upon mortality and the uncertainty of life, will tell him that he should not delay in making his will; and here, Sir, will he say, is my will, which I have just made, with the assistance of one of the ablest lawyers in the kingdom; and he will read it to him (laughing all the time). He believes he has made this will; but he did not make it; you, Chambers, made it for him. I trust you have had more conscience than to make him say, 'being of sound understanding!' ha, ha, ha! I hope he has left me a legacy. I'd have his will turned into verse, like a ballad."

In this playful manner did he run on, exulting in his own pleasantry, which certainly was not such as might be expected from the author of "The Rambler," but which is here preserved, that my readers may be acquainted even with the slightest occasional characteristics of so eminent a man.

Mr. Chambers did not by any means relish this jocularity upon a matter of which pars magna fuit⁴, and seemed impatient till he got rid of us. Johnson could not stop his merriment, but continued it all the way till he got without the Temple Gate. He then burst into such a fit of laughter, that he appeared to be almost in a convulsion; and, in order to support himself, laid hold of one of the posts at the side of the foot pavement, and sent forth peals so loud, that in the silence of the night his voice seemed to resound from Temple Bar to Fleet Ditch.

This most ludicrous exhibition of the awful, melancholy, and venerable Johnson, happened well to counteract the feelings of sadness which I used to experience when parting with him for a considerable time. I accompanied him to his door, where he gave me his blessing.

He records of himself this year:

"Between Easter and Whitsun tide, having always considered that time as propitious to study, I attempted to learn the Low Dutch language." [Pr. & Med. p. 191.]

It is to be observed, that he here admits an opinion of the human mind being influenced by seasons, which he ridicules in his writings. His progress, he says, was interrupted by a fever, "which, by the imprudent use of a small print, left an inflammation in his useful eye."
We cannot but admire his spirit, when we know, that amidst a complication of bodily and mental distress, he was still animated with the desire of intellectual improvement. Various notes of his studies appear on different days, in his manuscript diary of this year; such as, —

Let this serve as a specimen of what accessions of literature he was perpetually infusing into his mind, while he charged himself with idleness.

This year died Mrs. Salusbury (mother of Mrs. Thrale), a lady whom he appears to have esteemed much, and whose memory he honoured with an epitaph.¹

In a letter from Edinburgh, dated the 29th of May, I pressed him to persevere in his resolution to make this year the projected visit to the Hebrides, of which he and I had talked for many years, and which I was confident would afford us much entertainment.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Johnson's Court, July 5, 1773.

Dear Sir, — When your letter came to me, I was so darkened by an inflammation in my eye that I could not for some time read it. I can now write without trouble, and can read large prints. My eye is gradually growing stronger; and I hope will be able to take some delight in the survey of a Caledonian loch.

"Chambers is going a judge, with six thousand a year, to Bengal. He and I shall come down together as far as Newcastle, and then I shall easily get to Edinburgh. Let me know the exact time when your courts intermit. I must conform a little to Chambers's occasions, and he must conform a little to mine. The time which you shall fix must be the common point to which we will come as near as we can. Except this eye, I am very well.

"Beattie is so caressed, and invited, and treated, and liked, and flattered by the great, that I can see nothing of him. I am in great hope that he will be well provided for, and then we will live upon him at the Marischal College, without pity or modesty.

¹ Not six months before his death, he wished me to teach him the scale of music: "Dr. Burney, teach me at least the alphabet of your language." — BURNEY.
Dr. Johnson had, for many years, given me hopes that we should go together and visit the Hebrides. Martin's account of those islands had impressed us with a notion, that we might there contemplate a system of life almost totally different from what we had been accustomed to see; and to find simplicity and wildness, and all the circumstances of remote time or place, so near to our native great islands, was an object within the reach of reasonable curiosity. Dr. Johnson has said in his "Journey," that "he scarcely remembered how the wish to visit the Hebrides was excited;" but he told me, in summer, 1763, that his father put Martin's account into his hands when he was very young, and that he was much pleased with it. We reckoned there would be some inconveniences and hardships, and perhaps a little danger; but these, we were persuaded, were magnified in the imagination of every body. When I was at Ferney, in 1754, I mentioned our design to Voltaire. He looked at me, as if I had talked of going to the North Pole, and said, "You do not insist on my accompanying you?" — "No, sir." "Then I am very willing you should go." I was not afraid that our curious expedition would be prevented by such apprehensions; but I doubted that it would not be possible to prevail on Dr. Johnson to relinquish, for some time, the felicity of a London life, which, to a man who can enjoy it with full intellectual relish, is apt to make existence in any narrower sphere seem insipid or irksome. I doubted that he would not be willing to come down from his elevated state of philosophical dignity; from a superiority of wisdom among the wise, and of learning among the learned; and from flashing his wit upon minds bright enough to reflect it.

He had disappointed my expectations so long, that I began to despair; but, in spring, 1773, he talked of coming to Scotland that year with so much firmness, that I hoped he was at last in earnest. I knew that, if he were once launched from the metropolis, he would go forward very well; and I got our common friends there to assist in setting him afloat. To Mrs. Thrale, in particular, whose enchantment over him seldom failed, I was much obliged. It was, "I'll give thee a wind." — "Thou art kind." To attract him, we had invitations from the chiefs Macdonald and Macleod; and, for additional aid, I wrote to Lord Elibank, Dr. William Robertson, and Dr. Beattie.

To Dr. Robertson, so far as my letter concerned the present subject, I wrote as follows:—

"Our friend, Mr. Samuel Johnson, is in great health and spirits; and, I do think, has a serious resolution to visit Scotland this year. The more attraction, however, the better; and, therefore, though I know he will be happy to meet you there, it will forward the scheme if, in your answer to this, you express yourself concerning it with that power of which you are so happily possessed, and which may be so directed as to operate strongly upon him." His answer to that part of my letter was quite as I could have wished. It was written with the address and persuasion of the historian of America.

"When I saw you last, you gave us some hopes that you might prevail with Mr. Johnson to make out that excursion to Scotland, with the expectation of which we have long flattered ourselves. If he could order matters so as to pass some time in Edinburgh, about the close of the summer season, and then visit some of the Highland scenes, I am confident he would be pleased with the grand features of nature in many parts of this country: he will meet with many persons here who respect

1 Here begins the Journal of the Tour to the Hebrides, to which Mr. Boswell had prefixed two mottoes, the first in the title-page, from Pope:

"O while along the stream of time thy name
Expand|a|d|f|e|x|t, and gathers all its fame,

Snug, shall my little bark, attendant sail.

Pursue the triumph and partake the gale!"

The other on a fly-leaf, from Barker's Chronicle:

"He was of an admirable pregnancy of wit, and that pregnancy much improved by continual study from his childhood; a which he had gotten such a promptness in expressing his mind, that his colloquial speeches were little inferior to his premeditated writings. Many, no doubt, had read as much, and perhaps more than he; but scarce ever any connected his reading into judgment as he did."

Mr. Boswell tells us that Johnson read this journal as it proceeded, which, strange as the reader will think it, when he considers that he had read some passages of it, Johnson himself conformed for he says to Mrs. Thrale, "You never told me, and I omitted to inquire, how you were entertained by Boswell's Journal. One would think the man had been hired to be a spy upon me. He was very diligent, and caught oppor-

3 It is entitled, A Description of the Western Islands of Scotland, by M. Martin, Gent., 1738. A second edition appeared in 1761. On a copy of Martin in the Advocates' Library, I see a note (1834), the following note in the handwriting of Mr. Boswell:—

"This very book accompanied Mr. Samuel Johnson and me in our Tour to the Hebrides, in autumn 1773. Mr. Johnson told me that he had read Martin when he was very young. Martin was a native of the Isle of Skye, where a number of his relatives still remain. His book is a very imperfect performance, and he is erroneous as to many particulars, even some concerning his own island. Yet, as it is the only book upon the subject, it is very generally known. I have seen a second edition of it. I cannot but have a kindness for him, notwithstanding his defects. — James Boswell." — Upcott.

She shews her own letters to Dr. Johnson, the reasons which induced her to approve this excursion: — "Fatigue is profitable to your health, upon the whole, and keeps up the spirits of the body, and exertsion for your mind, will contribute more than all the medicine in the universe to preserve that life we all consider as invaluable." — Letters, vol. i. p. 160. — Croker.
him, and some whom I am persuaded he will think not unworthy of his esteem. I wish he would make the experiment. He sometimes cracks his jokes upon us; but he will find that we can distinguish between the stabs of malevolence and the rebukes of the righteous, which are like excellent oil, and break not the head. Offer my best compliments to him, and assure him that I shall be happy to have the satisfaction of seeing him under my roof."

To Dr. Beattie I wrote, "The chief intention of this letter is to inform you, that I now seriously believe Mr. Samuel Johnson will visit Scotland this year: but I wish that every power of attraction may be employed to secure our having so valuable an acquisition, and therefore I hope you will, without delay, write to me what I know you think, that I may read it to the mighty sage, with proper emphasis, before I leave London, which I must do soon. He talks of you with the same warmth that he did last year. We are to see as much of Scotland as we can, in the months of August and September. We shall not be long of being at Marischal College. He is particularly desirous of seeing some of the Western Islands."

Dr. Beattie did better: ipse venit. He was, however, so polite as to wave his privilege of nil mihi rescribas, and wrote from Edinburgh as follows:—

"Your very kind and agreeable favour of the 20th of April overtook me here yesterday, after having gone to Aberdeen, which place I left about a week ago. I am to set out this day for London, and hope to have the honour of paying my respects to Mr. Johnson and you, about a week or ten days hence. I shall then do what I can to enforce the topic you mention; but at present I cannot enter upon it, as I am in a very great hurry, for I intend to begin my journey within an hour or two."

He was as good as his word, and threw some pleasing motives into the northern scale. But, indeed, Mr. Johnson loved all that he heard, from one whom he tells us, in his Lives of the Poets, Gray found "a poet, a philosopher, and a good man."

My Lord Elibank did not answer my letter to his lordship for some time. The reason will appear when we come to the Isle of Sky. I shall then insert my letter, with letters from his lordship, both to myself and Mr. Johnson. I beg it may be understood, that I insert my own letters, as I relate my own sayings, rather as keys to what is valuable belonging to others, than for their own sake.

Luckyly Mr. Justice (now Sir Robert) Chambers, who was about to sail for the East Indies, was going to take leave of his relations at Newcastle, and he conducted Dr. Johnson to that town; whence he wrote me the following:—

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Newcastle, August 11. 1773.

"Dear Sir,—I came hither last night, and hope, but do not absolutely promise, to be in Edinburgh on Saturday. Beattie will not come so soon. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,"

"Sam. Johnson."

"My compliments to your lady."

Mr. Scott, of University College, Oxford, afterwards Sir William Scott and Lord Stowell, accompanied him from thence to Edinburgh. With such propitious conduits did he proceed to my native city. But, lest metaphor should make it be supposed he actually went by sea, I choose to mention that he travelled in post-chaises, of which the rapid motion was one of his most favourite amusements.

Dr. Samuel Johnson's character, religious, moral, political, and literary, nay, his figure and manner, are, I believe, more generally known than those of almost any man; yet it may not be superfluous here to attempt a sketch of him. Let my readers, then, remember that he was a sincere and zealous Christian, of high church of England and monarchical principles, which he would not tamely suffer to be questioned; steady and inflexible in maintaining the obligations of piety and virtue, both from a regard to the order of society, and from a veneration for the Great Source of all order; correct, nay, stern in his taste; hard to please, and easily offended; impetuous and irritable in his temper, but of a most humane and benevolent heart; having a mind stored with a vast and various collection of learning and knowledge, which he communicated with peculiar perspicuity and force, in rich and choice expression. He united a most logical head with a most fertile imagination, which gave him an extraordinary advantage in arguing; for he could reason close or wide, as he saw best for the moment. He could, when he chose it, be the greatest sophist that ever wielded a weapon in the schools of declamation, but he indulged this only in conversation; for he owned he sometimes talked for victory; he was too conscientious to make error permanent and pernicious, by deliberately writing it.

He was conscious of his superiority. He loved praise when it was brought to him; but was too proud to seek for it. He was somewhat susceptible of flattery. His mind was so full of imagery, that he might have been perpetually a poet. It has often been remarked, that in his poetical pieces, which it is to be regretted are so few, because so excellent, his style is easier than in his prose. There is

1. Our friend Edmund Burke, who, by this time, had received some pretty severe strokes from Dr. Johnson, on account of the unhappy difference in their politics, upon my repeating this passage to him, exclaimed, "Oil of vitriol!"—Boswell.

2. This I find, is a Scotticism. I should have said, "It will not be long before we shall be at Marischal College."—Boswell. In spite of this warning, Walter Scott fell into the same error. "The light foot of Mordaunt was not long of bearing him to Jarlok." "Pirate," c. viii. —Croker, 1846.
deception in this: it is not easier, but better suited to the dignity of verse; as one may dance with grace, whose motions, in ordinary walking, in the common step, are awkward. He had a constitutional melancholy, the clouds of which darkened the brightness of his fancy, and gave a gloomy cast to his whole course of thinking; yet, though grave and awful in his deportment, when he thought it necessary or proper, he frequently indulged himself in pleasantry and sportive sallies. He was prone to superstition, but not to credulity. Though his imagination might incline him to a belief of the marvellous and the mysterious, his vigorous reason examined the evidence with jealousy. He had a loud voice, and a slow, deliberate utterance, which no doubt gave some additional weight to the sterling metal of his conversation. Lord Pembroke said once to me at Wilton, with a happy pleasantry, and some truth, that "Dr. Johnson's sayings would not appear so extraordinary, were it not for his bow-wow way." But I admit the truth of this, only on some occasions. The Messiah played upon the Canterbury organ is more sublime than when played on an inferior instrument; but very slight music will seem grand, when conveyed to the ear through that majestic medium. While, therefore, Dr. Johnson's sayings are read, let his manner be taken along with them. Let it, however, be observed, that the sayings themselves are generally great; that, though he might be an ordinary composer at times, he was for the most part a Handel.

His person was large, robust, I may say approaching to the gigantic, and grown unwieldy from corpulency. His countenance was naturally of the cast of an ancient statue, but somewhat disfigured by the scars of that evil, which, it was formerly imagined, the royal touch could cure. He was now in his sixty-fourth year, and became a little dull of hearing. His sight had always been somewhat weak; yet, so much does mind govern, and even supply the deficiency of organs, that his perceptions were uncommonly quick and accurate. His head, and sometimes also his body, shook with a kind of motion like the effect of a palsy: he appeared to be frequently disturbed by cramps, or convulsive contractions, of the nature of that distemper called St. Vitus's dance. He wore a full suit of plain brown clothes, with twisted hair-buttons of the same colour, a large bushy greyish wig, a plain shirt, black worsted stockings, and silver buckles. Upon his tour, when journeying, he wore boots, and a very wide brown cloth great coat, with pockets which might have almost held the two volumes of his folio Dictionary; and he carried in his hand a large English oak stick. Let me not be censured for mentioning such minute particulars: every thing relative to so great a man is worth observing. I remember Dr. Adam Smith, in his rhetorical lectures at Glasgow, told us he was glad to know that Milton wore latches in his shoes instead of buckles.2 When I mention the oak stick, it is but letting Hercules have his club; and, by-and-by, my readers will find this stick will bud, and produce a good joke.

This imperfect sketch of "the combination and the form" of that wonderful man, whom I venerated and loved while in this world, and after whom I gaze with humble hope, now that it has pleased Almighty God to call him to a better world, will serve to introduce to the fancy of my readers the capital object of the following journal, in the course of which I trust they will attain to a considerable degree of acquaintance with him.

His prejudice against Scotland was announced almost as soon as he began to appear in the world of letters. In his "LONDON," a poem, are the following nervous lines:

"For who could leave, unbiurd, Hibernia's land? Or change the rocks of Scotland for the Strand? There none are swept by sudden fate away; But all, whom hunger spares, with age decay."

The truth is, like the ancient Greeks and Romans, he allowed himself to look upon all nations but his own as barbarians: not only Hibernia and Scotland, but Spain, Italy, and France, are attacked in the same poem. If he was particularly prejudiced against the Scots, it was because they were more in his way: because he thought their success in England rather exceeded the due proportion of their real merit; and because he could not but see in them that nationality which I believe no liberal-minded Scotsman will deny. He was, indeed, if I may be allowed the phrase, at bottom much of a John Bull: much of a blunt true-born Englishman. There was a stratum of common clay under the rock of marble. He was voraciously fond of good eating; and he had a great deal of that quality called humour, which gives an oiliness and a gloss to every other quality.

I am, I flatter myself, completely a citizen of the world. In my travels through Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, Corsica, France, I never felt myself from home; and I sincerely would have restrained them in the public streets. — BOSWELL.

1 Such they appeared to me; but, since the first edition, Sir Joshua Reynolds has observed to me, that "Dr. Johnson's extraordinary gestures were only habits, in which he indulged himself at certain times. When in company, where he was not free, or when engaged earnestly in conversation, he never gave way to such habits, which proves that they were not involuntary." I still, however, think that these gestures were involuntary; for surely, had not that been the case, he love "every kindred and tongue and people and nation." I subscribe to what my late truly learned and philosophical friend Mr. Crobie¹ said, that the English are better animals than the Scots; they are nearer the sun; their blood is richer, and more mellow: but when I humour any of them in an outrageous contempt of Scotland, I fairly own I treat them as children. And thus I have, at some moments, found myself obliged to treat even Dr. Johnson.

To Scotland, however, he ventured; and he returned from it in great good humour, with his prejudices much lessened, and with very grateful feelings of the hospitality with which he was treated; as is evident from that admirable work, his "Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland," which, to my utter astonishment, has been misapprehended, even to rancour, by many of my countrymen.

To have the company of Chambers and Scott, he delayed his journey so long, that the court of session, which rises on the 11th of August, was broke up before he got to Edinburgh.

On Saturday, the 14th of August, 1773, late in the evening, I received a note from him, that he was arrived at Boyd's inn, at the head of the Canongate.

"Saturday night.

"Mr. Johnson sends his compliments to Mr. Boswell, being just arrived at Boyd's."

I went to him directly. He embraced me cordially; and I exulted in the thought that I now had him actually in Caledonia. Mr. Scott's amiable manners, and attachment to our Socrates, at once united me to him. He told me that, before I came in, the Doctor had unluckily had a bad specimen of Scottish cleanliness. He then drank no fermented liquor. He asked to have his lemonade made sweeter; upon which the waiter, with his greasy fingers, lifted a lump of sugar, and put it into it. The Doctor, in indignation, threw it out of the window. Scott said he was afraid he would have knocked the waiter down.² Mr. Johnson [has since] told me that such another trick was played him at the house of a lady in Paris.³ He was to do me the honour to lodge under my roof. I regretted sincerely that I had not also a room for Mr. Scott. Mr. Johnson and I walked arm-in-arm, up the High Street, to my house in James's Court;⁴ it was a dusky night: I could not prevent his being assailed by the evening effluvia of Edinburgh. I heard a late report, of some distinction in the political world in the beginning of the present reign, observe, that "walking the streets of Edinburgh at night was pretty perilous, and a good deal odoriferous." The peril is much abated, by the care which the magistrates have taken to enforce the city laws against throwing foul water from the windows; but, from the structure of the houses in the old town, which consist of many stories, in each of which a different family lives, and there being no covered sewers, the odour still continues. A zealous Scotsman would have wished Mr. Johnson to be without one of his five senses upon this occasion. As we marched slowly along, he grumbled in my ear, "I smell you in the dark!" But he acknowledged that the breadth of the street, and the loftiness of the buildings on each side, made a noble appearance.

My wife had tea ready for him, which it is well known he delighted to drink at all hours, particularly when sitting up late, and of which his able defence against Mr. Jonas Hanway should have obtained him a magnificent reward from the East India Company. He showed much complacency upon finding that the mistress of the house was so attentive to his singular habit; and as no man could be more polite when he chose to be so, his address to her was most courteous and engaging; and his conversation soon charmed her into a forgetfulness of his external appearance.

I did not begin to keep a regular full journal till some days after we had set out from Edinburgh; but I have luckily preserved a good many fragments of his Memorabilia from his very first evening in Scotland.

We had a little before this had a trial for murder, in which the judges had allowed the lapse of twenty years since its commission as a plea in bar, in conformity with the doctrine of prescription in the civil law, which Scotland and several other countries in Europe have adopted.⁵ He at first disapproved of this; but then he thought there was something in it if there had been for twenty years a

¹ Mr. Crobie, one of the most eminent advocates then at the Scotch bar. Lord Stowell recollects that Johnson was treated by the Scottish literati with a degree of deference bordering on pusillanimity; but he excepts from that observation Mr. Crobie, whom he characterises as an intrepid walker, and the only man who was disposed to stand up (as the phrase is) to Johnson. — Croker.

² The sign of the White Horse. It continued a place from which coaches used to start till the end of the eighteenth century; some twelve or fifteen years ago it was a carrier's inn, and has since been held unworthy of that occupation, and the sign is taken down. It was a base hotel. — Walter Scott.

³ "The house," said Lord Stowell to me, "was kept by a woman, and she was called Luckie, which it seems is synonymous to Grooby in England. I, at first, thought the appellation very inappropriate, and that Unworthy would have been better. For, if Johnson has a mind to throw the waiter, as well as the lemonade, out of the window." — Croker.

neglect to prosecute a crime which was known. He would not allow that a murder, by not being discovered for twenty years, should escape punishment. We talked of the ancient trial by duel. He did not think it so absurd as is generally supposed; “for,” said he, “it was only allowed when the question was in equilibrio, as when one affirmed and another denied; and they had a notion that Providence would interfere in favour of him who was in the right. But as it was found that, in a duel, he who was in the right had not a better chance than he who was in the wrong, therefore society instituted the present mode of trial, and gave the advantage to him who is in the right.”

We sat till near two in the morning, having chatted a good while after my wife left us. She had insisted, that, to show all respect to the sage, she would give up her own bed-chamber to him, and take a worse. This I cannot but gratefully mention as one of a thousand obligations which I owe her, since the great obligation of her being pleased to accept of me as her husband.

Sunday, Aug. 15. — Mr. Scott came to breakfast, at which I introduced to Dr. Johnson, and him, my friend Sir William Forbes, now of Pittligie1, a man of whom too much good cannot be said; who, with distinguished abilities and application in his profession of a banker, is at once a good companion and a good Christian, which, I think, is saying enough. Yet it is but justice to record, that once, when he was in a dangerous illness, he was watched with the anxious apprehension of a general calamity; day and night his house was beset with affectionate inquiries, and, upon his recovery, Te Deum was the universal chorus from the hearts of his countrymen.

Mr. Johnson was pleased with my daughter Veronica2, then a child about four months old. She had the appearance of listening to him. His motions seemed to her to be intended for her amusement; and when he stopped she fluttered, and made a little infantine noise, and a kind of signal for him to begin again. She would be held close to him, which was a proof, from simple nature, that his figure was not horrid. Her fondness for him endeared her still more to me, and I declared she should have five hundred pounds of additional fortune.

We talked of the practice of the law. Sir William Forbes said, he thought an honest lawyer should never undertake a cause which he was satisfied was not a just one. “Sir,” said Mr. Johnson, “a lawyer has no business with the justice or injustice of the cause which he undertakes, unless his client asks his opinion, and then he is bound to give it honestly. The justice or injustice of the cause is to be decided by the judge. Consider, Sir, what is the purpose of courts of justice? It is, that every man may have his cause fairly tried, by men appointed to try causes. A lawyer is not to tell what he knows to be a lie: he is not to produce what he knows to be a false deed; but he is not to usurp the province of the jury and of the judge, and determine what shall be the effect of evidence,—what shall be the result of legal argument. As it rarely happens that a man is fit to plead his own cause, lawyers are a class of the community who, by study and experience, have acquired the art and power of arranging evidence, and of applying to the points at issue what the law has settled. A lawyer is to do for his client all that his client might fairly do for himself, if he could. If, by a skilful direction of attention, of knowledge, of skill, and a better method of communication, he has the advantage of his adversary, it is an advantage to which he is entitled. There must always be some advantage, on one side or other; and it is better that advantage should be had by talents than by chance. If lawyers were to undertake no causes till they were sure they were just, a man might be precluded altogether from a trial of his claim, though, were it judicially examined, it might be found a very just claim.” This was sound practical doctrine, and rationally repressed a too refined scrupulosity of conscience.3

Emigration was at this time a common topic of discourse. Dr. Johnson regretted it as hurtful to human happiness: “For,” said he, “it spreads mankind, which weakens the defence of a nation, and lessens the comfort of living. Men, thinly scattered, make a shift, but a bad shift, without many things. A smith is ten miles off; they’ll do without a nail or a staple. A tailor is far from them; they’ll botch their own clothes. It is being concentrated which produces high convenience.”

Sir William Forbes, Mr. Scott, and I, accompanied Mr. Johnson to the chapel, founded by Lord Chief Baron Smith, for the service of the Church of England. The Rev. Mr. Carr, the senior clergyman, preached from these words, — “Because the Lord reigneth, let the present Sommelsdyeck has an important charge in the republic, and is as worthy a man as lives. He has honoured me with his correspondence for these twenty years. My grandfather, the husband of Countess Veronica, was Alexander, Earl of Kincardine, that eminent royalist whose character is given by Burnet in his “History of his own Times.” From him the blood of Bruce flows in my veins. Of such ancestry who would not be proud? And as “Nihil est, nisi hoc sciat alter” is peculiarly true of genealogy, who would not be glad to seize a fair opportunity to let it be known? — Boswell.

3 The saint’s name of Veronica was introduced into our family through my great grandmother Veroncia, Countess of Kincardine, a Dutch lady of the noble house of Sommelsdyeck, of which there is a full account in Bayle’s Dictionary. The family had once a princely right in Surinam. The governor of that settlement was appointed by the states-general, the town of Amsterdam, and Sommelsdyeck. The states-general have acquired Sommelsdyeck’s right; but the family has still great dignity and opulence, and by intermarriages is connected with many other noble families. When I was at the Hague, I was received with all the affection of kindred. The earth be glad." I was sorry to think Mr. Johnson did not attend to the sermon, Mr. Carr's low voice not being strong enough to reach his hearing.

A selection of Mr. Carr's sermons has since his death been published by Sir Walter Scott, and the world has acknowledged their uncommon merit. I am well assured Lord Mansfield has pronounced them to be excellent. 1

Here I obtained a promise from Lord Chief Baron Orde, that he would dine at my house next day. I presented Mr. Johnson to his lordship, who politely said to him, "I have not the honour of knowing you; but I hope for it, and to see you at my house. I am to wait on you to-morrow." This respectable English judge will be long remembered in Scotland, where he built an elegant house, and lived in it magnificently. His own ample fortune, with the addition of his salary, enabled him to be splendidly hospitable. It may be fortunate for an individual amongst ourselves to be Lord Chief Baron, and a most worthy man 2 now has the office; but, in my opinion, it is better for Scotland in general, that some of our public employments should be filled by gentlemen of distinction from the south side of the Tweed, as we have the benefit of promotion in England. Such an interchange would make a beneficial mixture of manners, and render our union more complete. Lord Chief Baron Orde was on good terms with us all, in a narrow country, filled with jarring interests, and keen parties; and, though I well knew his opinion to be the same with my own, he kept himself aloof at a very critical period. Indeed, when the Douglas cause shook the sacred security of birthright in Scotland to its foundation; a cause which, had it happened before the Union, when there was no appeal to a British House of Lords, would have left the great fortress of honours and of property in ruins. 3

When we got home, Mr. Johnson desired to see my books. He took down Ogden's Sermons on Prayer, on which I set a very high value, having been much edified by them, and he retired with them to his room. He did not stay long, but soon joined us in the drawing-room. I presented to him Mr. Robert Arbutnot 4, a relation of the celebrated Dr. Arbutnot, and a man of literature and taste. To him we were obliged for a previous recommendation, which secured us a very agreeable reception at St. Andrew's, and which Dr. Johnson, in his "Journey," ascribes to "some invisible friend."

Of Dr. Beattie, Mr. Johnson said, "Sir, he has written like a man conscious of the truth, and feeling his own strength. Treating your adversary with respect, is giving him an advantage to which he is not entitled. The greatest part of men cannot judge of reasoning, and are impressed by character; so that, if you allow your adversary a respectable character, they will think, that though you differ from him, you may be in the wrong. Sir, treating your adversary with respect, is striking soft in a battle. And as to Hume, a man who has so much conceit as to tell all mankind that they have been babbled for ages, and he is the wise man who sees better than they—a man who has so little scrupulosity as to venture to oppose those principles which have been thought necessary to human happiness—is he to be surprised if another man comes and laughs at him? If he is the great man he thinks himself, all this cannot hurt him; it is like throwing peas against a rock." He added "something much too rough," both as to Mr. Hume's head and heart, which I suppress. 5 Violence is, in my opinion, not suitable to the Christian cause. Besides, I always lived on good terms with Mr. Hume, though I have frankly told him, I was not clear that it was right in me to keep company with him. "But," said I, "how much better are you than your books!" He was cheerful, obliging, and instructive; he was charitable to the poor; and many an agreeable hour have I passed with him. I have preserved some entertaining and interesting memoirs of him, particularly when he knew himself to be dying, which I may some time or other communicate to the world. I shall not, however, extol so very highly as Mr. Adam Smith does, who says, in a letter to Mr. Strahan the printer (not a confidential letter to his friend, but a letter which is published 6 with all formality):

3 It must be recollected that Mr. Boswell was not only counsel, but a violent partisan in this cause. There was, in fact, no attempt at "shaking the sacred security of birthright." The question was, "to whom the birthright belonged?" that is, whether Mr. Douglas was or was not the son of the person he called his father and mother. — CROSSER.

He called his father and mother. — CROSSER.

Piozzi relates that he said of an eminent infidel, whose name she does not give, but who was probably either Hume or Gibbon (Malone thought Gibbon), "You will at least have said one "One of the People called Christians." — Just enough," replied the Doctor, "to light him to hell." — CROSSER.

"Upon the whole, I have always considered him, both in his lifetime and since his death, as teaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit." Let Dr. Smith consider, Was not Mr. Hume blest with good health, good spirits, good friends, a competent and increasing fortune? And had he not also a perpetual feast of fame? But, as a learned friend has observed to me, "What trials did he undergo, to prove the perfection of his virtue? Did he ever experience any great instance of adversity?" When I read this sentence, delivered by my old professor of moral philosophy, I could not help exclaiming with the Psalmist, "Surely I have now more understanding than my teachers!"

While we were talking, there came a note to me from Dr. William Robertson.

"Dear Sir,—I have been expecting every day to hear from you of Dr. Johnson's arrival. Pray, what do you know about his motions? I long to take him by the hand. I write this in a college, where I have only this scrap of paper.

Your's.

W. R.

"Sunday."

It pleased me to find Dr. Robertson thus eager to meet Dr. Johnson. I was glad I could answer that he was come; and I begged Dr. Robertson might be with us as soon as he could.

Sir William Forbes, Mr. Scott, Mr. Arbuthnot, and another gentleman, dined with us. "Could Dr. Johnson," said I, "it is commonly thought that our company is not good. But here is some which I believe I will like." There was no catching him. Johnson. "Why, Sir, what is commonly thought, I should take to be true. Your real may be good; but that will only be an exception to the general opinion, not a proof against it."

Dr. Robertson, according to the custom of Edinburgh at that time, dined in the interval between the forenoon and afternoon service, which was then later than now; so we had not the pleasure of his company till dinner was over, when he came and drank wine with us; and then began some animated dialogue, of which here follows a pretty full note.

We talked of Mr. Burke. Dr. Johnson said, he had great variety of knowledge, store of imagery, copiousness of language. Robertson. "He has wit too." Johnson. "No, Sir; he never succeeds there. 'Tis low; 'tis conceit. I used to say, Burke never once made a good joke. What I most envy Burke for is, his being constantly the same. He is never what we call Humdrum; never unwilling to begin to talk, nor in haste to leave off." Boswell. "Yet he can listen." Johnson. "No; I cannot say he is good at that. So desirous is he to talk, that if one is speaking at this end of the table, he'll speak to somebody at the table, and give us his comments on what we say when we are speaking to the person he is addressing."

value the greatest part of "An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations." Why should such a writer be so forgetful of human comfort, as to give any countenance to that dreary indulgence which would make us poor indeed?" — Boswell.

1 This was one of the points upon which Dr. Johnson was strongly heterodox. For surely Mr. Burke, with his other remarkable qualities, is also distinguished for his wit, and for wit of all kinds too; not merely that power of language which Pope chooses to denominate wit.—Mr. Burke.

"True wit is Nature to advantage dress'd; What oft was thought, but never so well express'd," but surprising allusions, brilliant sallies of vivacity, and pleasant conceits. His speeches in parliament are strewed with them. Take, for instance, the variety which he has given in his wide range, yet exact detail, when exhibiting his Reform Bill. And his conversation abounds in wit. Let me put down a specimen. I told him I had seen, at a blackstocking assembly, a number of ladies sitting round a worthy and tall friend of ours [Mr. Langton], listening to his literature. "Ay," said he, "like maidens round a May-pole." I told him, I had found out a perfect definition of human nature, as distinguished from the animal. An ancient philosopher said, man was "a two-legged animal without feathers;" upon which his rival sage had a cock plucked bare, and set him down in the school before all the disciples, as a "philosophic man." Dr. Franklin said, man was "a tool-making animal," which is very well; for no animal but man makes a thing by means of which he can make another thing. But this applies to very few of the species. My definition of man is, "a cooking animal." The beasts have memory of their feed, and all the faculties and passions of our mind, in a certain degree; but no beast is a cook. The trick of the monkey using the cat's paw to roast a chestnut is only a display of a cleverness that an insipid spirit, or a dull head, is good," said Mr. Burke, "and I now see the full force of the common proverb, 'There is yeoman in roasting of eggs.'"

When Mr. Wilkes, in his days of tumultuous opposition, was borne upon the shoulders of the mob, Mr. Burke (as Mr. Wilkes told me himself, with classical admiration) applied to him what Heracite says of Pindar, —

Sir Joshua Reynolds, who agrees with me entirely as to Mr. Burke's fertility of wit, said, that this was "dignifying a pan." He also observed, that he has often heard Burke say, in the course of an evening, ten good things, each of which he would have served a noted wit (whom he named) to live upon for a twelventh. — Boswell.

I find, since the publication of the former edition, that some persons have objected to the instances which I have given of Mr. Burke's wit, as not doing justice to my very ingenious friend; the specimen of museum, it is alleged, is commoner than real wit, and being merely sportive sallies of the moment, not justifying the encomium which they think, with me, he deserves. Corruptions and such accidents are to be expected in an essay like this, where it is my business to exhibit particular instances of wit, which is of so airy and spiritual a nature as often to elude the hand that attempts to grasp it. The excellence and efficacy of a hom mot depend frequently so much on the occasion on which it is spoken, on the particular manner of the speaker, on the person to whom it is applied, the previous introductions, the thousand minute particulars which cannot be easily enumerated, that it is always dangerous to detach a witty saying from the group to which it belongs, and to set it before the eye of the spectator, divested of those concomitant circumstances, which gave it animation, mellowness, and relief. I ventured, however, at all hazards, to put down the first instances that occurred to me, as proofs of Mr. Burke's lively and brilliant fancy; but am very sensible that his numerous friends could have suggested many of a superior quality. Indeed, the being in company with him, for a single day, is sufficient to show what I have asserted is well founded and it was only necessary to have appealed to all who know him intimately, for a complete refutation of the heterodox opinion expressed in a former edition, by Dr. Johnson. Who would have allowed Mr. Burke, as the reader will find hereafter, to be a man of consummate and unrivaled abilities in every light except that of the museum? It is not credible that his magnificence of allusions, and splendor of his imagery, have made such an impression on all the rest of the world, that superficial observers can but judge of him by a few sentences in his writings, or a few pages of his collections. It is not probable that his wit itself is his chief and most prominent excellence; when in company, it is only one of the many talents that he possesses, which are various and extraordinary, that it is very difficult to ascertain precisely the range and value of each. — Malone. See post, 26th April, 1775. — C.

other end. Burke, Sir, is such a man, that if you met him for the first time in the street, where you were stopped by a drove of oxen, and you and he stepped aside to take shelter but for five minutes, he'd talk to you in such a manner, that, when you parted, you would say, This is an extraordinary man. Now, you may be long enough with me, without finding any thing extraordinary.” He said, he believed Burke was intended for the law; but either had not money enough to follow it, or had not diligence enough. He said, he could not understand how a man could apply to one thing, and not to another. Robertson said, one man had more judgment, another more imagination. Johnson. “No, Sir; it is only, one man has more mind than another. He may direct it differently; he may, by accident, see the success of one kind of study, and take a desire to excel in it. I am persuaded that had Sir Isaac Newton applied to poetry, he would have made a very fine epic poem. I could as easily apply to law as to tragic poetry.” 1 Boswell. “Yet, Sir, you did apply to tragic poetry, not to law.” Johnson. “Because, Sir, I had not money to study law. Sir, the man who has vigour may walk to the east, just as well as to the west, if he happens to turn his head that way.” Boswell. “But, Sir, 'tis like walking up and down a hill; one man may naturally do the one better than the other. A hare will run up a hill best, from her fore-legs being short; a dog down.” Johnson. “Nay, Sir; that is from mechanical powers. If you make mind mechanical, you may argue in that manner. One mind is a vice, and holds fast; there's a good memory. Another is a file; and he is a disputant, a controversialist. Another is a razor; and he is sarcastical.” We talked of Whitfield. He said he was at the same college with him, and knew him before he began to be better than other people (smiling); that he believed he sincerely meant well, but had a mixture of politics and ostentation; whereas Wesley thought of religion only. 2 Robertson said, Whitfield had strong natural eloquence, which, if cultivated, would have done great things. Johnson. “Why, Sir, I take it, he was at the height of what his abilities could do, and was sensible of it. He had the ordinary advantages of education; but he chose to pursue that oratory which is for the mob.” Boswell. “He had great effect on the passions.” Johnson. “Why, Sir, I don't think so. He could not represent a succession of pathetic images. He vociferated, and made an impression. There, again, was a mind like a hammer.” Dr. Johnson now said, a certain eminent political friend 3 of ours was wrong in his maxim of sticking to a certain set of men on all occasions. “I can see that a man may do right to stick to a party,” said he, “that is to say, he is a Whig, or he is a Tory, and he thinks one of those parties upon the whole the best, and that to make it prevail, it must be generally supported, though, in particulars, it may be wrong. He takes his aggregate of principles, in which there are fewer rotten sticks than in the other, though some rotten sticks, to be sure; and they cannot well be separated. But, to bind one's self to one man, or one set of men (who may be right to-day, and wrong to-morrow), without any general preference of system, I must disapprove.” 4

1 How much a man deceives himself! Of all Johnson's literary efforts, his tragic poetry was the least successful. — Croker.

2 That cannot be said now, after the flagrant part which Mr. John Wesley took against our American brethren, when, in his own name, he threw amongst his enthusiastic flock the very individual combubustibles of Dr. Johnson's "Tatulion no Tyranny," and after the intolerant spirit which he manifested against our fellow Christians of the Roman Catholic communion, for which that able champion, Father O'Leary, has given him so hearty a drubbing. But I should think myself very unworthy, if I did not at the same time acknowledge Mr. John Wesley's merit, as a veteran "soldier of Jesus Christ," who has, I do believe, turned many from darkness into light, and from the power of Satan to the living God. — Boswell.

3 A word and a phrase. See ante, p. 249. — Croker.

4 He told us of Cooke, who translated Hesiod, and lived twenty years on a translation of Plautus, for which he was always taking subscriptions; and that he presented Foote to a club in the following singular manner: "This is the nephew of the gentleman who was lately hung in chains for murdering his brother."
In the evening I introduced to Mr. Johnson two good friends of mine, Mr. William Nairne, advocate, and Mr. Hamilton of Sundrum, my neighbour in the country, both of whom supped with us. I have preserved nothing of what passed, except that Dr. Johnson displayed another of his heterodox opinions—a contempt of tragic acting. He said, the action of all players in tragedy is bad. It should be a man's study to repress those signs of emotion and passion, as they are called. He was of a directly contrary opinion to that of Fielding, in his “Tom Jones,” who makes Partridge say of Garrick, “Why, I could act as well as he myself. I am sure, if I had seen a ghost, I should have looked in the very same manner, and done just as he did.” For, when I asked him, “Would not you, Sir, start as Mr. Garrick does, if you saw a ghost?” he answered, “I hope not. If I did, I should frighten the ghost.”

CHAPTER XXXI.

Monday, August 16th. — Dr. William Robertson came to breakfast. We talked of Ogden on Prayer. Dr. Johnson said, “The same arguments which are used against God's hearing prayer, will serve against his rewarding good, and punishing evil. He has resolved, he has declared, in the former case as in the latter.” He had last night looked into Lord Hailes's “Remarks on the History of Scotland.” Dr. Robertson and I said, it was a pity Lord Hailes did not write greater things. His lordship had not then published his “Annals of Scotland.” Johnson. “I remember I was once on a visit at the house of a lady for whom I had a high respect. There was a good deal of company in the room. When they were gone, I said to this lady, 'What foolish talking have we had?'—'Yes,' said she, 'but while they talked, you said nothing.' I was struck with the reproof. How much better is the man who does any thing that is innocent, than he who does nothing? Besides, I love anecdotes. I fancy mankind may come, in time, to write all aphoristically, except in narrative; grow weary of preparation, and connection, and illustration, and all those arts by which a big book is made. If a man is to wait till he weaves anecdotes into a system, we may be long in getting them, and get but few, in comparison of what we might get.”

Dr. Robertson said, the notions of Eupham Macallan, a fanatic woman, of whom Lord Hailes gives a sketch, were still prevalent among some of the presbyterians; and therefore, it was right in Lord Hailes, a man of known piety, to undeceive them.

We walked out, that Dr. Johnson might see some of the things which we have to show at Edinburgh. We went to the Parliament-house, where the parliament of Scotland sat, and where the ordinary lords of session hold their courts, and to the new session-house adjoining to it, where our court of fifteen (the fourteen ordinaries, with the lord president at their head) sit as a court of review. We went to the advocate's library, of which Dr. Johnson took a cursory view; and then to what is called the Laigh (or under) Parliament-house, where the records of Scotland, which has an universal security by register, are deposited, till the great register office be finished. I was pleased to behold Dr. Samuel Johnson rolling about in this old magazine of antiquities. There was, by this time, a pretty numerous circle of us attending upon him. Somebody talked of happy moments for composition, and how a man can write at one time, and not at another. “Nay,” said Dr. Johnson, “a man may write at any time, if he will set himself doggedly to it.”

I here began to indulge old Scottish sentiments, and to express a warm regret, that, by time before I could bring myself to call him Doctor; but, as he has been long known by that title, I shall give it to him in the rest of this Journal. — Boswell. Johnson never, it seems, called himself Doctor. See ante, p. 168. — Croker.

2 It was on this visit to the parliament-house, that Mr. Henry Erskine (brother of Lord Buchan and Lord Erskine), after being presented to Dr. Johnson by Mr. Boswell, and having made his bow, slipped a shilling into Boswell's hand, whispering that it was for the sight of his heart. — Walter Scott. This was the subject of a contemporaneous caricature. — Wright.

3 This great Register Office is now one of the architectural beauties of Edinburgh.— Croker.

4 This word is commonly used to signify suddenly, gleecomly; and in that sense alone it appears in Dr. Johnson’s Dictionary. I suppose he meant by it, "with an obstinate resolution, similar to that of a bull en man." — Boswell.
our union with England, we were no more; our independent kingdom was lost. Johnson.

"Sir, never talk of your independency, who could let your queen remain twenty years in captivity, and then be put to death, without even a pretence of justice, without your ever attempting to rescue her; and such a queen too! as every man of any gallantry of spirit would have sacrificed his life for." Worthy Mr. James Kerr, keeper of the records.

"Half our nation was bribed by English money." Johnson. "Sir, that is no defence; that makes you worse." Good Mr. Brown, keeper of the advocates' library. "We had better say nothing about it." Boswell. "You would have been glad, however, to have had us last war, Sir, to fight your battles!" Johnson. "We should have had you for the same price, though there had been no union, as we might have had Swiss, or other troops. No, no, I shall agree to a separation. You have only to go home." Just as he had said this, I, to divert the subject, showed him the signed assurances of the three successive kings of the Hanover family, to maintain the presbyterian establishment in Scotland. "We'll give you that," said he, "into the bargain."

We next went to the great church of St. Giles, which has lost its original magnificence in the inside, by being divided into four places of presbyterian worship. "Come," said Dr. Johnson jocularly to Principal Robertson, "let me see what was once a church!" We entered that division which was formerly called the New Church, and of late the High Church, so well known by the eloquence of Dr. Hugh Blair. It is now very elegantly fitted up; but it was then shamefully dirty. Dr. Johnson said nothing at the time; but when we came to the great door of the royal infirmary, where, upon a board, was this inscription, "Clean your feet!" he turned about slyly, and said, "There is no occasion for putting this at the doors of your churches!"

We then conducted him down the Posthouse-stairs, Parliament-close, and made him look up from the Cowgate to the highest building in Edinburgh (from which he had just descended), being thirteen floors or stories from the ground upon the back elevation; the front wall being built upon the edge of the hill, and the back wall rising from the bottom of the hill several stories before it comes to a level with the front wall. We proceeded to the college, with the Principal at our head.

1 This seems to have been a touch of Jacobite jocularity, meaning that Johnson would be willing, in consideration of the dissolution of the Union, to allow the Hanover family to reign in Scotland, inferring, of course, that the Stuarts were to reign in England. — Cocker. Perhaps, Johnson meant that they, the Scotch, were welcome not only to stay at home, but to keep their Kirk too—as inferior to the church as Scotland to England. — Lockhart.

2 I have hitherto called him Dr. William Robertson, to distinguish him from Dr. James Robertson, who is soon to make his appearance; but Principal, from his being the head of our college, is his usual designation, and is shorter; so I shall use it hereafter. — Boswell.

Dr. Adam Ferguson, whose "Essay on the History of Civil Society" gives him a respectable place in the ranks of literature, was with us. As the college buildings are indeed very mean, the Principal said to Dr. Johnson, that he must give them the same epitaph that a Jesuit did when showing a poor college abroad ever his death, a bust of him, by Nollekens, was placed in the public hall of the hospital, with this inscription from a pen of Robertson's:—"George Drummond, to whom a country is indebted for all the benefit which it derives from the royal infirmary." — Boswell.

3 This lofty house was burnt down in 1834. The site now occupied by Sir William Forbes's bank. — Chambers.

4 This excellent magistrate died in 1766. Some years after his death, a bust of him, by Nollekens, was placed in the public hall of the hospital, with this inscription from a pen of Robertson's:—"George Drummond, to whom a country is indebted for all the benefit which it derives from the royal infirmary." — Boswell.

5 The stanza from which he took this line is—

They rose up by thousands three;
A cowardly Scot came John behind,
And ran him through the fair body!" — Boswell.
him, at dinner, the Duchess of Douglas, Sir Adolphus Oughton, Lord Chief Baron [Orde], Sir William Forbes, Principal Robertson, Mr. Cullen, advocate. Before dinner, he told us of a curious conversation between the famous George Paulkner and him. George said, that England had drained Ireland of fifty thousand pounds in specie, annually, for fifty years. "How so, Sir?" said Dr. Johnson; "you must have very great trade?" — "No trade." — "Very rich mines?" — "No mines." — "From whence, then, does all this money come?" — "Come! why out of the blood and bowels of the poor people of Ireland!"

He seemed to me to have an unaccountable prejudice against Swift; for once took the liberty to ask him, if Swift had personally offended him, and he told me, he had not. He said to-day, "Swift is clear, but he is shallow. In coarse humour he is inferior to Arbuthnot; in delicate humour he is inferior to Addison. So he is inferior to his contemporaries, without putting him against the whole world. I doubt if the 'Tale of a Tub' was his; it has so much more thinking, more knowledge, more power, more colour, than any of the works which are indisputably his. If it was his, I shall only say, he was impar sibi."

We gave him as good a dinner as we could. Our Scotch mui-fowl, or grouse, were then abundant, and quite in season; and, so far as wisdom and wit can be aided by administering agreeable sensations to the palate, my wife took care that our great guest should not be deficient.

Sir Adolphus Oughton, then our deputy commander in chief, who was not only an excellent officer, but one of the most universal scholars I ever knew, had learned the Erse language, and expressed his belief in the authenticity of Ossian's Poetry. Dr. Johnson took the opposite side of that perplexed question, and I was afraid the dispute would have run high between them. But Sir Adolphus, who had a very sweet tenor, changed the discourse, grew playful, laughed at Lord Monboddo's notion of men having tails, and called him a judge a posteriori, which amused Dr. Johnson, and thus hostilities were prevented.

At supper we had Dr. Cullen, his son the advocate, Dr. Adam Ferguson, and Mr. Crosbie, advocate. Witchcraft was introduced. Mr. Crosbie said he thought it the greatest blasphemy to suppose evil spirits counteracting the Deity, and raising storms, for instance, to destroy his creatures. Johnson. "Why, Sir, if moral evil be consistent with the government of the Deity, why may not physical evil be also consistent with it? It is not more strange that there should be evil spirits than evil men: evil unembodied spirits, than evil embodied spirits. And as to storms, we know there are such things; and it is no worse that evil spirits raise them than that they rise." Crosbie. "But it is not credible that witches should have effected what they are said in stories to have done." Johnson. "Sir, I am not defending their credibility. I am only saying that your arguments are not good, and will not overturn the belief of witchcraft." — (Dr. Ferguson said to me aside, 'He is right.') — And then, Sir, you have all mankind, rude and civilised, agreeing in the belief of the agency of preternatural powers. You must take evidence; you must consider that wise and great men have condemned witches to die." Crosbie. "But an act of parliament put an end to witchcraft." Johnson. "No, Sir, witchcraft had ceased; and, therefore, an act of parliament was passed to prevent persecution for what was not witchcraft. Why it ceased we cannot tell, as we cannot tell the reason of many other things." Dr. Cullen, to keep up the gratification of mysterious disquisition, with the grave address for which he is remarkable in his companionable as in his professional hours, talked in a very entertaining manner, of people walking and conversing in their sleep. I am very sorry I have no note of this. We talked of the ouar-outang, and of Lord Monboddo's thinking that he might be taught to speak. Dr. Johnson treated this with ridicule. Mr. Crosbie said that Lord Monboddo believed the existence of every thing possible; in short, that all which is in posse might be found in esse. Johnson. "But, Sir, it is as possible that the ouar-outang does not speak, as that he speaks. However, I shall not contest the point. I should have thought it not possible to find a Monboddo; yet he exists." I again mentioned the stage. Johnson. "The appearance of a player, with whom I have drunk tea, counteracts the imagination that he is the character he represents. Nay, you know, nobody imagines that he is the character he represents. They say, See

2 There probably was no opportunity for what could be in strictness called personal offence, as they had never met; but I suspect that the affair of the Dublin degree (ante, p. 37) may have created this prejudice. But what could Johnson mean by calling Swift "shallow"? If he be shallow, who, in his department of literature, is profound? Without admitting that Swift was "inferior in coarse humour to Arbuthnot" (of whose precise share in the works to which he is supposed to have contributed, we know little or nothing), it may be observed, that he who is second to the greatest masters of different styles may be said to be the first on the whole. It is as certain that the Tale of a Tub was Swift's as that the Rambler was Johnson's. — Croker.

3 Lord Stowell remembered with pleasure the elegance and extenuation of Sir Adolphus Oughton's literature, and the gravity of his manners. — Croker.

4 A question perplexed only by national prejudices, heightened, in a few cases, by individual obstinacy. See post, Sept. 23. 1772. — Croker.

5 There is in the Life of Blacklock, in Anderson's Brit. Poets, an anecdote of Dr. Blacklock's somnambulism, which may very probably have been one of the topics on this occasion. — Croker.
Garrick! how he looks to-night! See how he'll clutch the dagger! That is the buzz of the theatre.

Tuesday, Aug. 17. — Sir William Forbes came to breakfast, and brought with him Dr. Blacklock, whom he introduced to Dr. Johnson, who received him with a most humane complacency; "Dear Dr. Blacklock, I am glad to see you!" Blacklock seemed to be much surprised when Dr. Johnson said, "it was easier to him to write poetry than to compose his Dictionary. His mind was less on the stretch in doing the one than the other." Besides, composing a dictionary requires books and a desk: you can make a poem walking in the fields, or lying in bed." Dr. Blacklock spoke of scepticism in morals and religion with apparent uneasiness, as if he wished for more certainty. Dr. Johnson, who had thought it all over, and whose vigorous understanding was fortified by much experience, thus encouraged the blind bard to apply to higher speculations what we all willingly submit to in common life: in short, he gave him more familiarly the able and fair reasoning of Butler's Analogy: "Why, Sir, the greatest concern we have in this world, the choice of our profession, must be determined without demonstrative reasoning. Human life is not yet so well known, as that we can have it: and take the case of a man who is ill. I call two physicians; they differ in opinion. I am not to lie down, and die between them: I must do something." The conversation then turned on atheism; on that horrible book, Système de la Nature; and on the supposition of an eternal necessity without design, without a governing mind. Johnson, "If it were so, why has it ceased? Why don't we see men thus produced around us now? Why, at least, does it not keep pace, in some measure, with the progress of time? If it stops because there is now no need of it, then it is plain there is, and ever has been, an all-powerful intelligence. But stay! (said he, with one of his satiric laughs.) Ha! ha! ha! I shall suppose Scotchmen made necessarily, and Englishmen by choice."

At dinner this day we had Sir Alexander Dick, whose amiable character and ingenious and cultivated mind are so generally known; (he was then on the verge of seventy, and is now (1785) eighty-one, with his faculties entire, his heart warm, and his temper gay) 2; Sir David Dalrymple, Lord Hailes; Mr. Mac Laurin, advocate; Dr. Gregory, who now worthily fills his father's medical chair; and my uncle, Dr. Boswell. This was one of Dr. Johnson's best days. He was quite in his element. All was literature and taste, without any interruption. Lord Hailes, who is one of the best philologists in Great Britain, who has written papers in the World, and a variety of other works in prose and in verse, both Latin and English, pleased him highly. He told him he had discovered the Life of Cheynel, in the Student, to be his. Johnson, "No one else knows it." Dr. Johnson had before this dictated to me a law-paper 4 upon a question purely in the law of Scotland, concerning vicious intromission, that is to say, meddling with the effects of a deceased person, without a regular title; which formerly was understood to subject the intermeddler to payment of all the defunct's debts. The principle has of late been relaxed. Dr. Johnson's argument was for a renewal of its strictness. The paper was printed, with additions by me, and given into the court of session. Lord Hailes knew Dr. Johnson's part not to be mine, and pointed out exactly where it began and where it ended. Dr. Johnson said, "It is much now that his lordship can distinguish so."

In Dr. Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes there is the following passage:—

"The teeming mother, anxious for her race,
Begs, for each birth, the fortune of a face;
Yet Vane could tell what ills from beauty spring;
And Sedley cursed the charms which pleased a king."

Lord Hailes told me he was mistaken in the instances he had given of unfortunate fair ones; for neither Vane nor Sedley had a title to that description. His lordship has since been so obliging as to send me a note of this, for the communication of which I am sure my readers will thank me.

"The lines in the tenth Satire of Juvenal, according to my alteration, should run thus:—

"Yet Shore 6 could tell —;
And Valière 6 cursed —."

"The first was a penitent by compulsion, the second by sentiment; though the truth is, Made moiselle de la Valière threw herself (but still from sentiment) in the king's way. "Our friend chose Vane", who was far from being well-looked; and Sedley, 8 who was so ugly that Charles II. said his brother had her by way of penance."

8 Catherine Sedley, created Countess of Dorchester for Life. Her father, Sir Charles, resenting the seduction of his daughter, joined in the Whig measures of the Revolution, and excused his revolt from James under an ironical profession of gratitude. "His Majesty," said he, "having done me the unmolested honour of making my daughter a countess, I cannot do less in return than endeavour to make his daughter a queen." — Chorier.
9 Lord Hailes was hypercritical. Vane was handsone, or,
Mr. Maclaurin's learning and talents enabled him to do his part very well in Dr. Johnson's company. He produced two epitaphs upon his father, the celebrated mathematician. One was in English, of which Dr. Johnson did not change one word. In the other, which was in Latin, he made several alterations. In place of the very words of Virgil, "ubi luctus et pavor et plurium mortis imago," he wrote "ubi luctus regnant et pavor." He introduced the word "prorsus" into the line "Mortalibus prorsus non absit solutum;" and after "Hujus enim scripta evolue," he added, "Mentemque tan- tarum rerum capacem corpori caduco superstitem crede;" which is quite applicable to Dr. Johnson himself.

Mr. Murray, advocate, who married a niece of Lord Mansfield's, and is now one of the judges of Scotland, by the title of Lord Hender- land, sat with us a part of the evening; but did not venture to say anything that I remember, though he is certainly possessed of talents which would have enabled him to have shown himself to advantage if too great anxiety had not prevented him.

At supper we had Dr. Alexander Webster, who, though not learned, had such a knowledge of mankind and of a fund of information and entertainment, so clear a head, and such accommodating manners, that Dr. Johnson found him a very agreeable companion.

When Dr. Johnson and I were left by ourselves, I read to him my notes of the opinions of our judges upon the questions of literary property. He did not like them; and said, "they make me think of your judges not with that respect which I should wish to do." To the argument of one of them, that there can be no property in blasphemy or nonsense, he an-swered, "then your rotten sheep are mine! — By that rule, when a man's house falls into decay, he must lose it." I mentioned an argu-ment of mine, that literary performances are not taxed. As Churchill says, "No statesman yet has thought it worth his pains To tax our labours, or excise our brains;" and therefore they are not property. "Yet," said he, "we hang a man for stealing a horse, and horses are not taxed." Mr. Pitt has since put an end to that argument.

Wednesday, Aug. 18. — On this day we set out from Edinburgh. We should gladly have had Mr. Scott to go with us, but he was obliged to return to England.

I have given a sketch of Dr. Johnson: my readers may wish to know a little of his fellow-traveller. Think, then, of a gentle- man of ancient blood, the pride of which was his predominant passion. He was then in his thirty-third year, and had been about four years happily married. His inclination was to be as soldier, but his father, a respectable judge, had persuaded him into the profession of the law. He had travelled a good deal, and seen many varieties of human life. He what is more to our purpose, appeared so to her royal lover; and Sedley, whatever others may have thought of her, had the "charms which pleased a king." So that Johnson's illustrations are morally just. His lordship's proposed substitute of a fabulous (or at least apocryphal) beauty like Jane Shore, whose story, even if true, was absolute: or that of a foreigner, like Mlle. de la Vallière, little known and less cared for amongst us, is not only tasteless but inaccurate; for Mlle. de la Vallière's beauty was such as questioned by her contemporaries as Miss Sedley's. Bussy Rabutin was exiled for sneering at Louis's admiration of her mouth, which he called "un bec amoureux, Qu'il d'une aricie a l'autre va."

And Madame Du Plessis Bellière writes to Fouquet, "Mlle. de la Vallière a fait la capable envers moi. Je luy ensemée par sa bonté qui n'est pourtant pas grande." And finally, after Lord Halles had clipped down the name into Valtière, his ear might have told him that it did not fit the metre.

1. Mr. Maclaurin, advocate, son of the great mathematician, and afterwards a judge of session by the title of Lord Darg- horn. He wrote some indifferent English poems; but was a good Latin scholar, and a man of wit and accomplishment. His quotations from the classics were particularly apposite. In the famous case of Knight, which determined the right of a slave to freedom if he landed in Scotland, Maclaurin pleaded the cause of the negro. The counsel opposite was the celebrated Wight, an excellent lawyer, but of a very homely appearance, with heavy features, a blind eye, which projected from the socket, a swag belly, and a limp. To him Maclaurin applied the lines of Virgil:

"Quaevius ille niger, quaevius tu candidus esses, O formose puer, nimium ne crede colori."

Mr. Maclaurin wrote an essay against the Homeric tale of "Troy divine," I believe, for the sole purpose of introducing a happy motto.

"Non anni demure decem, non mille carinas." WALTER SCOTT.

2. Mr. Maclaurin's epitaph, as engraved on a marble tomb- stone, in the Grayfriars churchyard, Edinburgh: —

No non utinam paterno consulat,

Nam tali auxilio nil eget;

Sed ut in hce infelicis campo,

Hujus enim scripta evolue.

Johnson probably changed the very words of Virgil, as not thinking an exact quotation from a heathen poet quite appro- priate to a Christian epitaph. — CROKER.

Dr. Webster was remarkable for the talent with which he at once supported his place in convivial society, and a high character as a leader of the strict and rigid presbyterian party in the church of Scotland. He was ever gay amid the gayest: when it once occurred to some one present to ask, "what one of the old men would think, should he be dia- nated in such a merry mood." — "Think I," replied the Doctor; "why he would not believe his own eyes." — WALTER SCOTT.

4. Dr. Johnson's illustration is sophistical, and might have been retorted upon him; for if a man's sheep are so rotten as to render the meadow homogeneous, or, if his house be so decayed as to threaten mischief to passengers, the law will confiscate the muon and abate the house, without any re- gard to property, which the owner loses. Moreover, Johnson should have discriminated between a criminal offence and a civil right. Blasphemy is a crime; would it not be in the highest degree absurd, that there should be a right of property in a crime, or that the law should be called upon to protect that which is illegal? If this be true in law, it is much more so in practice, as he has supplied for the extra- ordinary assistance of a court of equity should have a right, consistent at least with equity and morals; and a late ques- tion (that as to the Cato of Lord Byron) was so decided, and upon that principle, by the greatest judge of modern times, Lord Eldon. — CROKER.

had thought more than any body had supposed, and had a pretty good stock of general learning and knowledge. He had all Dr. Johnson's principles, with some degree of relaxation. He had rather too little than too much prudence: and, in his imagination being lively, he often said things of which the effect was very different from the intention. He resembled sometimes

"The best good man, with the worst-natured muse." 1

He cannot deny himself the vanity of finishing with the encomium of Dr. Johnson, whose friendly partiality to the companion of his tour represents him as one, "whose acuteness would help my inquiry, and whose gaiety of conversation, and civility of manners, are sufficient to counteract the inconveniences of travel, in countries less hospitable than we have passed." 2

Dr. Johnson thought it unnecessary to put himself to the additional expense of bringing with him Francis Barber, his faithful black servant; so we were attended only by my man, Joseph Ritter, a Bohemian, a fine stately fellow above six feet high, who had been over a great part of Europe, and spoke many languages. He was the best servant I ever saw. Let not my readers disdain his introduction; for Dr. Johnson gave him this character: "Sir, he is a civil man and a wise man."

From an erroneous apprehension of violence, Dr. Johnson had provided a pair of pistols, some gunpowder, and a quantity of bullets: but upon being assured we should run no risk of meeting any robbers, he left his arms and ammunition in an open drawer, of which he gave my wife the charge. He also left in that drawer one volume of a pretty full and curious Diary of his Life, of which I have a few fragments; but the book has been destroyed. I wish female curiosity had been strong enough to have had it all transcribed, which might easily have been done, and I should think the theft, being pro bono publico, might have been forgiven. But I may be wrong. My wife told me she never once looked into it. She did not seem quite easy when we left her: but away we went!

1 Lord Rochester of Lord Dorset. Allusion to the Tenth Satire of Horace. Boswell, however, omits to notice the tendency to hypochondriasis, which was a very important feature in his character. — Croker.

2 Previous to this public eulogium of his travelling companion, Johnson wrote to Mrs. Thrale, 3rd Nov. 1775: "Boswell will praise my resolution and perseverance, and I shall in return celebrate his good humour and perpetual cheerfulness. He has better faculties than I had imagined; more justice of discernment, and more fecundity of images. It is very convenient to travel with him; for there is no house where he is not received with kindness and respect." I asked Lord Stowell in what estimation he found Boswell amongst his contemporaries. "Generally liked as a good-natured jolly fellow," replied his lordship. "But was he respected?" "Why I think he had about the proportion of respect that you might guess would be shown to a jolly fellow." His lordship thought there was more regard than respect. — Croker.

Mr. Nairne's, advocate, was to go with us as far as St. Andrew's. It gives me pleasure that, by mentioning his name, I connect his title to the just and handsome compliment paid him by Dr. Johnson, in his book: "A gentleman who could stay with us only long enough to make us know how much we lost by his leaving us." When we came to Leith, I talked with perhaps too boasting an air, how pretty the Frith of Forth looked; as indeed, after the prospect from Constantinople, of which I have been told, and that from Naples which I have seen, I believe the view of that Frith and its environs, from the Castle-hill of Edinburgh, is the finest prospect in Europe. "Ay," said Dr. Johnson, "that is the state of the world. Water is the same everywhere."

"Una est injusti carula forma maris." 3

I told him the port here was the mouth of the river or water of Leith. "Not Lethe," said Mr. Nairne. "Why, Sir," said Dr. Johnson, "when a Scotchman sets out from this port for England, he forgets his native country." Nairne. "I hope, Sir, you will forget England here." Johnson. "Then 't will be still more Lethe." He observed of the pier or quay, "You have no occasion for so large a one; your trade does not require it: but you are like a shopkeeper who takes a shop, not only for what he has to put into it, but that it may be believed he has a great deal to put into it." It is very true, that there is now, comparatively, little trade upon the eastern coast of Scotland. The riches of Glasgow show how much there is in the west; and, perhaps, we shall find trade travel westward on a great scale as well as small.

4 Mr. William Nairne, afterwards Sir William, and a judge of the court of session, by the title, made classical by Shakespeare, of Lord Dunsinane. He was a man of scrupulous integrity. When sheriff-depute of Perthshire, he found upon reflection, that he had decided a poor man's case erroneously; and as the only remedy, supplied the litigant privately with money to carry the suit to the supreme court, where his judgment was reversed. Sir William was of the old school of manners, somewhat formal, but punctiliously well bred. — Walter Scott.

We talked of a man's drowning himself. Johnson. "I should never think it time to make away with myself." I put the case of Eustace Budgell [p. 255.], who was accused of forging a will, and sunk himself in the Thames, before the trial of its authenticity came on. "Suppose, Sir," said I, "that a man is absolutely sure, that, if he lives a few days longer, he shall be detected in a fraud, the consequence of which will be utter disgrace and expulsion from society." Johnson. "Then, Sir, let him go abroad to a distant country; let him go to some place where he is not known. Don't let him go to the devil, where he is known!"

He then said, "I see a number of people barefooted here: I suppose you all went so before the Union. Boswell, your ancestors went so when they had as much land as your family has now. Yet Anchinleck is the field of stones; there would be bad going barefooted there. The lairds however did it." I bought some speldings, fish (generally whittings) salted and dried in a particular manner, being dipped in the sea and dried in the sun, and eaten by the Scots by way of a relish. He had never seen them, though they are sold in London. I insisted on Scottifying his palate; but he was very reluctant. With difficulty I prevailed with him to let a bit of one of them lie in his mouth. He did not like it.

In crossing the Frith, Dr. Johnson determined that we should land upon Inch Keith. On approaching it, we first observed a high rocky shore. We coasted about and put into a little bay on the north-west. We clambered up a very steep ascent, on which was very good grass, but rather a profusion of thistles. There were sixteen head of black cattle grazing upon the island. Lord Hailes observed to me, that Brantome calls it L'isle des Chevaux, and that it was probably "a safer stable" than many others in his time. The fort, with an inscription on it, Maria Re: 1564, is strongly built. Dr. Johnson examined it with much attention. He strolled like a giant among the luxuriant thistles and nettles. There are three wells in the island, but we could not find one in the fort. There must probably have been one, though now filled up, as a garrison could not subsist without it. 1 But I have dwelt too long on this little spot. Dr. Johnson afterwards bade me try to write a description of our discovering Inch Keith, in the usual style of travellers, describing fully every particular; stating the grounds on which we concluded that it must have been once inhabited, and introducing many sage reflections, and we should not how a thing might be covered in words, so as to induce people to come and survey it. All that was told might be true, and yet in reality there might be nothing to see. He said, "I'd have this island. I'd build a house, make a good landing-place, have a garden, and vines, and all sorts of trees. A rich man of a hospitable turn, here, would have many visitors from Edinburgh." When we had got into our boat again, he called to me, "Come, now, pay a classical compliment to the island on quitting it." I happened luckily, in allusion to the beautiful Queen Mary, whose name is upon the fort, to think of what Virgil makes Aeneas say, on having left the country of his charming Dido:—

"Invitus, regina, tuo de litorc cessi."

"Very well hit off!" said he.

We dined at Kinghorn, and then got into a post-chaise. Mr. Nairne and his servant, and Joseph, rode by us. We stopped at Cupar, and drank tea. We talked of Parliament; and I said, I supposed very few of the members knew much of what was going on, as indeed very few gentlemen know much of their own private affairs. Johnson. "Why, Sir, if a man is not of a sluggish mind, he may be his own steward. If he will look into his affairs, he will soon learn. So it is as to public affairs. There must always be a certain number of men of business in parliament." Boswell. "But consider, Sir, what is the House of Commons? Is not a great part of it chosen by peers? Do you think, Sir, they ought to have such an influence?" Johnson. "Yes, Sir. Influence must ever be in proportion to property; and it is right it should." Boswell. "But there is not reason to fear that the common people may be oppressed?" Johnson. "No, Sir. Our great fear is from want of power in government. Such a storm of vulgar force has broken in." Boswell. "It has only roared." Johnson. "Sir, it has roared, till the judges in Westminster Hall have been afraid to pronounce sentence in opposition to the popular cry. You are frightened by what is no longer dangerous, like presbyterians by popery." He then repeated a passage, I think, in Butler's Remains, which ends, "and would cry fire! fire! in Noah's flood."

4 Such is the translation adopted by Boswell, though it loses one of the points of his happy quotation by using the words friendly state, which on this occasion would have no meaning, instead of shore, which is the proper version. — Croker.

5 The passage quoted by Dr. Johnson is in the "Character of the Assembly Man," Butler's Remains, p. 232; ed. 1754: "He preaches, indeed, both in season and out of season: for he rails at Popery, when the land is almost lost in Pres-
We had a dreary drive, in a dusky night, to St. Andrew's, where we arrived late. We found a good supper at Glass's inn, and Dr. Johnson revived agreeably. He said, "The collection called 'The Muses' Welcome to King James' (first of England, and sixth of Scotland), on his return to his native kingdom, showed that there was then abundance of learning in Scotland; and that the conceits in that collection, with which people find fault, were mere mode." He added, "We could not now entertain a sovereign so; that Buchanan had spread the spirit of learning amongst us, but we had lost it during the civil wars." He did not allow the Latin poetry of Pitcairn so much merit as has been usually attributed to it: though he owned that one of his pieces, which he mentioned, but which I am sorry is not specified in my notes, was "very well." It is not improbable that it was the poem which Prior has so elegantly translated.3

After supper, we made a procession to Saint Leonard's college, the landlord walking before us with a candle, and the waiter with a lantern. That college had some time before been dissolved; and Dr. Watson, a professor here (the historian of Philip II.), had purchased the ground, and what buildings remained. When we entered his court, it seemed quite academical; and we found in his house very comfortable and genteel accommodation.4

Thursday, Aug. 19.—We rose much refreshed. I had with me a map of Scotland, a Bible which was given me by Lord Mountstuart when we were together in Italy, and Ogilven's "Sermons on Prayer." Mr. Nairne introduced us to Dr. Watson, whom we found a well-informed man, of very amiable manners. Dr. Johnson, after they were acquainted, said, "I take great delight in him." His daughter, a very pleasing young lady, made breakfast. Dr. Watson observed, that Glasgow university had fewer home students since trade increased, as learning was rather incompatible with it. Johnson. "Why, Sir, as trade is now carried on by subordinate hands, men in trade have as much leisure as others; and now learning itself is a trade. A man goes to a bookseller, and gets what he can. We have done with patronage. In the infancy of learning, we find some great man praised for it. This diffused it among others. When it becomes general, an author leaves the great, and applies to the multitude." Boswell. "It is a shame that authors are not now better patronised." Johnson. "No, Sir. If learning cannot support a man, if he must sit with his hands across till somebody feeds him, it is as to him a bad thing, and it is better as it is.5 With patronage, what flattery! what falsehood! While a man is in equilibrii, he throws truth among the multitude, and lets them take it as they please: in patronage, he must say what pleases his patron, and it is an equal chance whether that be truth or falsehood." Watson. "But is it not the case now, that, instead of flattering one person, we flatter the age?" Johnson. "No, Sir. The world always lets a man tell what he thinks his own way. I wonder, however, that so many people have written, who might have let it alone. That people should endeavour to excels in conversation, I do not wonder; because in conversation praise is instantly reverberated." We talked of change of manners. Dr. Johnson observed, that our drinking less than our ancestors was owing to the change from ale to wine. "I remember," said he, "when all the decent people in Lichfield got drunk every night, and were not the worse thought of. Ale was cheap, so you pressed strongly. When a man must bring a bottle of wine, he is not in such haste. Smoking has gone out. To be sure, it is a shocking thing, blowing smoke out of our mouths into other people's mouths, eyes, and noses, and having the same thing done to us. Yet I cannot account, why a thing which requires so little exertion, and yet prejudices the mind from total vacuity, should have come out. England has something by which he calms himself; beating with his feet, or so." I remember when people in England changed a shirt only once a week: a Pandour, when he gets a shirt, greases it to make it last. Formerly, good tradesmen had no fire but in the kitchen; never in the parlour, except on Sunday. My father, who was a magistrate of Lichfield, lived thus. They never began to have a fire in the parlour, but on leaving off business, or some great revolution of their life." Dr. Watson said, the hall was a kitchen in old squires' houses. Johnson. "No, Sir. The hall was for great occasions, and never was used for domestic 1 refection." We talked of the Union, and what money it had brought into Scotland. Dr. Watson observed, that a little money formerly went as far as a great deal now. Johnson. "In speculation, it seems that a smaller quantity of money, equal in value to a larger quantity, if equally divided, should produce the same effect. But it is not so in reality. Many more conveniences and elegancies are enjoyed where money is plentiful, than where it is scarce. Perhaps a great familiarity with it, which arises from plenty, makes us more easily part with it."

4 The chapel was yet standing, and, adds Johnson, "of not inedible external structure; but I was always by some civil excuse prevented from entering it." The reason of this reserve turned out to be, that the chapel had been converted into "a kind of greenhouse;" and he significantly adds, that the plants do not thrive in that desacrated spot.

5 My Journal, from this day inclusive, was read by Dr. Johnson. — BOSWELL. Dr. Johnson's having read this Journal gives it a great and very peculiar interest; and we must not withhold from Mr. Boswell the merit of candour and courage in writing so freely about his great friend. Yet it may be suspected, that had Johnson not seen it, the Journal might have had still greater praise. — CROKER.

After what Dr. Johnson had said of St. Andrew's, which he had long wished to see, as our oldest university, and the seat of our private in the days of episcopacy, I can say little. Since the publication of Dr. Johnson's book, I find that he has been censured for not seeing here the ancient chapel of St. Rule, 2 a curious piece of sacred architecture. But this was neither his fault nor mine. We were both of us abundantly desirous of surveying such sort of antiquities; but neither of us knew of this. I am afraid the censure must fall on those who did not tell us of it. In every place, where there is any thing worthy of observation, there should be a short printed directory for strangers, such as we find in all the towns of Italy, and in some of the towns in England. I was told that there is a manuscript account of St. Andrew's, by Martin, secretary to Archbishop Sharp; and that one Douglas has published a small account of it. I inquired at a bookseller's, but could not get it. Dr. Johnson's veneration for the hierarchy is well known. There is no wonder then, that he was affected with a strong indignation, while he beheld the ruins of religious magnificence. I happened to ask where John Knox was buried. Dr. Johnson burst out, "I hope in the highway. 3 I have been looking at his reformation."

It was a very fine day. Dr. Johnson seemed quite wrapt in the contemplation of the scenes which were now presented to him. He kept his hat off while he was upon any part of the ground where the cathedral had stood. He said well, that "Knox had set on a mob, without knowing where it would end; and that differing from a man in doctrine was no reason why you should pull his house about his ears." As we walked in the cloisters, there was a solemn echo, while he talked loudly of a proper retirement from the world. Mr. Nairne said, he had an inclination to retire. I called Dr. Johnson's attention to this, that I might hear his opinion if it was right. Johnson. "Yes, when he has done his duty to society. In general, as every man is obliged not only to 'love God, but his neighbour as himself,' he must bear his part in active life; yet there are exceptions. Those who are exceedingly scrupulous (which I do not approve, for I am no friend to scrupules), and find their scrupulosity invincible, so that they are quite in the dark, and know not what they shall do,—or those who cannot resist temptations, and find they make themselves worse by being in the world, without making it better,—may retire. I never read of a hermit, but in imagination I kiss his feet: never of a monastery, but I could fall on my knees, and kiss the pavement. But I think putting young people there, who know nothing of life, nothing of retirement, is dangerous and wicked. It is a saying as old as Hesiod—

"Εγάν νεών, θουολα τε μηνον, ελχατι τε γεράνων." 4 That is a very noble line: not that young men should not pray, or old men not give counsel, but that every season of life has its proper duties. I have thought of retiring, and have talked of it to a friend; but I find my vocation is rather to active life." I said, some young monks might be allowed, to show that it is not age alone that can retire to pious solitude; but he thought this would only show that they could not resist temptation.

He wanted to mount the steeples, but it could not be done. There are no good inscriptions here. Bad Roman characters he naturally mistook for half Gothic, half Roman. One of the steeples, which he was told was in danger, he wished not to be taken down: "for," said he, "it may fall on some of the posterity of John Knox; and no great matter!" 5 Dinner was mentioned. Johnson. "Ay, ay, amidst all these sorrowful scenes, I have no objection to dinner."

We went and looked at the castle where Cardinal Beaton was murdered, 6 and then

2 It is very singular how they could miss seeing St. Rule's chapel, an ecclesiastical building, the most ancient, perhaps, in Great Britain. It is a square tower, which stands close by the ruins of the old cathedral. Martin's Reliquiae Divae Annals, No. 1, 1837, have been published.—WALTER SCOTT.
3 It is, says Mr. Chambers, a little old, though Boswell has overlooked it, that Knox was buried in a place which soon after became, and ever since has been, a highway; namely, the old churchyard of St. Giles in Edinburgh.—CROKER, 1835.

visited Principal Murison at his college, where is a good library room; but the Principal was abundantly vain of it, for he seriously said to Dr. Johnson, “You have not such a one in England.”

The professors entertained us with a very good dinner. Present: Murison, Shaw, Cooke,

Hill, Haddo, Watson, Flint, Brown. I observed, that I wondered to see him eat so well, after viewing so many sorrowful scenes of ruined religious magnificence. “Why,” said he,

“I am not sorry, after seeing these gentlemen, for they are not sorry.” Murison said, all sorrow was bad, as it was murmuring against the dispensations of Providence. Johnson.

“Sir, sorrow is inherent in humanity. As you cannot judge two and two to be either five or three, but certainly four, so, when comparing a worse present state, with a better which is past, you cannot but feel sorrow. It is not cured by reason, but by the incursion of present objects, which wear out the past. You need not murmur, though you are sorry.” Murison.

“But St. Paul says, ‘I have learnt, in whatever state I am, therewith to be content.’”

Johnson. “Sir, that relates to riches and poverty; for we see St. Paul, when he had a thorn in the flesh, prayed earnestly to have it removed; and then he could not be content.”

Murison, thus refuted, tried to be smart, and drank to Dr. Johnson, “Long may you lecture!” Dr. Johnson afterwards, speaking of his not drinking wine, said, “The Doctor spoke of lecturing (looking to him). I give all these lectures on water.”

He defended requiring subscription in those admitted to universities, thus: “As all who come into the country must obey the king, so all who come into an university must be of the Church.”

And here I must do Dr. Johnson the justice to contradict a very absurd and ill-natured story, as to what passed at St. Andrew’s. It has been circulated, that, after grace was said in English, in the usual manner, he, with the greatest marks of contempt, as if he had held it to be no grace in an university, would not sit down till he had said grace aloud, in Latin.

This would have been an insult indeed to the gentlemen who were entertaining us. But the truth was precisely thus. In the course of conversation at dinner, Dr. Johnson, in very good humour, said, “I should have expected to have heard a Latin grace, among so many learned men: we had always a Latin grace at Oxford. I believe I can repeat it.” Which he did, as giving the learned men in one place a specimen of what was done by the learned men in another place.

We went and saw the church, in which is Archbishop Sharp’s monument. I was struck with the same kind of feelings with which the churches of Italy impressed me. I was much pleased to see Dr. Johnson actually in St.

Andrew’s, of which we had talked so long.

Professor Haddo was with us this afternoon, along with Dr. Watson. We looked at St.

Salvador’s College. The rooms for students seemed very commodious, and Dr. Johnson said, the chapel was the neatest place of worship

he had seen. The key of the library could not be found, for it seems Professor Hill, who was out of town, had taken it with him. Dr.

Johnson told a joke he had heard of a monastery abroad, where the key of the library could never be found.

It was somewhat dispiriting, to see this ancient archiepiscopal city now sadly deserted.

We saw in one of its streets a remarkable proof of liberal toleration; a nonjurings clergymen, strutting about in his canonicals, with a jolly countenance and a round belly, like a well-fed monk.

We observed two occupations united in the same person, who had hung out two signposts. Upon one was “James Hood, White Iron Smith” (i.e. tin-plate worker). Upon another, “The Art of Fencing Taught, by James Hood.” Upon last these were painted trees, and two men fencing, one of whom had hit the other in the eye. to show his great dexterity; so that the art was well taught.

Johnson. “Were I studying here, I should go and take a lesson. I remember Hope, in his book on this art, says, ‘the Scotch are very good fencers.’”

We returned to the inn, where we had been entertained at dinner, and drank tea in Andrew’s, by John and Norman Leslie (of the Rhothes family), and some others, in vengeance, as they alleged (though no doubt they had also personal motives), of the share the cardinal had in the death of Mr. George Wishart, a protestant minister of great reputation, who had lately been burned for heresy in the cardinal’s own presence. “The cardinal was murdered,” says Johnson in his “Journey,

“by the ruffians of reformation, in the manner of Knox has given what he himself calls a merry narrative.”

1 “The library,” says Johnson, “is not very spacious, but elegant and luminous. The doctor by whom it was shown hoped to irritate or subdue my English vanity by telling me, that we had no such repository of books in England.” —

Letters. Johnson, with unusual forbearance, appears not to have conveyed this story, for he adds, “I am informed, that the library of St. Andrew’s is, I am informed, but 75 feet long, whilst that of all halls, in Oxford, is 106 feet; of Christ Church, 141; of Queen’s, 123; and each of the three divisions of the Bodleian is more than twice as long as the library of St.

Andrew’s.” — Croker.

4 James Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrew’s, was dragged from his coach, and murdered in the arms of his daughter, with the force of history and all the interest of romance.

happy year, was expended in painting it in resemblance of company with some of the professors, of whose civilities I beg leave to add my humble and very grateful acknowledgment to the honourable testimony of Dr. Johnson, in his “Journey.”

We talked of composition, which was a favourite topic of Dr. Watson, who first distinguished himself by lectures on rhetoric. Johnson, "I advised Chambers, and would advise every young man beginning to compose, to do it as fast as he can, to get a habit of having his mind to start promptly; it is so much more difficult to improve in speed than in accuracy." Watson, "I own I am for much attention to accuracy in composing, lest one should get bad habits of doing it in a slovenly manner." Johnson, "Why, Sir, you are confounding doing inaccurately with the necessity of doing inaccurately. A man knows when his composition is inaccurate, and when he thinks fit he'll correct it. But, if a man is accustomed to compose slowly, and with difficulty, upon all occasions, there is danger that he may not compose at all, as we do not like to do that which is not done easily; and, at any rate, more time is consumed in a small matter than ought to be." Watson, "Dr. Hugh Blair has taken a week to compose a sermon." Johnson, "Then, Sir, that is for want of the habit of composing quickly, which I am insisting one should acquire." Watson, "Blair was not composing all the week, but only such hours as he found himself disposed for composition." Johnson, "Nay, Sir, unless you tell me the time he took, you tell me nothing. If I say I took a week to walk a mile, and have had the gout five days, and been ill otherwise another day, I have taken but one day." Johnson, "I must show that I have forty corners." I have begun a sermon after dinner, and sent it off by the post that night. I wrote forty-eight of the printed octavo pages of the Life of Savage at a sitting; but then I sat up all night. I have also written six sheets in a day of translation from the French." Boswell, "We have all observed how one man dresses himself slowly, and another fast." Johnson, "Yes, Sir; it is wonderful how much time some people will consume in dressing; taking up a thing and looking at it, and laying it down, and taking it up again. Every one should get the habit of doing it quickly. I would say to a young divine, Here is your text; let me see how soon you can make a sermon. Then I'll say, Let me see how much better you can make it. Thus I should see both his powers and his judgment."

We all went to Dr. Watson's to supper. Miss Sharp, great granddaughter of Archbishop Sharp, was there, as was Mr. Craig, the ingenious architect of the new town of Edinburgh, and nephew of Thomson, to whom Dr. Johnson has since done so much justice in his "Lives of the Poets."

We talked of memory, and its various modes. Johnson, "Memory will play strange tricks. One sometimes loses a single word. I once lost fugaces in the Ode 'Posthume, Posthume.'" I mentioned to him, that a worthy gentleman of my acquaintance actually forgot his own name. Johnson, "Sir, that was a morbid oblivion."

Friday, Aug. 20. — Dr. Shaw, the professor of divinity, breakfasted with us. I took out my "Ogden on Prayer," and read some of it to the company. Dr. Johnson praised him. "Abernethy," said he, "allows only of a physical effect of prayer upon the mind, which may be produced many ways as well as by prayer; for instance, by meditation. Ogden goes farther. In truth, we have the consent of all nations for the efficacy of prayer, whether offered up by individuals or by assemblies; and Revelation has told us it will be effectual." I said, "Leechman seemed to incline to Abernethy's doctrine." Dr. Watson observed, that Leechman meant to show that, even admitting no effect to be produced by prayer, respecting the Deity, it was useful to our own minds. He had given only a part of his system: Dr. Johnson thought he should have given the whole."

Dr. Johnson enforced the strict observance of Sunday. "It should be different (he observed) from another day. People may walk, but not throw stones at birds. There may be relaxation, but there should be no levity." We went and saw Colonel Nairne's garden and groto. Here was a fine old plane tree. Unluckily the colonel said there was but this and another large tree in the county. This assertion was an excellent cue for Dr. Johnson, who laughed enormously, calling to me to hear it. He had expatiated to me on the nakedness of that part of Scotland which he had seen. His "Journey" has been violently abused for and been in company with his descendant, without making any observation on his character and melancholy death, or on the general subject of Scottish episcopacy. — Walter Scott.

Johnson has been unjustly abused for dwelling on the bareness of Pife. There are good trees in many parts of that county, but the east coast, along which lay Johnson's route, what he has said upon this subject. But let it be considered that, when Dr. Johnson talks of trees, he means trees of good size, such as he was accustomed to see in England; and of these there are certainly very few upon the eastern coast of Scotland. Besides, he said, that he meant to give only a map of the road; and let any traveller observe how many trees, which deserve the name, he can see from the road from Berwick to Aberdeen. Had Dr. Johnson said, "there are no trees" upon this line, he would have said what is colloquially true; because, by no trees, in common speech, we mean few. When he is particular in counting, he may be attacked. I know not how Colonel Nairne came to say there were but two large trees in the county of Fife. I did not perceive that he smiled. There are certainly not a great many; but I could have shown him more than two at Balmuto, from whence my ancestors came, and which now belongs to a branch of my family.

The grotto was ingeniously constructed. In the front of it were petrified stocks of fir, pine, and some other trees. Dr. Johnson said, "Scotland has no right to boast of this grotto: it is owing to personal merit. I never denied personal merit to many of you," Professor Shaw said to me, as we walked, "This is a wonderful man; he is master of every subject he handles." Dr. Watson allowed him a very strong understanding, but wondered at his total inattention to established manners, as he came from London.

I have not preserved, in my Journal, any of the conversation which passed between Dr. Johnson and Professor Shaw; but I recollect Dr. Johnson said to me afterwards, "I took much to Shaw."

We left St. Andrew's about noon, and some miles from it, observing, at Leuchars, a church with an old tower, we stopped to look at it. The manse, as the parsonage-house is called in Scotland, was close by. I waited on the minister, mentioned our names, and begged he would tell us what he knew about it. He was a very civil old man; but could only inform us, that it was supposed to have stood eight hundred years. He told us there was a colony of Danes in his parish; that they had landed at a remote period of time, and still remained a distinct people. Dr. Johnson shrewdly inquired, whether they had brought women with them. We were not satisfied as to this colony.1

We saw, this day, Dundee and Aberbrothick, the last of which Dr. Johnson has celebrated in his "Journey." 2 Upon the road we talked of the Roman Catholic faith. He mentioned (I think) Tillotson's argument against transubstantiation:— "That we are as sure we see bread and wine only, as that we read in the Bible the text on which that false doctrine is founded. We have only the evidence of our senses for both." — "If," he added, "God had never spoken figuratively, we might hold that he speaks literally, when he says, 'This is my body.'" — BOSWELL. "But what do you say, Sir, to the ancient and continued tradition of the Church upon this point?" JOHNSON. "Tradition, Sir, has no place where the Scriptures are plain; and tradition cannot persuade a man into a belief of transubstantiation. Able men, indeed, have said they believed it."

This is an awful subject. I did not then press Dr. Johnson upon it; nor shall I now enter upon a disquisition concerning the import of those words uttered by our Saviour, 3 which had such an effect upon many of his disciples, that they "went back, and walked no more with him." The catechism and solemn office for communion, in the Church of England, maintain a mysterious belief in more than a mere commemoration of the death of Christ, by partaking of the elements of bread and wine.

Dr. Johnson put me in mind, that at St. Andrew's I had defended my profession very well, when the question had again been started, Whether a lawyer might honestly engage with the first side that offers him a fee. "Sir," said I, "it was with your arguments against Sir William Forbes; but it was much that I could wield the arms of Goliath."

He said, our judges had not gone deep in the question concerning literary property. I mentioned Lord Monboddo's opinion, that if a man could get a work by heart, he might print it, as by such an act the mind is exercised. JOHNSON. "No, Sir; a man's repeating it no more makes it his property, than a man may sell a cow which he drives home." I said, printing an abridgment of a work was allowed, which was only cutting the horns and tail off the cow. JOHNSON. "No, Sir; 'tis making the cow have a call."

About eleven at night we arrived at Montrose. We found but a sorry inn, where I myself saw another waiter put a lump of sugar with his fingers into Dr. Johnson's lemonade, for which he called him "rascal!" It put me however, all the appearance of being a different race from the inland population, and their dialect has many peculiarities. — LOCKHART.

2 Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." — See St. John's Gospel, chap. vi. 53, and following verses. — BOSWELL.

1 The colony of Leuchars is a vain imagination concerning a certain fleet of Danes wrecked on Swinouby Dikes. — WALTER SCOTT. The fishing people on that coast have, in great glee that our landlord was an Englishman. I rallied the Doctor upon this, and he grew quiet. Both Sir John Hawkins's and Dr. Burney's "History of Music" had then been advertised. I asked if this was not unlucky; would they not hurt one another? Johnson. "No, Sir. They will do good to one another. Some will buy the one, some the other, and compare them; and so a talk is made about a thing, and the books are sold."

He was angry at me for proposing to carry lemons with us to Sky, that he might be sure to have his lemonade. "Sir," said he, "I do not wish to be thought that feeble man who cannot do without any thing. Sir, it is very bad manners to carry provisions to any man's house, as if he could not entertain you. To an inferior, it is oppressive; to a superior, it is insolent."

Having taken the liberty, this evening, to remark to Dr. Johnson, that he very often sat quite silent for a long time, even when in company with only a single friend, which I myself had sometimes sadly experienced, he smiled and said, "It is true, Sir. Tom Tyers (for so he familiarly called our ingenious friend, who, since his death, has paid a biographical tribute to his memory), Tom Tyers described me the best. He once said to me, 'Sir, you are like a ghost: you never speak till you are spoken to.'"

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Montrose, Saturday, Aug. 21st. — Neither the Rev. Mr. Nisbet, the established minister, nor the Rev. Mr. Spooner, the episcopal minister, were in town. Before breakfast, we went and saw the town-hall, where is a good dancing room, and other rooms for tea-drinking. The appearance of the town from it is very well; but many of the houses are built with their backs to the street, which looks awkward. When we came down from it, I met Mr. Gleig, a merchant here. He went with us to see the English chapel. It is situated on a pretty dry spot, and there is a fine walk to it. I think it is really an elegant building, both within and without. The organ is adorned with green and gold. Dr. Johnson gave a shilling extraordinary to the clerk, saying, "He belongs to an honest church." I put him in mind, that episcopals were but dissen ters here; they were only tolerated. "Sir," said he, "we are here, as Christians in Turkey." He afterwards went into an apothecary's shop, and ordered some medicine for himself; and wrote the prescription in technical characters. The boy took him for a physician.

I doubted much which road to take, whether to go by the coast, or by Lawrence Kirk and Monboddo. I knew Lord Monboddo and Dr. Johnson did not love each other; yet I was unwilling not to visit his lordship; and was also curious to see them together. I mentioned my doubts to Dr. Johnson, who said he would go two miles out of his way to see Lord Monboddo. I therefore sent Joseph forward, with the following note:

"Montrose, 21st August.

"My dear Lord, thus far I am come with Mr. Samuel Johnson. We must be at Aberdeen to-night. I know you do not admire him so much as I do; but I cannot be in this country without making you a bow at your old place, as I do not know if I may again have an opportunity of seeing Monboddo. Besides, Mr. Johnson says, he would go two miles out of his way to see Lord Monboddo. I have sent forward my servant, that we may know if your lordship be at home. I am ever, &c.

"James Boswell."

As we travelled onwards from Montrose, we had the Grampian hills in our view, and some good land around us, but void of trees and hedges. Dr. Johnson has said ludicrously, in his "Journey," that the hedges were of stone; for, instead of the verdant thorns to refresh the eye, we found the bare wall or dike intersecting the prospect. He observed, that it was wonderful to see a country so divested, so denuded of trees.

We stopped at Lawrence Kirk, where our great grammarian, Ruddiman, was once schoolmaster. We respectfully remembered that

1 This description of Dr. Johnson appears to have been borrowed from Tom Jones, book xi. chap. 2: "The other, who, like a ghost, only wanted to be spoken to, readily answered," &c.—Boswell. Tyers was not thinking of Tom Jones: both he and Fielding alluded to the same general superstition, that ghosts must be first spoken to.—Croker.

2 There were several points of similarity between them: learning, clearness of head, precision of speech, and a love of research on many subjects which people in general do not investigate. Foote paid Lord Monboddo the compliment of saying, that he was an Elzevir edition of Johnson. It has been shrewdly observed, that Foote must have meant a diminutive or pocket edition.—Boswell. Johnson himself thus describes Lord Monboddo to Mrs. Thrale: "He is a Scotch judge, who has lately written a strange book about the origin of language, in which he traces monkeys up to men, and says that in some countries the human species have tails like other beasts. He inquired for these long-tailed men from [Sir Joseph] Banks, and was not pleased that they had not been found in all his peregrinations. He talked nothing of this to me."—Letters.—Croker.
excellent man and eminent scholar, by whose labours a knowledge of the Latin language will be preserved in Scotland, if it shall be preserved at all. Lord Gardenston 1, one of our judges, collected money to raise a monument to him at this place, which I hope will be well executed. I know my father gave five guineas towards it. Lord Gardenstone is the proprietor of Lawrence Kirk, and has encouraged the building of a manufacturing village, of which he is exceedingly fond, and has written a pamphlet upon it, as if he had founded Thebes, in which, however, there are many useful precepts strongly expressed. The village seemed to be irregularly built, some of the houses being of clay, some of brick, and some of brick and stone. Dr. Johnson observed, they thatched well here.

I was a little acquainted with Mr. Forbes, the minister of the parish. I sent to inform him that a gentleman desired to see him. He returned for answer, "that he would not come to a stranger." I then gave my name, and he came. I remonstrated to him for not coming to a stranger; and, by presenting him to Dr. Johnson, proved to him what a stranger might sometimes be. His Bible inculcates "be not forgetful to entertain strangers," and mentions the same motive. 2 He defended himself by saying, "He had once come to a stranger, who sent for him; and he found him "a little-worth person." 3

Dr. Johnson insisted on stopping at the inn, as I told him Lord Gardenstone had furnished it with a collection of books, that travellers might have entertainment for the mind as well as the body. He praised the design, but wished there had been more books, and those better chosen.

About a mile from Monboddo, where you turn off the road, Joseph was waiting to tell us my lord expected us to dinner. We drove over a wild moor. It rained, and the scene was somewhat dreary. Dr. Johnson repeated, with solemn emphasis, Macbeth's speech on meeting the witches. As we travelled on, he told me, "Sir, you got into our Club by doing what a man can do." 4 Several of the members wished to keep you out. Burke told me, he doubted if you were fit for it: but, now you are in, none of them are sorry. Burke says, that you have so much good-humour naturally, it is scarce a virtue." Boswell. "They were afraid of you, Sir, as it was you who proposed me." Johnson. Sir, they knew, that if they refused you, they'd probably never have got in another. "I'd have kept them all out. Beauclerk was very earnest for you." Boswell. "Beauclerk has a keenness of mind which is very uncommon." Johnson. "Yes, Sir; and every thing comes from him so easily. It appears to me that I labour, when I say a good thing." Boswell. "You are loud, Sir, but it is not an effort of mind."

Monboddo is a wretched place, wild and naked, with a poor old house, though, if I recollect right, there are two turrets, which mark an old baron's residence. Lord Monboddo received us at his gate most courteously; pointed to the Douglas arms upon his house, and told us that his great-grandmother was of that family. "In such houses," said he, "our ancestors lived, who were better men than we." "No, no, my lord," said Dr. Johnson; "we are as strong as they, and a great deal wiser." This was an assault upon one of Lord Monboddo's capital dogmas, and I was afraid there would have been a violent altercation in the very close, before we got into the house. But his lordship is distinguished not only for "ancient metaphysics," but for ancient politesse, "la vieille cour," and he made no reply.

His lordship was drest in a rustic suit, and wore a little round hat; he told us, we now saw him as Farmer Burnet, and we should have his family dinner, a farmer's dinner. He said, "I should not have forgiven Mr. Boswell, had he not brought you here, Dr. Johnson." He produced a very long stalk of corn, as a specimen of his crop, and said, "You see here the lotus segetis:" he added, that Virgil seemed to be as enthusiastic a farmer 4 as he, and was certainly a practical one. Johnson. "It does not always follow, my lord, that a man, who has written a good poem on an art, has practised it. Philip Miller told me, that in Philip's "Cyder," a poem, all the precepts were just, and indeed better than in books written for the purpose of instructing: yet Philip had never made cyder."

I started the subject of emigration. Johnson. "To a man of mere animal life, you can urge no argument against going to America, but that it will be some time before he will get the earth to produce. But a man of any intellectual enjoyment will not easily go and immerse himself and his posterity for ages in barbarism.

He and my lord spoke highly of Homer. Johnson. "He had all the learning of his age. The shield of Achilles shows a nation in war, a nation in peace: harvest sport, nay steal-

4 Walter Scott used to tell an instance of Lord Monboddo's agricultural enthusiasm, that returning home one night after an absence (I think) on circuit, he went out with a candle to look at a field of turnips, then a novelty in Scotland. — Croker, 1846.

ing." 1 Monboddo. "Ay, and what we (looking to me) would call a parliament-house scene; a cause pleaded." Johnson. "It is part of the life of a nation, in peace, and there are in Homer such characters of heroes and combinations of qualities of heroes, that the united powers of mankind ever since have not produced any but what are to be found there." Monboddo. "Yet no character is described." Johnson. "No; they all develope themselves. Agamemnon is always a gentleman-like character; he has always \textquotedblleft \textit{horror vacui.} 2 That the ancients held so, is plain from this; that Euripides, in his Ieucuba, makes him the person to interpose." 3 Monboddo. "The history of manners is the most valuable. I never set a high value on any other history." Johnson. "Nor I; and therefore I esteem biography, as giving us what comes near to ourselves, what we can turn to use." Boswell. "But in the course of general history we find manners. In wars, we see the dispositions of people, their degrees of humanity, and other particulars." Johnson. "Yes; but then you must take all the facts to get this, and it is but a little you get. Monboddo. "And it is that little which makes history valuable." Bravo! thought I; they agree like two brothers. Monboddo. "I am sorry, Dr. Johnson, you were not longer at Edinburgh, to receive the homage of our men of learning." Johnson. "My lord, I received great respect and great kindness." Boswell. "He goes back to Edinburgh after our tour." We talked of the decrease of learning in Scotland, and of the \textit{Muses' Welcome}. 4 Johnson. "Learning is much decreased in England, in my remembrance." Monboddo. "You, Sir, have lived to see its decrease in England, its extinction in Scotland." However, I brought him to confess that the high school of Edinburgh did well. Johnson. "Learning has decreased in England, because learning will not do so much good in a time as formerly. There are other ways of getting preferment. Few bishops are now made for their learning. To be a bishop, a man must be learned in a learned age, factious in a factious age, but always of eminence. Warburton is an exception, though his learning alone did not raise him. He was first an antagonist to Pope, and helped Theobald to publish his Shakspeare; but, seeing Pope the rising man, when Crouzay attacked his \textit{Essay on Man}, for some faults which it has, and some which it has not, Warburton introduced him to Allen. Allen married him to his niece; so, by Allen's interest and his own, he was made a bishop. 5 But then his learning was the \textit{sine qu6 non}. He knew how to make the most of it, but I do not find by any dishonest means." Monboddo. "He is a great man." Johnson. "Yes, he has great knowledge, great power of mind. Hardly any man brings greater variety of learning to bear upon his point." Monboddo. "He is one of the greatest lights of your Church." Johnson. "Why, we are not so sure of his being very friendly to us. He blazes, if you will, but that is not always the steadiest light. Lowth is another bishop who has risen by his learning." Dr. Johnson examined young Arthur, Lord Monboddo's son, in Latin. He answered very well; upon which he said, with complacency, "Get you gone! When King James comes back, you shall be in the \textit{Muses' Welcome}." My lord and Dr. Johnson disputed a little, whether the savage or the London shopkeeper had the best existence; his lordship, as usual, preferring the savage. My lord was extremely hospitable, and I saw both Dr. Johnson and him liking each other better every hour.

Dr. Johnson having retired for a short time, his lordship spoke of his conversation as I could have wished. Dr. Johnson had said, "I have done greater feats with my knife than this;" though he had eaten a very hearty dinner. My lord, who affects or believes he follows an abstemious system, seemed struck with Dr. Johnson's manner of living. I had a particular satisfaction in being under the roof of Monboddo, my lord being my father's old friend, and having been always very good to me. We were cordial together. He asked Dr. Johnson and me to stay all night. When I said we must be at Aberdeen, he replied, "Well, I am like the Romans: I shall say to you, 'Happy to come: happy to depart!'"

\footnote{1 My note of this is much too short. \textit{Brevis esse laboro, offered Johnson. Yet as I have resolved, that the \textit{very Journal} which Dr. Johnson read shall be presented to the public, I will not expand the text in any considerable degree, though I may occasionally supply a word to complete the sense, as I fill up the blanks of abbreviation in the writing, neither of which can be said to change the genuine Journal. One of the best critics of our age conjectures that the imperfect passage above has probably been as follows: \"In his book we have an accurate display of a nation in war, and a nation in peace. In peace, it is distinguished as traitors the general man: even harvest sport, and the modes of ancient theft, are described.\" Boswell. But this conversation shows how well he was acquainted with the Mornian bard; and he has shown it still more in his criticism upon Pope's \textit{Homer}, in his life of that poet. My excellent friend, Mr. Langton, told me, he was once present at a dispute between Dr. Johnson and Mr. Burke, on the comparative merits of Homer and Virgil, which was carried on with extraordinary abilities on both sides. Dr. Johnson maintained the superiority of Homer. — Boswell.}

\footnote{5 I find some doubt has been entertained concerning Dr. Johnson's meaning here. It is to be supposed that he meant when a Bill that had been entertained in Scotland. — Boswell. This was, probably, another touch of Jacobite pleasantry; and Johnson was, perhaps, as Mr. Chambers suggested to me, thinking of one of the addresses in the \textit{Muses' Welcome}, which was spoken by a very young boy, the son of the Earl of Winton. — Croker, 1835.}
He thanked Dr. Johnson for his visit. Johnson, "I little thought, when I had the honour to meet your lordship in London, that I should see you at Monboddo." After dinner, as the ladies were going away, Dr. Johnson would stand up. He insisted that politeness was of great consequence in society. "It is," said he, "fictitious benevolence. It supplies the place of it amongst those who see each other only in public, or but little. Depend upon it the want of it never fails to produce something disagreeable to one or other. I have always applied to good breeding, what Addison, in his Cato, says of honour:

"Honour's a sacred tie; the law of kings; The noble mind's distinguishing perfection, That aids and strengthens Virtue where it meets her, And imitates her actions where she is not."

When he took up his large oak stick, he said, "My lord, that's Homeric;" thus pleasantly alluding to his lordship's favourite writer.

Gory, my lord's black servant, was sent as our guide, to conduct us to the high road. The circumstance of each of them having a black servant was another point of similarity between Johnson and Monboddo. I observed how curious it was to see an African in the north of Scotland, with little or no difference of manners from those of the natives. Dr. Johnson laughed to see Gory and Joseph riding together most cordially. "Those two fellows," said he, "one from Africa, the other from Bohemia, seem quite at home." He was much pleased with Lord Monboddo to-day. He said, he would have pardoned him for a few paradoxes, when he found that he had so much that was good; but that, from his appearance in London, he thought him all paradox; which would not do. He observed that his lordship had talked no paradoxes to-day.

"And as to the savage and the London shopkeeper," said he, "I don't know but I might have taken the side of the savage equally, had any body else taken the side of the shopkeeper." He had said to my lord, in opposition to the value of the savage's courage, that it was owing to his limited power of thinking, and repeated Pope's verses, in which "Macedonin's madman" is introduced, and the conclusion is,

"Yet ne'er looks forward farther than his nose."

I objected to the last phrase, as being low.

Johnson, "Sir, it is intended to be low; it is satire. The expression is debased, to debase the character."

When Gory was about to part from us, Dr. Johnson called to him, "Mr. Gory, give me leave to ask you a question! are you baptized?" Gory told him he was — and confirmed by the Bishop of Durham. He then gave him a slilling.

We had a tedious driving this afternoon, and were somewhat drowsy. Last night I was afraid Dr. Johnson was beginning to faint in his resolution; for he said, "If we must ride much, we shall not go; and there's an end on." To-day, when he talked of Sky with spirit, I said, "Why, Sir, you seemed to me to despond yesterday. You are a delicate Londoner; you are a maccaroni; you can't ride." Johnson, "Sir, I shall ride better than you. I was only afraid I should not find a horse able to carry me." I hoped then there would be no fear of getting through our wild Tour.

We came to Aberdeen at half an hour past eleven. The New Inn, we were told, was full. This was comfortless. The waiter, however, asked if one of our names was Boswell, and brought me a letter left at the inn; it was from Mr. Thrale, enclosing one to Dr. Johnson. Finding who I was, we were told they would contrive to lodge us by putting us for a night into a room with two beds. The waiter said to me in the broad strong Aberdeenish dialect, "I thought I knew you, by your likeness to your father." My father puts up at the New Inn, when on his circuit. Little was said to-night.

I was to sleep in a little press-bed in Dr. Johnson's room. I had it wheeled out into the dining-room, and there I lay very well.

Sunday, Aug. 22. — I sent a message to Professor Thomas Gordon, who came and breakfasted with us. He had secured seats for us at the English chapel. We found a respectable congregation, and an admirable organ well played by Mr. Tait.

We walked down to the shore. Dr. Johnson laughed to hear that Cromwell's soldiers taught the Aberdeen people to make shoes and stockings, and to plant cabbages. He asked, if weaving the plaids was ever a domestic art, in the Highlands, like spinning or knitting. They could not inform him here. But he conjectured probably, that where people lived so remote from each other, it was likely to be a domestic art; as we see it was among the ancients, from Penclope. I was sensible to-day, to an extraordinary degree, of Dr. Johnson, as we have seen and shall see, Johnson's conversation — Croker.

1 Readers of this day will wonder that a mark of respect to ladies, now so universal, should ever have been withheld. It surely was not so in England at that period. — Croker.

2 Johnson says to Mrs. Thrale, "We agree pretty well, only we disputed in adjusting the claim of merit between a shopkeeper of London and a savage of the American wildernesses. Our opinions were, I think, maintained on both sides without full conviction. Monboddo declared boldly for the savage, and I, perhaps for that reason, sided with the citizen." — Letters, vol. i. p. 115. A reason that too often influ-son's excellent English pronunciation. I cannot account for its striking me more now than any other day; but it was as if new to me, and I listened to every sentence which he spoke, as to a musical composition. Professor Gordon gave him an account of the plan of education in his college. Dr. Johnson said, it was similar to that at Oxford. Waller, the poet's great-grandson, was studying here. Dr. Johnson wondered that a man should send his son so far off, when there were so many good schools in England. He said, "At a great school there is all the splendour and illumination of many minds; the radiance of all is concentrated in each, or at least reflected upon each. But we must own that neither a dull boy, nor an idle boy, will do so well at a great school as at a private one. For at a great school there are always boys enough to do well easily, who are sufficient to keep up the credit of the school; and after whipping being tried to no purpose, the dull or idle boys are left at the end of a class, having the appearance of going through the course, but learning nothing at all. Such boys may do good at a private school, where constant attention is paid to them, and they are watched. So that the question of public or private education is not properly a general one; but whether one or the other is best for my son."

We were told the present Mr. Waller was a plain country gentleman; and his son would be such another. I observed, a family could not expect a poet but in a hundred generations. "Nay," said Dr. Johnson, "not one family in a hundred can expect a poet in a hundred generations." He then repeated Dryden's celebrated lines,

"Three poets in three distant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England did adorn:
The first in loveness of thought surpass'd;
The next, in majesty; in both the last;
The force of Nature could no further go;
To make a third, she join'd the former two;"

and a part of a Latin translation of it done at Oxford: he did not then say by whom.

He received a card from Sir Alexander Gordon, who had been his acquaintance twenty years ago in London, and who, "if forgiven for not answering a line from him, would come in the afternoon." Dr. Johnson rejoiced to hear of him, and begged he would come and dine with us. I was much pleased to see the kindness with which Dr. Johnson received his old friend Sir Alexander; a gentleman of good family (Lismore), but who had not the estate. The King's College here made him Professor of Medicine, which affords him a decent subsistence. He told us that the value of the stockings exported from Aberdeen was, in peace, a hundred thousand pounds; and amounted in time of war, to one hundred and seventy thousand pounds. Dr. Johnson asked what made the difference? Here we had a proof of the comparative sagacity of the two professors. Sir Alexander answered, "Because there is more occasion for them in war." Professor Thomas Gordon answered, "Because the Germans, who are our great rivals in the manufacture of stockings, are otherwise employed in time of war." Johnson. "Sir, you have given a very good solution."

At dinner, Dr. Johnson ate several platefuls of Scotch broth, with barley and peas in it, and seemed very fond of the dish. I said, "You never ate it before." Johnson. "No, Sir; but I don't care how soon I eat it again."

My cousin, Miss Dallas, formerly of Inverness, was married to Mr. Riddoch, one of the ministers of the English chapel here. He was ill, and confined to his room; but she sent us a kind invitation to tea, which we all accepted. She was the same lively, sensible, cheerful woman, as ever. Dr. Johnson here threw out some jokes against Scotland. He said, "You go first to Aberdeen; then to Embrua (the Scottish pronunciation of Edinburgh); then to Newcastle, to be polished by the colliers; then to York; then to London." And he laid hold of a little girl, Stuart Dallas, niece to Mrs. Riddoch, and, representing himself as a giant, said, he would take her with him! telling her, in a hollow voice, that he lived in a cave, and had a bed in the rock, and she should have a little bed cut opposite to it!

He thus treated the point, as to prescription 2 of murder in Scotland. "A jury in England would make allowance for deficiencies of evidence, on account of lapse of time: but a general rule that a crime should not be punished, or tried for the purpose of punishment, after twenty years, is bad. It is cant to talk of the king's advocate delaying a prosecution from malice. How unlikely is it the king's advocate should have malice against persons who commit murder, or should even know them at all. If the son of the murdered man should kill the murderer who got off merely by prescription, I would help him to make his escape; though, were I upon his jury, I would not acquit him. I would not advise him to commit such an act. On the contrary, I would bid him submit to the determination of society, because a man is bound to submit to the inconveniences of it, as he enjoys the good; but the young man, though politically wrong, would not be morally wrong. He would have to say, 'Here I am amongst barbarians, who not only refuse to do justice, but..."

1 London, 5d of May, 1773. Dr. Johnson acknowledged that he was himself the author of the translation above alluded to, and dictated it to me as follows:

"Quae haudet vates Genius Romanus et Anglius Tres tria temporibus scelae dedere suos.

encourage the greatest of all crimes. I am therefore in a state of nature; for, so far as there is no law, it is a state of nature; and consequently, upon the eternal and immutable law of justice, which requires that he who sheds man's blood should have his blood shed, I will stab the murderer of my father."

We went to our inn, and sat quietly. Dr. Johnson borrowed, at Mr. Riddoch's, a volume of Massillon's Discourses on the Psalms; but I found he read little in it. Ogden too he sometimes took up, and glanced at; but threw it down again. I then entered upon religious conversation. Never did I see him in a better frame: calm, gentle, wise, holy. I said, "Would not the same objection hold against the Trinity as against transubstantiation?" — "Yes," said he, "if you take three and one in the same sense. If you do so, to be sure you cannot believe it; but the three persons in the Godhead are three in one sense, and one in another. We cannot tell how, and that is the mystery!"

I spoke of the satisfaction of Christ. He said his notion was, that it did not atone for the sins of the world; but, by satisfying divine justice, by showing that no less than the Son of God suffered for sin, it showed to men and innumerable created beings the heinousness of it, and therefore rendered it unnecessary for divine vengeance to be excited against sinners, as it otherwise must have been; that in this way it might operate even in favour of those who had never heard of it; as to those who did hear of it, the effect it should produce would be repentance and piety, by impressing upon the mind a just notion of sin; that original sin was the propensity to evil, which no doubt was occasioned by the fall. He presented this solenn subject in a new light to me, and rendered much more rational and clear the doctrine of what our Saviour has done for us; as it removed the notion of imputed righteousness in co-operating; whereas, by this view, Christ has done all already that he had to do, or is ever to do, for mankind, by making his great satisfaction; the consequences of which will affect each individual according to the particular conduct of each. I would illustrate this by saying, that Christ's satisfaction resembles a sun placed to show light to men, so that it depends upon themselves whether they will walk the right way or not, which they could not have done without that sun, "the sun of righteousness." There is, however, more in it than merely giving light — "a light to lighten the Gentiles;" for we are told, there is, "healing under his wings." Dr. Johnson said to me, "Richard Baxter commends a treatise by Grotius, 'De Satisficatione Christi.' I have never read it; but I intend to read it; and you may read it." I remarked, upon the principle now laid down, we might explain the difficult and seemingly hard text, "They that believe shall be saved; and they that believe not shall be damned." They believe shall have such an impression made upon their minds, as will make them act so that they may be accepted by God.

We talked of one of our friends, taking ill, for a long time, a hasty expression of Dr. Johnson's to him, on his attempting to prosecute a subject that had a reference to religion, beyond the bounds within which the Doctor thought such topics should be confined in a mixed company. Johnson, "What is to become of society, if a friendship of twenty years is to be broken off for such a cause?" As Bacon says, —

"Who then to frail mortality shall trust.

But limns the water, or but writes in dust."

I said, he should write expressly in support of Christianity; for that, although a reverence for it shines through his works in several places, that is not enough. "You know," said I, "what Grotius has done, and what Addison has done; you should do also." He replied, "I hope I shall."

Monday, Aug. 23.—Principal Campbell, Sir Alexander Gordon, Professor Gordon, and Professor Ross, visited us in the morning, as did Dr. Gerard, who had come six miles from the country on purpose. We went and saw the Marischal College, and at one o'clock we waited on the magistrates in the town-hall, as they had invited us, in order to present Dr. Johnson with the freedom of the town, which Provost Jopp did with a very good grace. Dr. Johnson was much pleased with this mark of attention, and received it very politely. There was a pretty numerous company assembled. It was striking to hear all of them drinking, "Dr. Johnson! Dr. Johnson!" in the town-hall of Aberdeen, and then to see him with his burgess-ticket, or diploma, in his hat, which he wore as he walked along the street, according to the usual custom. It gave me great satisfaction to ob--

1 My worthy, intelligent, and candid friend, Dr. Kippis, informs me, that several divines have thus explained the mediation of our Saviour. What Dr. Johnson now delivered was a temporary opinion; for he afterwards was fully convinced of propitiatory sacrifice, as I shall show at large in my future work, "The Life of Samuel Johnson, L.L.D." — Boswell. Dr. Kippis was a deist. Dr. Johnson's Prayers and Meditations abundantly prove that he was, as far back as we have any record of his religious feelings, fully convinced of the propitiatory sacrifice. In the prayer on his birthday, in 1738 (transcribed by him in 1788), he expressly states his hope of salvation "through the satisfaction of Jesus Christ." — See his full opinion, sub June 3, 1791.—Croker.

2 No doubt Mr. Langton. But see ante, p. 265., as to the real sense of this temporary goodness. — Croker.

4 Dr. Beatie was so kindly entertained in England, that he had not yet returned home. — Boswell.

5 Dr. Johnson's burgess-ticket was in these words: —

"Aberdonian, vigesimo tertio die mensis Augusti, anno Domini millesimo septingentesimo septuagesimo tertio, licentia nominum virorum, Jacobii Jopp, praepostli, Adamii Duft, Gulielmi Young, Georgii Marr, e Gulielmi Forbes, Balliervom, Gulielmi Raulfe Declini gudia et Joannis Nicolii Theuassarii dicti burgi.—Quo die vir gene serve the regard, and, indeed, fondness too, which every body here had for my father.

While Sir Alexander Gordon conducted Dr. Johnson to Old Aberdeen, Professor Gordon and I called on Mr. Riddoch, whom I found to be a grave worthy clergyman. He observed that, whatever might be said of Dr. Johnson while he was alive, he would, after he was dead, be looked upon by the world with regard and astonishment, on account of his Dictionary.

Professor Gordon and I walked over to the old college, which Dr. Johnson had seen by this time. I stepped into the chapel, and looked at the tomb of the founder, Archbishop Elphinston, of whom I shall have occasion to write in my History of James IV. of Scotland, the patron of my family.

We dined at Sir Alexander Gordon's. The provost, Professor Ross, Professor Dunbar, Professor Thomas Gordon, were there. After dinner came in Dr. Gerard, Professor Leslie, Professor Macleod. We had little or no conversation in the morning; now we were but barren. The professors seemed afraid to speak.

Dr. Gerard told us that an eminent printer 1 was very intimate with Warburton. Johnson. 2

"Why, Sir, he has printed some of his works, and perhaps bought the property of some of them. The intimacy is such as one of the professors here may have with one of the carpenters who is furnishing the college." — "But," said Gerard, "I saw a letter from him to this printer, in which he says, that the one half of the clergy of the Church of Scotland are fanatics, and the other half infidels." Johnson. 3 "Warburton has accustomed himself to write letters just as he speaks, without thinking any more of what he throws out. When I read Warburton first, and observed his force, and his contempt of mankind, I thought he had driven the world before him; but I soon found that was not the case; for Warburton, by extending his abuse, rendered it ineffectual."

He told me, when we were by ourselves, that he thought it very wrong in the printer to show Warburton's letter, as it was raising a body of enemies against him. He thought it foolish in Warburton to write so to the printer; and added, "Sir, the worst way of being intimate is by scribbling." He called Warburton's "Doctrine of Grace" a poor performance, and so, he said, was Wesley's Answer. "Warburton," he observed, "had laid himself very open. In particular, he was weak enough to say, that, in some disorders of the imagination, people had spoken with tongues, had spoken languages which they never heard before; a thing as absurd as to say, that in some disorders of the imagination, people had been known to fly."

I talked of the difference of genius, to try if I could engage Gerard in a dispute with Dr. Johnson; but I did not succeed. I mentioned, as a curious fact, that Locke had written verses. Johnson. 4 "I know of none, Sir, but a kind of exercise prefixed to Dr. Sydenham's Works, in which he has some conceits about the dryness, when both water and burning are united; and how Dr. Sydenham removed fire by drawing off water, contrary to the usual practice, which is to extinguish fire by bringing water upon it."

I am not sure that there is a word of all this; but it is such kind of talk." 5

1 This, like many similar intimations scattered through these works, does not appear to have been carried into effect. Nor is Elphinston's desire of a such a bishop correct.

2 Aberdeen never was an archbishop's see.

3 cited in Johnson's Dictionary.

4 All this, as Dr. Johnson suspected at the time, was the immediate invention of his own lively imagination; for there is not one word of it in Mr. Locke's complimentary performances. My readers will, I have no doubt, like to be satisfied, by comparing them; and, at any rate, it may entertain them to read verses composed by our great metaphysician, when a bachelor in physics.

Mr. Boswell says, that Dr. Johnson's observation was "the immediate invention of his own lively imagination;" and that there was "not one word of it in Mr. Locke's per-
We spoke of Fingal. Dr. Johnson said calmly, "If the poems were really translated, they were certainly first written down. Let Mr. Macpherson deposit the manuscript in one of the colleges at Aberdeen, where there are people who can judge; and, if the professors certify the authenticity, then there will be an end of the controversy." If he does not take this obvious and easy method, he gives the best reason to doubt; considering, too, how much is against it à priori."

We sauntered after dinner in Sir Alexander's garden, and saw his little grotto, which is hung with pieces of poetry written in a fair hand. It was agreeable to observe the contentment and kindness of this quiet, benevolent man. Professor Macleod was brother to Macleod of Talisker, and brother-in-law to the Laird of Col. He gave me a letter to young Col. I was weary of this day, and began to think wishfully of being again in motion. I was uneasy to think myself too fastidious, whilst I fancied Dr. Johnson quite satisfied. But he owned to me, that he was fatigued and teased by Sir Alexander's doing too much to entertain him. I said, it was all kindness. Johnson. "True, Sir; but sensation is sensation." Boswell. "It is so: we feel pain equally from the surgeon's probe, as from the sword of the foe."

We visited two booksellers' shops, and could not find Arthur Johnston's Poems. 2 We went and sat near an hour at Mr. Riddoch's. He could not tell distinctly how much education at the college here costs, which disgusted Dr. Johnson. I had pledged myself, that we should go to the inn, and not stay supper. They pressed us, but he was resolute. I saw Mr. Riddoch did not please him. He said to me, afterwards, "Sir, he has no vigour in his talk." But my friend should have considered, that he himself was not in good humour; so that it was not easy to talk to his satisfaction. We sat contentedly at our inn. He then became merry, and observed how little we had either heard or said at Aberdeen; that the Aberdonians had not started a single mauchin (the Scottish word for hare) for us to pursue.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Tuesday, August 24.—We set out about eight in the morning, and breakfasted at Ellon. The landlord said to me, "Is not this the great doctor that is going about through the country?" I said, "Yes." "Ay," said she, "we heard of him; I made an errand into the room on purpose to see him. There's something great in his appearance: it is a pleasure to have such a man in one's house; a man who does so much good. If I had thought of it, I would have shown him a child of mine, who has had a lump on his throat for some time."

"But," said I, "he is not a doctor of physic."

"Is he an occultist?" said the landlord. "No," said I; "he is only a very learned man." Lordlord. "They say he is the greatest man in England, except Lord Mansfield." Dr. Johnson was highly entertained with this, and I do think he was pleased too. He said, "I like the exception. To have called me the greatest man in England, would have been an unmeaning compliment; but the exception marked that the praise was in earnest, and, in Scotland, the exception must be Lord Mansfield, or — Sir John Pringle."

He told me a good story of Dr. Goldsmith. Graham, who wrote "Telemachus, a Masque," was sitting one night with him and Dr. Johnson, and was half drunk. He ratted away to Dr. Johnson. "You are a clever fellow, to be sure; but you cannot write an essay like Addison, or verses like the Rape of the Lock." At last he said, "Doctor, I should be happy to see you at Eton. 3 "I shall be glad to wait on you," answered Goldsmith. "No," said Graham, "it is not you I mean, Dr. Minor; 't is Dr. Major, there." Goldsmith was excessively hurt by this. He afterwards spoke of it himself. "Graham," said he, "is a fellow to make one commit suicide." 4

1 Johnston is one of the most eminent men that Aberdeen has produced. He was a native of the county (born about 1697), and rector of the university. His works were originally printed at Aberdeen; and their not being to be found in that seat of learning, to which he did so much honour, is strange. But such things sometimes happen. In Harleian, the cradle of the art of printing, I could not find a guide book for the town. — Croker.

2 Graham was one of the masters at Eton. — Croker.

3 I am sure I have related this story exactly as Dr. Johnson told it to me; but a friend who has often heard him tell it, informs me, that he usually introduced a circumstance
We had received a polite invitation to Slains Castle. We arrived there just at three o'clock, as the bell for dinner was ringing. Though from its being just on the north-east coast, no trees would grow here, Lord Errol has done all that can be done. He has cultivated his fields so as to bear rich crops of every kind, and he has made an excellent kitchen-garden, with a hot-house. I had never seen any of the family; but there had been a card of invitation written by the honourable Charles Boyd, the Earl's brother. We were conducted into the house, and at the dining-room door were met by that gentleman, whom both of us at first took to be Lord Errol; but he soon corrected our mistake. My lord was gone to dine in the neighbourhood, at an entertainment given by Mr. Irvine of Drum. Lady Errol received us politely, and was very attentive to us during the time of dinner. There was nobody at table but her ladyship, Mr. Boyd, and some of the children, their governor and governess. Mr. Boyd put Dr. Johnson in mind of having dined with him at Cumming's, the Quaker's, along with a Mr. Hall and Miss Williams: this was a bond of connection between them. For me, Mr. Boyd's acquaintance with my father was enough. After dinner, Lady Errol favoured us with a sight of her young family, whom she made stand up in a row: there were six daughters and two sons. It was a very pleasing sight.

Dr. Johnson proposed our setting out. Mr. Boyd said, he hoped we would stay all night; his brother would be at home in the evening, and would very sorry if he missed us. Mr. Boyd was called out of the room. I was very desirous to stay in so comfortable a house, and I wished to see Lord Errol. Dr. Johnson, however, was right in resolving to go, if we were not asked again, as it is best to err on the safe side in such cases, and to be sure that one is quite welcome. To my great joy, when Mr. Boyd returned, he told Dr. Johnson that it was Lady Errol who had called him out, and said that she would never let Dr. Johnson into the house again, if he went away that night; and that she had ordered the coach, to carry us to view a great curiosity on the coast, after which we should see the house. We cheerfully agreed.

Mr. Boyd was engaged, in 1745-6, on the same side with many unfortunate mistaken noblemen and gentlemen. He escaped, and lay concealed for a year in the island of Arran, the ancient territory of the Boyds. He then went to France, and was about twenty years on the continent. He married a French lady, and now lived very comfortably at Aberdeen, and was much at Slains Castle. He entertained us with great civility. He had a pompousness and profuse plenitude in his conversation, which I did not dislike. Dr. Johnson said, "there was too much elaboration in his talk." It gave me pleasure to see him, a steady branch of the family, setting forth all its advantages with much zeal. He told us that Lady Errol was one of the most pious and sensible women in the island; had a good head, and as good a heart. He said, she did not use force or fear in educating her children. Johnson. "Sir, she is wrong; I would rather have the rod to be the general terror to all, to make them learn, than tell a child, if you do thus or thus, you will be more esteemed than your brothers or sisters. The rod produces an effect which terminates in itself. A child is afraid of being whipped, and gets his task, and there's an end on't; whereas, by exciting emulation and comparisons of superiority, you lay the foundation of lasting mischief; you make brothers and sisters hate each other."

During Mr. Boyd's stay in Arran, he had found a chest of medical books, left by a surgeon there, and had read them till he acquired some skill in physic, in consequence of which he is often consulted by the poor. There were several here waiting for him as patients.

We walked round the house till stopped by a cut made by the influx of the sea. The house is built quite upon the shore; the windows look upon the main ocean, and the King of Denmark is Lord Errol's nearest neighbour on the north-east.

We got immediately into the coach, and drove to Dunbui, a rock near the shore, quite covered with sea-fowls: then to a circular basin of large extent, surrounded with tremendous rocks. On the quarter next the sea, there is a high arch in the rock, which the force of the tempest has driven out. This place is called Buchanan's Builler, or the Builler of Buchanan, and the country people call it the Pot. Mr. Boyd said it was so called from the French bouloir. It may be more simply traced from boiler in our own language. We walked round this monstrous cauldron. In some places, the rock is very narrow; and on each side there is a sea deep enough for a man-of-war to ride in; so that it is somewhat horrid to move along. However, there is earth and grass upon the rock, and a kind of road marked out by the print of feet; so that one makes it out pretty safely: yet it alarmed me to see Dr. Johnson striding irregularly along. He insisted on taking a boat, and sailing into the Pot. We did so. He was stout and wonderfully alert. The Buchan-men all showing their teeth, and speaking with that strange sharp accent which distinguishes them, was to me a matter of curiosity. He was not sensible of the difference of pronunciation in the south and north of Scotland, which I wondered at.

As the entry into the Buller is so narrow that ours cannot be used as you go in, the method taken is, to row very hard when you come near it, and give the boat such a rapidity of motion that it glides in. Dr. Johnson observed what an effect this scene would have had, were we entering into an unknown place. There are caves of considerable depth; I think, one on each side. The boatmen had never entered either of them far enough to know the size. Mr. Boyd told us that it is customary for the company at Peterhead-well to make parties, and come and dine in one of the caves here.¹

He told us that, as Slains is at a considerable distance from Aberdeen, Lord Errol, who has a very large family, resolved to have a surgeon of his own. With this view he educated one of his tenant's sons, who is now settled in a very neat house and farm just by, which we saw from the road. By the salary which the Earl allows him, and the practice which he has had, he is in very easy circumstances. He had kept an exact account of all that had been laid out on his education, and he came to his lordship one day, and told him that he had arrived at a much higher situation than ever he expected; that he was now able to repay what his lordship had advanced, and begged he would accept of it. The Earl was pleased with the generous gratitude and genteel offer of the man; but refused it. Mr. Boyd also told us, Cumming the Quaker first began to distinguish himself, by writing against Dr. Leechman on Prayer, to prove it unnecessary, as God knows best what should be, and will order it without our asking: the old hackneyed objection.

When we returned to the house, we found coffee and tea in the drawing-room. Lady Errol was not there, being, as I supposed, engaged with her young family. There is a bow-window fronting the sea. Dr. Johnson repeated the ode, "Jam satis terris," while Mr. Boyd was with his patients. He spoke well in favour of entails, to preserve lines of men whom mankind are accustomed to reverence. His opinion was, that so much land should be entailed as that families should never fall into contempt, and as much left free as to give them all the advantages of property in case of any emergency. "It," said he, "the nobility are suffered to sink into indigence, they of course become corrupt; they are ready to do whatever the king chooses; therefore it is fit they should be kept from becoming poor, unless it is fixed that when they fall below a certain standard of wealth they shall lose their peerages. We know the House of Peers have made noble stands, when the House of Commons durst not. The two last years of parliament they dare not contradict the populace."

This room is ornamented with a number of fine prints, and with a whole length picture of Lord Errol, by Sir Joshua Reynolds. This led Dr. Johnson and me to talk of our amiable and elegant friend, whose panegyric he concluded by saying, "Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir, is the most invulnerable man I know; the man with whom if you should quarrel, you will find the most difficulty how to abuse."

Dr. Johnson observed, the situation here was the noblest he had ever seen; better than Mount Edgecumbe, reckoned the first in England; because, at Mount Edgecumbe, the sea is bounded by land on the other side, and, though there is there the grandeur of a fleet, there is also the impression of there being a dock-yard, the circumstances of which are not agreeable. At Slains is an excellent old house. The noble owner has built of brick, along the square in the inside, a gallery, both on the first and second story, the house being no higher; so that he has always a dry walk; and the rooms, to which formerly there was no approach but through each other, have now all separate entries from the gallery, which is hung with Hogarth's works, and other prints. We went and sat a while in the library. There is a valuable numerous collection. It was chiefly made by Mr. Falconer, husband to the late Countess of Errol in her own right. This Earl has added a good many modern books.

About nine the Earl² came home. Captain Gordon, of Park, was with him. His lordship put Mr. Johnson in mind of their having dined together in London, along with Mr. Beattie. I was exceedingly pleased with Lord Errol. His dignified person and agreeable countenance, with the most unaffected affability, gave me high satisfaction. From perhaps a weakness, or, as I rather hope, more fancy and warmth of feeling than is quite reasonable, my mind is ever impressed with admiration for persons of high birth, and I could, with the most perfect honesty, expatiate on Lord Errol's good qualities; but he stands in no need of my praise. His agreeable manners and softness of address prevented that constraint which the idea of his being Lord High Constable of Scotland might otherwise have occasioned.³ He talked very ² James, 14th Earl of Errol, died June 3, 1778. Dr. Beattie, in a letter to Mrs. Montagu, says of him, "His stature was six feet four inches, and his countenance and deportment exhibited such a mixture of the sublime and the graceful, as I have never seen united in any other man. He often put me in mind of an ancient hero; and I remember Dr. Johnson was positive that he resembled Homer's character of Sarpedon." — Croker.

³ Mr. Boswell need not have been in such awe on this account; for Lord Errol's title to that dignity was, at this period, not quite established. He not only was not de-

Life of Johnson.

In the nobleman, the best dispositions and best principles; and I saw him, in my mind's eye, to be the representative of the ancient Boys of Kilmar-nock. I was afraid he might have urged drinking, as, I believe, he used formerly to do; but he drank port and water out of a large glass himself, and let us do as we pleased. He went with us to our rooms at night; said he took the visit very kindly; and told me my father and he were very old acquaintance; that I now knew the way to Slains, and he hoped to see me there again.

I had a most elegant room; but there was a fire in it which blazed; and the sea, to which my windows looked, roared; and the pillows were made of the feathers of some sea-fowl, which had to me a disagreeable smell: so that, by all these causes, I was kept awake a good while. I saw, in imagination, Lord Errol's father, Lord Kilmarnock (who was beheaded on Tower-Hill in 1746), and I was somewhat dreary. But the thought did not last long, and I fell asleep.

Wednesday, Aug. 25.—We got up between seven and eight, and found Mr. Boyd in the dining-room, with tea and coffee before him, to give us breakfast. We were in an admirable humour. Lady Errol had given each of us a copy of an ode by Beattie, on the birth of her son, Lord Hay. Mr. Boyd asked Dr. Johnson how he liked it. Dr. Johnson, who did not admire it, got off very well, by taking it out, and reading the second and third stanzas of it with much melody. This, without his saying a word, pleased Mr. Boyd. He observed, however, to Dr. Johnson, that the expression as to the family of Errol,

"A thousand years have seen it shine," compared with what went before, was an anticlimax, and that it would have been better,

"Ages have seen," &c.

Dr. Johnson said, "So great a number as a thousand is better. Dolas latet in universalibus? Ages might be only two ages."

He talked of the advantage of keeping up the connections of relationship, which produce much kindness. "Every man," said he, "who comes into the world, has need of friends. If he has to get them for himself, half his life is spent before his merit is known. Relations are a man's ready friends, who support him. When a man is in real distress, he flies into the arms of his relations. An old lawyer, who had much experience in making wills, told me, that after people had deliberated long, and thought of many for their executors, they settled at last by fixing on their relations. This shows the universality of the principle."

I regretted the decay of respect for men of family, and that a nabob now would carry an election from them. Johnson. "Why, Sir, the nabob will carry it by means of his wealth, scended from the Earls of Errol, in the male line, but the right of his mother and grandmother rested on the nomination of Gilbert, the tenth Earl of Errol, who, having no children of his own, nominated (under a charter of Charles II.) his relation, Sir John Hay, of Kelkenn, to his honours, who accordingly succeeded as eleventh Earl; but his son, the twelfth Earl, having no issue, was succeeded by his two sisters successively. The youngest, Lady Margaret, the grandmother of the Earl who received Dr. Johnson, was married to the Earl of Lintagh, who was attained for the rebellion of 1715. They left an only daughter, married to Lord Kilmarnock, beheaded and attainted for the rebellion of 1745, whose son was the Earl mentioned in the text. Lord Londerdale, at the election of the Scottish peers in 1726, protested against Lord Errol's claim to the peerage, questioning not only the right of conferring a peerage by nomination, but denying that any such nomination had been in fact made; but the House of Lords decided that the earldom, though originally a male fief, had become descendant by right of the Crown. Gilbert had acquired and exercised the right of nomination. It was still more depressing to learn how the office of Hereditary High Constable could be transferred by election or through females; but all the late Earls of Errol have enjoyed it without question, and the present Earl executed it by deputy at the coronation of George IV., and in person during his Majesty's visit to Scotland in 1822. —Croker.

1 Lord Chesterfield, in his Letters to his son, complains of one who argued in an indiscriminate manner with men of all ranks. Probably the noble lord had felt with some uneasiness what it was to encounter stronger abilities than his own. If a peer will engage at foils with his inferior in station, he must expect that his inferior in station will avail himself of every advantage; otherwise it is not a fair trial of strength and skill. The same will hold in a contest of reason, or of wit. A certain king [Frederick of Prussia] entered the lists of genius with Voltaire. The consequence was, that, though the king had great and brilliant talents, Voltaire had such a superiority that his Majesty could not bear it; and the poet was dismissed, or escaped, from that court. In the reign of James I. of England, Crichton, Lord Sanquhar, a peer of Scotland, from a vain ambition to excel a fencing-master in his own art, played at rapiers and dagger with him. The fencing-master, for his part, was extremely good, and put out one of his lordship's eyes. Exasperated at this, Lord Sanquhar hired touchans, and had the fencing-master assassinated; for which his lordship was condemned, condemned, and hanged. Not being a peer of England, he was tried by the name of Robert Crichton, Esq.; but he was admitted to be a baron of three years' standing. See the Note Trials; and the History of England by Hume, who applauds the impartial justice exercised upon a man of high rank. —Boswell. Lord Chesterfield's character was in his description of Johnson himself as a respectable Hotentot (see ante, p. 87.). —Croker.

in a country where money is highly valued, as it must be where nothing can be had without money; but, if it comes to personal preference, the man of family will always carry it. There is generally a "secondrelism about a low man."

Mr. Boyd said, that was a good ism.

I said, I believed mankind were happier in the ancient feudal state of subordination, than they are in the modern state of independency.

JOHNSON. "To be sure, the chief was: but we must think of the number of individuals. That they were less happy seems plain; for that state from which all escape as soon as they can, and to which none return after they have left it, must be less happy; and this is the case with the state of dependence on a chief or great man."

I mentioned the happiness of the French in their subordination, by the reciprocal benevolence and attachment between the great and those in lower rank. Mr. Boyd gave us an instance of their gentlemanly spirit. An old Chevalier de Malthe, of ancient noblesse, but in low circumstances, was in a coffee-house at Paris, where was Julien, the great manufacturer at the Gobelins, of the fine tapestry, so much distinguished both for the figures and the colours. The chevalier's carriage was very old. Says Julien, with a plebeian insolence, "I think, Sir, you had better have your carriage new painted." The chevalier looked at him with indignant contempt, and answered, "Well, Sir, you may take it home and dye it!" All the coffee-house rejoiced at Julien's confusion.

We set out about nine. Dr. Johnson was curious to see one of those structures, which northern antiquarians call a Druid's temple. I had a recollection of one at Strichen, which I had seen fifteen years ago; so we went four miles out of our road, after passing Old Deer, and went thither. Mr. Fraser, the proprietor, was at home, and showed it to us. But I had augmented it in my mind; for all that remains is two stones set on up on end, with a long one laid upon them, as was usual, and one stone at a little distance from them. That stone was the capital one of the circle which surrounded what now remains. Mr. Fraser was very hospitable.

1 What a commentary on this opinion has the French revolution written: — Croker.

2 He is the worthy son of a worthy father, the late Lord Strichen, one of our judges, to whose kind notice I was much obliged. Lord Strichen was a man not only honest, but highly generous; for, after his succession to the family estate, he paid a large sum of debt contracted by his predecessor, which he was not under any obligation to pay. Let me here, for the credit of Ayrshire, my own country, record a noble instance of liberal honesty in William Hutchinson, who, in Lancashire, Kyle, who formerly obtained a full discharge from his creditors upon a composition of his debts; but some base, unkind friend, betrayed him and the creditors last winter to a dinner, without telling the reason, and paid them their full sums, principal and interest. They presented him with a piece of plate, with an inscription to commemorate this extraordinary instance of true worth; which should make some people in Scotland blush, while, though mean themselves, they strut about under the tection of great alliance, conscious of the wretchedness of numbers who have lost by them, to whom they never think of making reparation, but indulge themselves and their families in most unsuitable expense. — Boswell.

3 Since the first edition, it has been suggested by one of the members of the Club, who knew Mr. Vesey better than Dr. Johnson and I, that we did not assign him a proper place, for he was quite unskilled in Irish antiquities and Celtic learning, but might with propriety have been made professor of architecture, which he understood well, and has left a very good specimen of his knowledge and taste in that art, by an elegant house built on a plan of his own formation, at Lucan, a mile and a half from Dublin. Dr. Johnson might not, I believe, have been entitled even to this department. The house he built at Lucan is a good one, but notwise remarkable as a work of art. — Croker.

4 Here followed a note with the names of the then members of the Club, which Boswell subsequently incorporated in the text of the Life, ante, p. 165. — Croker.
laughed heartily at his lordship's saying he was an enthusiastic farmer: "For," said he, "what can he do in farming by his enthusiasm?"

Here, however, I think Dr. Johnson mistaken. He who wishes to be successful, or happy, ought to be enthusiastic, that is to say, very keen in all the occupations or diversions of life. An ordinary gentleman-farmer will be satisfied with looking at his fields once or twice a day: an enthusiastic farmer will be constantly employed on them; will have his mind earnestly engaged; will talk perpetually of them. But Dr. Johnson has much of the nil admirari in smaller concerns. That survey of life which gave birth to his "Vanity of Human Wishes" early sobered his mind. Besides, so great a mind as his cannot be moved by inferior objects: an elephant does not run and skip like lesser animals.

Mr. Robertson sent a servant with us, to show us through Lord Findlater's wood, by which our way was shortened, and we saw some part of his domain, which is indeed admirably laid out. Dr. Johnson did not choose to walk through it. He always said that he was not come to Scotland to see fine places, of which there were enough in England; but wild objects—mountains—waterfalls—peculiar manners; in short, things which he had not seen before. I have a notion that he at no time has had much taste for rural beauties. I have myself very little.

Dr. Johnson said there was nothing more contemptible than a country gentleman living beyond his income, and sure was growing poorer and poorer. He spoke strongly of the influence which a man has by being rich. "A man," said he, "who keeps his money, has in reality more use from it than he can have by spending it." I observed that this looked very like a paradox: but he explained it thus: "If it were certain that a man would keep his money locked up for ever, to be sure he would have no influence; but, as so many want money, and he has the power of giving it, and they were served round without distinction whence they came; but only one gentleman of twelve present, exposed the cause of philosophy. — WALTER SCOTT.

...it is the custom in Scotland for the judges of the Court of Session to have the titles of Lords, from their estates; thus Mr. Burnett is Lord Monboddo, as Mr. Home was Lord Kames. Thus something is a little awkward in this; for they are demoted in deeds by their names, with the addition of "of one of the senators of the college of justice;" and subscribe their Christian and surname, as James Burnett, Henry Home, even in judicial acts. — BOSWELL. We see that the same custom prevailed amongst other gentlemen as well as the Judges. All the lairds who are called by the names of their estates, as Essay, Col., &c., sign their Christian and surnames, as J. Macleod, A. MacOSKEN, &c. The dignity of the title has been conspicuous, in the case of the judges, was once the common practice of the country. — CRICKER.

...why promote country retirement? — CRICKER. It may be worth while to remark, that down to a very recent period, judges both in London and Edinburgh were distinguished for the fine houses they had acquired in the country. It is as grave peculiarities of dress: these, with some few antique and venerable exceptions, have now disappeared: and it seems doubtful whether the innovation was wise. — LOCKHART, 1835.
know not but by gaining his favour they may obtain it, the rich man will always have the greater claim to it. He, again, who lavishes his money, is laughed at as foolish, and in a great degree with justice, considering how much is spent from vanity. Even those who partake of a man's hospitality have but a transient kindness for him. If he has not the command of money, people know he cannot help them if he would; whereas the rich man always can, if he will, and for the chance of that, will have much weight." Boswell. "But philosophers and satirists have all treated a miser as contemptible." Johnson. "He is so philosophically; but not in the practice of life. Boswell. "Let me see now: I do not know the instances of misers in England, so as to examine into their influence." Johnson. "We have had few misers in England." Boswell. "There was Lowther." Johnson. "Why, Sir, Lowther, by keeping his money, had the command of the county, which the family has now lost, by spending it." I take it he lent a great deal; and that is the way to have influence, and yet preserve one's wealth. A man may lend his money upon very good security, and yet have his debtor much under his power." Boswell. "No doubt, Sir. He can always distress him for the money; as no man borrows who is able to pay on demand quite conveniently." We dined at Elgin, and saw the noble ruins of the cathedral. Though it rained much, Dr. Johnson examined them with the most patient attention. He could not here feel any abhorrence at the Scottish reformers, for he had been told by Lord Hailes, that it was destroyed before the reformation, by the Lord of Badenoch, who had a quarrel with the bishop. The bishop's house, and that of his other clergy, which are still pretty entire, do not seem to have been proportioned to the magnificence of the cathedral, which has been of great extent, and had very fine carved work. The ground within the walls of the cathedral is employed as a burying-place. The family of Gordon have their vault here; but it has nothing grand.

We passed Gordon Castle, this forenoon, which has a princely appearance. Fochabers, the neighbouring village, is a poor place, many of the houses being ruinous; but it is remarkable, they have in general orchards well stored with apples. Elgin has what in England are called pizzazz, that run in many places on each side of the street. It must have been a much better place formerly. Probably it had pizzazz all along the town, as I have seen at Bologna. I approved much of such structures in a town, on account of their convenience in wet weather. Dr. Johnson disapproved of them, "because," said he, "it makes the under story of a house very dark, which greatly over-balances the conveniency, when it is considered how small a part of the year it rains; how few are usually in the street at such times; that many who are night as well be at home; and the little that people suffer, supposing them to be as much wet as they commonly are in walking a street."

We fared but ill at our inn here; and Dr. Johnson said, this was the first time he had seen a dinner in Scotland that he could not eat.

In the afternoon, we drove over the very heath where Macbeth met the witches, according to tradition. Dr. Johnson again solemnly repeated—

"How far is call'd to Fores? What are these, So with'rd, and so wild in their attire? That look not like the inhabitants o' the earth, And yet are on?"

He repeated a good deal more of Macbeth. His recitation was grand and affecting, and, as Sir Joshua Reynolds has observed to me, that no more tone than it should have: it was the better for it. He then parodied the "All hail" of the witches to Macbeth, addressing himself to me. I had purchased some land called Dalblair; and, as in Scotland it is customary to distinguish landed men by the name of their estates, I had thus two titles, Dalblair and young Auchinleck. So my friend, in imitation of "All hail, Macbeth! hail to thee, Thane of Cawdor!"

cordesceded to amuse himself with uttering

"All hail, Dalblair! hail to thee, Laird of Auchinleck!" 1

We got to Fores at night, and found an admirable inn, in which Dr. Johnson was pleased to meet with a landlord, who styled himself "Wine-Cooper, from London."

Friday, Aug. 27.—It was dark when we came to Fores last night; so we did not see what is called King Duncan’s monument. 2 I shall mark some gleanings of Dr. Johnson’s conversation. I spoke of Leonidas, and said there were some good passages in it. Johnson. "Why, you must seek for them." He said, Paul Whitehead’s Manners was a poor performance. Speaking of Derrick, he told me "he had a kindness for him, and had often said, that if his letters had been written by one of a more established name, they would have been thought very pretty letters."

This morning I introduced the subject of the origin of evil. Johnson. "Moral evil is occasioned by free will, which implies choice between good and evil. With all the evil that there is, there is no man but would rather be a free agent, than a mere machine without the evil; and what is best for each individual, must be best for the whole. If a man would rather be a machine, I cannot argue with him. He is a different being from me." Boswell. "A man, as a machine, may have agreeable sensations; for instance, he may have pleasure in music." Johnson. "No, Sir, he cannot have pleasure in music; at least no power of producing music; for he who can produce music may let it alone: he who can play upon a fiddle may break it: such a man is not a machine." This reasoning satisfied me. It is certain, there cannot be a free agent, unless there is the power of being evil as well as good. We must take the inherent possibilities of things into consideration, in our reasonings or conjectures concerning the works of God. We came to Nairn to breakfast. Though a county town and a royal burgh, it is a miserable place. Over the room where we sat, a girl was spinning wool with a great wheel, and singing an Erse song: "I’ll warrant you," said Dr. Johnson, "one of the songs of Ossian." He then repeated these lines:

"Verse sweetens toil, however rude the sound.
All at her work the village maidens sings;
Nor, while she turns the giddy wheel around,
Revolves the sad vicissitude of things." 3

I thought I had heard these lines before. Johnson. "I fancy not, Sir; for they are in a detached poem, the name of which I do not remember, written by one Gillard, a parson." I expected Mr. Kenneth M’Aulay, the minister of Calder, who published the History of St. Kilda, a book which Dr. Johnson liked, would have met us here, as I had written to him from Aberdeen. But I received a letter from him telling me that he could not leave home, as he was to administer the sacrament the following Sunday, and earnestly requesting to see us at his manse. "We’ll go," said Dr. Johnson; which we accordingly did. Mrs. M’Aulay received us, and told us her husband was in the church distributing tokens. 4 We arrived between twelve and one o’clock, and it was near three before he came to us. Dr. Johnson thanked him for his book, and said "it is a very pretty piece of topography." M’Aulay did not seem much to mind the compliment. From his conversation, Dr. Johnson was persuaded that he had not written the book which goes under his name. I myself always suspected so; and I have been told it was written by the learned Dr. John Macpherson of Sky, from the materials collected by M’Aulay. Dr. Johnson said privately to me, "There is a combination in it of which M’Aulay is not capable." 5 However, he was exceedingly hospitable; and, as he obligingly proposed us a route for our Tour through the Western Isles, we agreed to stay with him all night.

After dinner, we walked to the old castle of Calder (pronounced Cavder), the Thane of Cawdor’s seat. I was sorry that my friend,

1 Then, as Mr. Boswell tells us, pronounced as a dispirable, Anchelek, but now, as it is written, Auchinleck. So I was informed by his lovely, lively, and intelligent grand-daughter, Teresa Lady Elliot, of Stobbs, who was snatched from her friends by an early death in 1836. — Croker.

2 Duncan’s monument; a huge column on the roadside near Fores, more than twenty feet high, erected in commemoration of the fatal retreat of the Danes from Scotland, and properly called Sween’s Stone. — Walter Scott.

3 See ante, p. 221.—C.

4 In Scotland there is a great deal of preparation before administering the sacrament. The minister of the parish examines the people as to their fitness, and to those of whom he approves gives little pieces of tin, stamped with the name of the parish, as tokens, which they must produce before receiving it. This is a species of priestly power, and sometimes may be abused. I remember a lawsuit brought by a person against his parish minister, for refusing him admission to that sacred ordinance. — Boswell.

5 My correspondent, Mr. Macpherson, corroborates the surmise of Boswell and Johnson, and says, that Dr. Macpherson was certainly the author of the book which goes under M’Aulay’s name. The doctor, an excellent scholar, was father of my old acquaintance, Sir John Macpherson, sometime governor-general of India, and of Dr. Martin Macpherson, mentioned subsequently. — Croker, 1835.
this "prosperous gentleman," was not there. The old tower must be of great antiquity. There is a drawbridge—what has been a moat—and an ancient court. There is a Hawthorn tree, which rises like a wooden pillar through the rooms of the castle; for, by a strange conceit, the walls have been built round it. The thickness of the walls, the small slanting windows, and a great iron door at the entrance on the second story as you ascend the stairs, all indicate the rude times in which this castle was erected. There were here some large venerable trees.

I was afraid of a quarrel between Dr. Johnson and Mr. M'aulay, who talked strongly of the lower English clergy. The Doctor gave him a frowning look, and said, "This is a day of novelties: I have seen old trees in Scotland, and I have heard the English clergy treated with disrespect."

I dreaded that a whole evening at Calder manse would be heavy; however, Mr. Grant, an intelligent and well-bred minister in the neighbourhood, was there, and assisted us by his conversation. Dr. Johnson, talking of hereditary occupations in the Highlands, said, "There is no harm in such a custom as this; but it is wrong to enforce it, and oblige a man to be a tailor or a smith, because his father has been one." This custom, however, is not peculiar to our Highlands; it is well known that in India a similar practice prevails.

Mr. M'aulay began a rhapsody against creeds and confessions. Dr. Johnson showed, that "what he called imposition, was only a voluntary declaration of agreement in certain articles of faith, which a church has a right to require, just as any other society can insist on certain rules being observed by its members. Nobody is compelled to be of the church, as nobody is compelled to enter into a society." This was a very clear and just view of the subject; but M'aulay could not be driven out of his track. Dr. Johnson said, "Sir, you are a bigot to laxness."

Mr. M'aulay and I laid the map of Scotland before us; and he pointed out a route for us from Inverness, by Fort Augustus, to Glenelg, Sky, Mull, Icolmkill, Lorn, and Inverary, which I wrote down. As my father was to begin the northern circuit about the 18th of September, it was necessary for us either to make our tour with great expedition, so as to get to Auchinleck before he set out, or to protract it, so as not to be there till his return, which would be about the 10th of October. By M'aulay's calculation, we were not to land in Lorn till the 20th of September. I thought that the interruptions by bad days, or by occasional excursions, might make it ten days later; and I thought, too, that we might perhaps go to Benbecula, and visit Clanranald, which would take a week of itself.

Dr. Johnson went up with Mr. Grant to the library, which consisted of a tolerable collection; but the Doctor thought it rather a lady's library, with some Latin books in it by chance, than the library of a clergyman. It had only two of the Latin fathers, and one of the Greek fathers in Latin. I doubted whether Dr. Johnson would be present at a presbyterian prayer. I told Mr. M'aulay so, and said that the Doctor might sit in the library while we were at family worship. Mr. M'aulay said, he would omit it, rather than give Dr. Johnson offence: but I would by no means agree that an excess of politeness, even to so great a man, should prevent what I esteem as one of the best pious regulations. I know nothing more beneficial, more comfortable, more agreeable, than that the little societies of each family should regularly assemble, and unite in praise and prayer to our heavenly Father, from whom we daily receive so much good, and may hope for more in a higher state of existence. I mentioned to Dr. Johnson the over-delicacy scrupulosity of our host. He said, he had no objection to hear the prayer. This was a pleasing surprise to me; for he refused to go and hear Principal Robertson preach. "I will hear him," said he, "if he will get up into a tree and preach; but I will not give a sanction, by my presence, to a presbyterian assembly."

"Mr. Grant having prayed, Dr. Johnson said, his prayer was a very good one, but objected to his not having introduced the Lord's Prayer. He told us, that an Italian of some note in London said once to him, "We have in our service a prayer called the Pater Noster, which is a very fine composition. I wonder who is the author of it." A singular instance of ignorance in a man of some literature and general inquiry! In some parishes the Lord's Prayer is suffered; in others, it is still rejected as a form, and he that should make it part of his supplication, would be suspected of heretical gravity."

Mr. Macpherson thought that this was Barret—but of the two I should have rather suspected Martinelli (cited, April 15, 1773); but it is hardly credible of any one. BOSWELL.
CHAPTER XXXV.

Saturday, Aug. 28. — Dr. Johnson had brought a Sallust with him in his pocket from Edinburgh. He gave it last night to Mr. M'Aulay's son, a smart young lad about eleven years old. Dr. Johnson had given an account of the education at Oxford, in all its gradations. The advantage of being a servitor to a youth of little fortune struck Mrs. M'Aulay much. I observed it aloud. Dr. Johnson very handsomely and kindly said, that, if they would send their boy to him, when he was ready for the university, he would get him a servitor, and perhaps would do more for him. He could not promise to do more; but would undertake for the servitorship. 1

I should have mentioned that Mr. White, a Welshman, who has been many years factor (i.e. steward) on the estate of Calder, drank tea with us last night; and, upon getting a note from Mr. M'Aulay, asked us to his house. We had not time to accept of his invitation. He gave us a letter of introduction to Mr. Ferne, master of stores at Fort George. He showed it to me. It recommended "two celebrated gentlemen; no less than Dr. Johnson, author of his Dictionary, and Mr. Boswell, known at Edinburgh by the name of Pooli." He said, he hoped I had no objection to what he had written; if I had, he would alter it. I thought it was a pity to check his effusions, and acquiesced; taking care, however, to seal the letter, that it might not appear that I had read it.

A conversation took place about saying grace at breakfast (as we do in Scotland), as well as at dinner and supper; in which Dr. Johnson said, "It is enough if we have stated seasons of prayer; no matter when. A man may as well pray when he mounts his horse, or a woman when she milks her cow (which Mr. Grant told us is done in the Highlands), as at meals; and custom is to be followed." 2

We proceeded to Fort George. When we came into the square, I sent a soldier with the letter to Mr. Ferne. He came to us immediately, and along with him Major Brewse of the Engineers, pronounced Bruce. He said he believed it was originally the same Norman name with Bruce: that he had dined at a house in London, where were three Bruces, one of the Irish line, one of the Scottish line, and himself of the English line. He said he was shown it in the Herald's Office, spelt fourteen different ways. 3 I told him the different spellings of my name. Dr. Johnson observed, that there had been great disputes about the spelling of Shakespeare's name; at last it was thought it would be settled by looking at the original copy of his will; but, upon examining it, he was found to have written it himself no less than three different ways. 4

Mr. Ferne and Major Brewse first carried us to wait on Sir Eyre Coote, whose regiment, the 37th, was lying here, and who then commanded the fort. He asked us to dine with him, which we agreed to do.

Before dinner we examined the fort. The Major explained the fortification to us, and Mr. Ferne gave us an account of the stores. Dr. Johnson talked of the proportions of charcoal and saltpetre in making gunpowder, of granulating it, and of giving it a gloss. He made a very good figure upon these topics. He said to me afterwards, that "he had talked ostentatiously." We reposed ourselves a little in Mr. Ferne's house. He had every thing in neat order as in England; and a tolerable collection of books. I looked into Pennant's Tour in Scotland. He says little of this fort; but that "the barracks, &c. formed several streets." This is aggrandising. Mr. Ferne observed, if he had said they form a square, with a row of buildings before it, he would have given a juster description. Dr. Johnson remarked, "How seldom descriptions correspond with realities; and the reason is, the people do not write them till some time after, and then their imagination has added circumstances."

We talked of Sir Adolphus Oughton. The Major said, he knew a great deal for a military man. Johnson. "Sir, you will find few men, of any profession, who know more. Sir Adolphus is a very extraordinary man; a man of boundless curiosity and unwearied diligence." I know not how the Major contrived to introduce the contest between Warburton and Lowth. Johnson. "Warburton kept his temper all along, while Lowth was in a passion.

1 Dr. Johnson did not neglect what he had undertaken. By his interest with the Rev. Dr. Adams, master of Penbroke College, Oxford, where he was educated for some time, he obtained a servitorship for young M'Aulay. But it seems he had other views; and I believe went abroad.

2 Boswell.

3 Bruce, the Abyssinian Traveller, found in the annals of that region a king named Bros, which he chooses to consider the genuine orthography of the name. This circumstance occasioned some mirth at the court of Gonder. — Walter Scott.

4 It is now said that this question is settled by an autograph in a volume (Florio) in the British Museum; but though the trustees gave a large sum for the book, and that Sir F. Madden has written a pamphlet to prove the writing genuine, I confess that it appears to me very apocryphal. — In fact, as the author of the many Shakespearean forgeries. — Croker, 1846.
Lowth published some of Warburton's letters. Warburton drew him on to write some very abusive letters, and then asked his leave to publish them; which he knew Lowth could not refuse, after what he had done. So that Warburton contrived that he should publish, apparently with Lowth's consent, what could not but show Lowth in a disadvantageous light.

At three the drum beat for dinner. I, for a little while, fancied myself a military man, and it pleased me. We went to Sir Eyre Coote's, at the governor's house, and found him a most gentleman-like man. His lady is a very agreeable woman, with an uncommonly mild and sweet tone of voice. There was a pretty large company: Mr. Ferne, Major Brewse, and several officers. Sir Eyre had come from the East Indies by land, through the deserts of Arabia. He told us, the Arabs could live five days without victuals, and subsist for three weeks on nothing else but the blood of their camels, who could lose so much of it as would suffice for that time, without being exhausted. He highly praised the virtue of the Arabs; their fidelity, if they undertook to conduct any person; and said, they would sacrifice their lives rather than let him be robbed. Dr. Johnson, who is always for maintaining the superiority of civilised over uncivilised men, said, "Why, Sir, I can see no superior virtue in this. A sergeant and twelve men, who are my guard, will die rather than that I shall be robbed." Colonel Pennington, of the 37th regiment, took up the argument with a good deal of spirit and ingenuity. Pennington. "But the soldiers are compelled to this, by fear of punishment." Johnson. "Well, Sir, the Arabs are compelled by the fear of infamy." Pennington. "The soldiers have the same fear of infamy, and the fear of punishment besides; so have less virtue; because they act less voluntarily." Lady Coote observed very well, that it ought to be known if there was not, among the Arabs, some punishment for not being faithful on such occasions.

We talked of the stage. I observed, that we had not now such a company of actors as in the last age; Wilks, Booth, &c. Johnson. "You think so, because there is one who excels all the rest so much; you compare them with Garrick, and see the deficiency. Garrick's great distinction is his universality. He can represent all modes of life, but that of an easy fine-bred gentleman." Pritchard. "He should give over playing young parts." Johnson. "He does not take them now; but he does not leave off those which he has been used to play, because he does them better than any one else can do them. If you had generations of actors, if they swarmed like bees, the young ones might drive off the old. Mrs. Cibber, I think, got more reputation than she deserved, as she had a great sameness; though her expression was, undoubtedly, very fine. Mrs. Clive was the best player I ever saw. Mrs. Pritchard was a very good one; but she had something affected in her manner: I imagine she had been player of the former age in her eye, which occasioned it."

Colonel Pennington said, Garrick sometimes failed in emphasis; as, for instance, in Hamlet, "I will speak daggers to her; but use none," instead of "I will speak daggers to her; but use none."

We had a dinner of two complete courses, variety of wines, and the regimental band of music playing in the square, before the windows, after it. I enjoyed this day much. We were quite easy and cheerful. Dr. Johnson said, "I shall always remember this fort with gratitude." I could not help being struck with some admiration, at finding upon this barren sandy point such buildings, such a dinner, such company: it was like enchantment. Dr. Johnson, on the other hand, said to me more rationally, that "it did not strike him as any thing extraordinary; because he knew, here was a large sum of money expended in building a fort; here was a regiment. If there had been less than what we found, it would have surprised him." He looked coolly and deliberately through all the gradations: my warm imagination jumped from the barren sands to the splendid dinner and brilliant company; to borrow the expression of an absurd poet, "Without sands or is, I leapt from off the sands upon the cliffs."

The whole scene gave me a strong impression of the power and excellence of human art.

We left the fort between six and seven o'clock: Sir Eyre Coote, Colonel Pennington, and several more, accompanied us down stairs, and saw us into our chaise. There could not be greater attention paid to any visitors. Sir Eyre spoke of the hardships which Dr. Johnson had before him. Boswell. "Considering what he has said of us, we must make him feel something rough in Scotland." Sir Eyre said to him, "You must change your name, Sir." Boswell. "Ay, Dr. McGregor."

We got safely to Inverness, and put up at Mackenzie's inn. Mr. Keith, the collector of excise here, my old acquaintance at Ayr, who had seen us at the fort, visited us in the evening, and engaged us to dine with him next day, promising to breakfast with us, and take us to the English chapel; so that we were at once commodiously arranged.

Not finding a letter here that I expected, I felt a momentary impatience to be at home. Transient clouds darkened my imagination, and in those eloods I saw events from which I shrank: but a sentence or two of the Rambler's conversation gave me firmness, and I considered that I was upon an expedition for which I had wished for years, and the recollection of which would be a treasure to me for life.

Sunday, Aug. 29. — Mr. Keith breakfasted with us. Dr. Johnson expatiated rather too strongly upon the benefits derived from Scotland to the Union, and the bad state of our people before it. I am entertained with his copious exaggeration upon that subject; but I am uneasy when people are by, who do not know him as well as I do, and may be apt to think him narrow-minded. I therefore diverted the subject.

The English chapel, to which we went this morning, was but mean. The altar was a bare table, with a coarse stool for kneeling on, covered with a piece of thick sailcloth doubled, by way of cushion. The congregation was small. Mr. Tait, the clergyman, read prayers very well, though with much of the Scotch accent. He preached on "Love your enemies." It was remarkable that, when talking of the connections amongst men, he said, that some connected themselves with men of distinguished talents; and since they could not equal them, tried to deck themselves with their merit, by being their companions. The sentence was to this purpose. It had an odd coincidence with what might be said of my connecting myself with Dr. Johnson.

After church, we walked down to the quay. We then went to Macbeth's castle? I had a romantic satisfaction in seeing Dr. Johnson actually in it. It perfectly corresponds with Shakespeare's description, which Sir Joshua Reynolds has so happily illustrated, in one of his notes on our immortal poet: —

"This castle hath a pleasant seat: the air
Nimbly and sweetly recommends itself Unto our gentle sense," &c.

Just as we came out of it, a raven perched on one of the chimney-ops, and croaked. Then I repeated

"— The raven himself is hoarse,
That croaks the fatal entrance of Duncan
Under my battlements."

We dined at Mr. Keith's. Mrs. Keith was rather too attentive to Dr. Johnson, asking him many questions about his drinking only water. He repressed that observation, by saying to me, "You may remember that Lady Errol took no notice of this." 3

Dr. Johnson has the happy art (for which I have heard my father praise the old Earl of Aberdeens) 4 of instructing himself, by making every man he meets tell him something of what he knows best. He led Keith to talk to him of the excise in Scotland; and, in the course of conversation, mentioned that his friend Mr. Thrale, the great brewer, paid twenty thousand pounds a year to the revenue; and that he had four casks, each of which holds sixteen hundred barrels — above a thousand hogheads.

After this there was little conversation that deserves to be remembered. I shall, therefore, here again glean what I have omitted on former days. Dr. Gerard, at Aberdeen, told us, that when he was in Wales, he was shown a valley inhabited by Danes, who still retain their own language, and are quite a distinct people. Dr. Johnson thought it could not be true, or all the kingdom must have heard of it. He said to me, as we travelled, "These people, Sir, that Gerard talks of, may have somewhat of a peregrinity in their dialect, which relation has augmented to a different language." I asked him if peregrinity was an English word. He laughed, and said, "No." I told him this was the second time that I had heard him coin a word. When Foote broke his leg, I observed that it would make him fitter for taking off George Faulkner as Peter Paragrapth, poor George having a wooden leg. Dr. Johnson at that time said, "George will rejoice at the deprecation of Foote;" and when I challenged that word, laughed, and owned he had made it, and added that he had not made above three or four in his Dictionary. 5

Having conducted Dr. Johnson to our inn, I begged permission to leave him for a little, that I might run about and pay some short visits to several good people of Inverness. He said to me, "You have all the old-fashioned principles, good and bad." I acknowledged I have. That of attention to relations in the remotest degree, or to worthy persons in every state, whom I have once known, I inherit from my father. It gave me much satisfaction to hear every body at Inverness speak of him

1 It is remarkable that Dr. Johnson read this gentle remembrance, and took no notice of it to me. — Boswell.
2 Boswell means the ruins of the royal fortress, which have since been levelled into a bowling-green. It has recently been shown (Trans. Ant. Soc. Scot. vol. i.,) that if Macbeth had a castle in this neighbourhood at all, it must have been at a little distance from these ruins. — Chambers, 1835.
3 But was not Dr. Johnson's rebuke to the Lady at least as deficient in good breeding? — Croker.
5 When upon the subject of this peregrinity he told me some particulars concerning the compilation of his Dictionary, and concerning his throwing off Lord Chesterfield's patronage, of which very erroneous accounts have been circulated. These particulars, with others that he afterwards gave me, as also his celebrated letter to Lord Chesterfield, which he dictated to me, I reserve for the Life. — Boswell. See them all, ante, p. 64. et seq. — C.
with uncommon regard. Mr. Keith and Mr. Grant, whom we had seen at Mr. M'Aulay's, supped with us at the inn. We had roasted kid, which Dr. Johnson had never tasted before. He relished it much.

Monday, Aug. 30. — This day we were to begin our equitation, as I said; for I would needs make a word too. It is remarkable, that my noble, and to me most constant, friend, the Earl of Pembroke 1 (who, if there is too much ease on my part, will please to pardon what his benevolent, gay, social intercourse, and lively correspondence, have insensibly produced), has since hit upon the very same word. The title of the first edition of his lordship's very useful book was, in simple terms, "A Method of Breaking Horses and Teaching Soldiers to ride." The title of the second edition is "Military Equitation."

We might have taken a chaise to Fort Augustus; but, had we not hired horses at Inverness, we should not have found them afterwards: so we resolved to begin here to ride. We had three horses, for Dr. Johnson, myself, and Joseph, and one which carried our portmanteaus, and two Highlanders who walked along with us, John Hay and Lauchland Vass, whom Dr. Johnson has remembered with credit in his Journey, though he has omitted their names. Dr. Johnson rode very well.

About three miles beyond Inverness, we saw, just by the road, a very complete specimen of what is called a Druid's temple. There was a double circle, one of very large, the other of smaller stones. Dr. Johnson justly observed, that, "to go and see one druidical temple is only to see that it is nothing, for there is neither art nor power in it; and seeing one is quite enough."

It was a delightful day. Loch Ness, and the road upon the side of it, shaded with birch trees, and the hills above it, pleased us much. The scene was as sequestered and agreeably wild as could be desired, and for a time engrossed all our attention.

To see Dr. Johnson in any new situation is always an interesting object to me; and, as I saw him now for the first time on horseback, jaunting about at his ease in quest of pleasure and novelty, the very different occupations of his former laborious life, his admirable productions, his "London," his "Rambler," &c., &c., immediately presented themselves to my mind, and the contrast made a strong impression on my imagination.

When we had advanced a good way by the side of Loch Ness, I perceived a little hut, with an old-looking woman at the door of it. I thought here might be a scene that would amuse Dr. Johnson; so I mentioned it to him. "Let's go in," said he. We dismounted, and we and our guides entered the hut. It was a wretched little hovel of earth only, I think, and for a window had only a small hole, which was stopped with a piece of turf, that was taken out occasionally to let in light. In the middle of the room or space which we entered was a fire of peat, the smoke going out at a hole in the roof. She had a pot upon it, with goat's flesh, boiling. There was at one end under the same roof, but divided by a kind of partition made of wattles, a pen or fold in which we saw a good many kids.

Dr. Johnson was curious to know where she slept. I asked one of the guides, who questioned her in Erse. She answered with a tone of emotion, saying (as he told us), she was afraid we wanted to go to bed to her. This coquetry, or whatever it may be called, of so wretched a being, was truly ludicrous. Dr. Johnson and I afterwards were merry upon it. I said, it was he who alarmed the poor woman's virtue. "No, Sir," said he, "she'll say, 'There came a wicked young fellow, a wild dog, who, I believe, would have ravished me, had there not been with him a grave old gentleman, who repressed him: but when he gets out of the sight of his tutor, I'll warrant you he'll spare no woman he meets, young or old.'" — "No, Sir," I replied, "she'll say, 'There was a terrible Russian who would have forced me, had it not been for a civil decent young man, who, I take it, was an angel sent from heaven to protect me.'"

Dr. Johnson would not hurt her delicacy, by insisting on "seeing her bed-chamber," like Archer in the Beaux Stratagem. But my curiosity was more ardent; I lighted a piece of paper, and went into the place where the bed was. There was a little partition of wicker, rather more neatly done than that for the fold, and close by the wall was a kind of bedstead of wood, with heath upon it by way of bed; at the foot of which I saw some sort of blankets or covering rolled up in a heap. The woman's name was Fraser; so was her husband's. He was a man of eighty. Mr. Fraser, of Dalnain, allows him to live in this hut, and keep sixty goats, for taking care of his woods, where he then was. They had five children, the eldest only thirteen. Two were gone to Inverness to buy meal; the rest were looking after the goats. This contented family had four stacks of barley, twenty-four sheaves in each. They had a few fowls. We were informed that they lived all the spring without meal, upon milk and curds and whey alone. What they get for their goats, kids, and fowls, maintains them during the rest of the year.

She asked us to sit down and take a dram. I saw one chair. She said she was as happy as any woman in Scotland. She could hardly speak any English except a few detached words. Dr. Johnson was pleased at seeing, for the first time, such a state of human life.

1 Henry, tenth Earl, born 1735, died 1794. — Croker.
2 This seems hastily said, and probably with reference to these very poor Scottish specimens; but Johnson had not yet seen Stonehenge — to erect which there must surely have been some art and vast power. (See post, October 9, 1783.) — Croker.
She asked for snuff. It is her luxury, and she uses a great deal. We had none; but gave her sixpence a piece. She then brought out her whisky bottle. I tasted it; as did Joseph and our guides: so I gave her sixpence more. She sent us away with many prayers in Erse.

We dined at a public house called the General's Hut, from General Wade, who was lodged there when he commanded in the north. Near it is the most pleasant kirk I ever saw. It is a shame it should be on a high road. After dinner we passed through a good deal of mountainous country. I had known Mr. Trapaud, the deputy-governor of Fort-Augustus, twelve years ago, at a circuit at Inverness, where my father was judge. I sent forward one of our guides, and Joseph, with a card to him, that he might know Dr. Johnson and I were coming up, leaving it to him to invite us or not. It was dark when we arrived. The inn was wretched. Government ought to build one, or give the resident governor an additional salary; as in the present state of things, he must necessarily be put to a great expense in entertaining travellers. Joseph announced to us, when we alighted, that the governor waited for us at the gate of the fort. We walked to it. He met us, and with much civility conducted us to his house. It was comfortable to find ourselves in a well-built little square, and a neatly furnished house, in good company, and with a good supper before us; in short, with all the conveniences of civilised life, in the midst of rude mountains. Mrs. Trapaud, and the governor's daughter, and her husband, Capt. Newmarsh, were all most obliging and polite. The governor had excellent animal spirits, the conversation of a soldier, and something of a Frenchman, to which his extraction entitles him. He is brother to General Cyrus Trapaud. We passed a very agreeable evening.

Tuesday, Aug. 31. — The governor has a very good garden. We looked at it, and at the rest of the fort, which is but small, and may be commanded from a variety of hills around. We also looked at the galley or sloop belonging to the fort, which sails upon the Loch, and brings what is wanted for the garrison. Captains Uriel and Darippe, of the 15th regiment of foot, breakfasted with us. They had served in America, and entertained Dr. Johnson much with an account of the Indians. He said he could make a very pretty book out of them, were he to stay there. Governor Trapaud was much struck with Dr. Johnson.

I like to hear him," said he, "it is so majestic.

I should be glad to hear him speak in your court." He pressed us to stay dinner; but I considered that we had a rude road before us, which we could more easily encounter in the morning, and that it was hard to say when we might get up, were we to sit down to good entertainment, in good company; I therefore begged the governor would excuse us. Here, too, I had another very pleasing proof how much my father is regarded. The governor expressed the highest respect for him, and bade me tell him that, if he would come that way on the northern circuit, he would do him all the honours of the garrison.

Between twelve and one we set out, and travelled eleven miles, through a wild country, till we came to a house in Glenmorison, called Anoch, kept by a MacQueen. Our landlord was a sensible fellow: he had learnt his grammar, and Dr. Johnson justly observed, that "a man is the better for that as long as he lives." There were some books here: a Treatise against Drunkenness, translated from the French; a volume of the Spectator; a volume of Prideaux's Connexion, and Cyrus's Travels. MacQueen said he had more volumes; and his pride seemed to be much piqued that we were surprised at his having books.

Near to this place we had passed a party of soldiers, under a sergeant's command, at work upon the road. We gave them two shillings to drink. They came to our inn, and made merry in the barn. We went and paid them a visit, Dr. Johnson saying, "Come, let's go and give 'em another shilling a piece." We did so; and he was saluted "My lord" by all of them. He is really generous, loves influence, and has the way of gaining it. He said, "I am quite feudal, Sir." Here I agree with him. I said, I regretted I was not the head of a clan: however, though not possessed of such an hereditary advantage, I would always endeavour to make my tenants follow me. I could not be a patriarchal chief, but I would be a feudal chief.

The poor soldiers got too much liquor. Some of them fought, and left blood upon the spot, and cursed whisky next morning. The house here was built of thick turfs, and thatched with thinner turfs and heath. It had three rooms in length, and a little room which projected. Where we sat, the side-walls were wainscoted, as Dr. Johnson said, with wicker, very neatly plaited. Our landlord had made the whole with his own hands.

After dinner, MacQueen sat by us a while, of different species, at least as much as nations are distinguished; so that a MacQueen, a MacDonal'd, a MacLean, is said, as we say a Frenchman, an Italian, a Spaniard. — Boswell. I believe Boswell is mistaken. The English and Scottish idiom are, I think, the same in this respect. An Englishman would say, in such a case, a Johnson or a Jackson, with reference to families, as "such a one married a Johnson;" but with reference to an individual, I presume the Scotch would say, like the English, that "one Macqueen was hurt in the 10th." — Croker, 1846.
and talked with us. He said, all the Laird of Glenmorison's people would bleed for him, if they were well used; but that seventy men had gone out of the glen to America. That he himself intended to go next year; for that the rent of his farm, which twenty years ago was only five pounds, was now raised to twenty pounds. That he could pay ten pounds, and live, but no more. Dr. Johnson, said, he wished McQueen laird of Glenmorison, and the laird to go to America. McQueen very generously answered, he should be sorry for it, for the laird could not shift for himself in America as he could do.

I talked of the officers whom we had left to-day; how much service they had seen, and how little they got for it, even of fame. Johnson. "Sir, a soldier gets as little as any man can get." Boswell. "Goldsmith has acquired more fame than all the officers of the last war, who were not generals." Johnson. "Why, Sir, you will find ten thousand fit to do what they did, before you find one who does what Goldsmith has done. You must consider, that a thing is valued according to its rarity. A pebble that paves the street is itself more useful than the diamond upon a lady's finger." I wish our friend Goldsmith had heard this.

I yesterday expressed my wonder that John Hay, one of our guides, who had been aboard a man of war, did not choose to continue in it longer than nine months, after which time he got off. Johnson. "Why, Sir, no man will be a sailor who has contrivance enough to get himself into a jail; for being in a ship is being in a jail with the chance of being drowned."

We had tea in the afternoon, and our landlord's daughter, a modest, civil girl, very neatly dressed, made it for us. She told us she had been a year in Inverness, and learnt reading and writing, sewing, knotting, working lace, and pastry. Dr. Johnson made her a present of a book which he had bought at Inverness.

The room had some deals laid across the joists, as a kind of ceiling. There were two beds in the room, and a woman's gown was hung on a rope to make a curtain of separation between them. Joseph had sheets, which my wife had sent with us, laid on them. We had much hesitation, whether to undress, or lie down with our clothes on. I said at last, "I'll plunge in! There will be less harbour for vermin about me when I am stripped." Dr. Johnson said, he was like one hesitating whether to go into the cold bath. At last he resolved too. I observed he might serve a campaign. Johnson. "I could do all that can be done by patience; whether I should have strength enough, I know not." He was in excellent humour. To see the Rambler as I saw him to-night, was really an amusement. I yesterday told him, I was thinking of writing a poetical letter to him, on his return from Scotland, in the style of Swift's humorous epistle in the character of Mary Gulliver to her husband, Captain Lemuel Gulliver, on his return to England from the country of the Houyhnhnms:

"At early morn I to the market haste, Stoutish in ev'ry thing to please thy taste. A curious fooed and sparagras I chose; (For I remember you were fond of these;) Three shillings cost the first, the last seven grouts; Sullen you turn from both, and call for Oars."

He laughed, and asked in whose name I would write it. I said in Mrs. Thrale's. He was angry. "Sir, if you have any sense of decency or delicacy, you won't do that." Boswell. "Then let it be in Cole's, the landlord of the Mitre tavern, where we have so often sat together." Johnson. "Ay, that may do." After we had offered up our private devotions, and had chatted a little from our beds, Dr. Johnson said, "God bless us both, for Jesus Christ's sake! Good night." I pronounced "Amen." He fell asleep immediately. I was not so fortunate for a long time. I fancied myself bit by innumerable vermin under the clothes; and that a spider was travelling from the vainesoc towards my mouth. At last I fell into insensibility.

Wednesday, Sept. 1. — I awoke very early. I began to imagine that the landlord, being about to emigrate, might murder us to get our money, and lay it upon the soldiers in the barn. Such groundless fears will arise in the mind, before it has resumed its vigour after sleep. Dr. Johnson had had the same kind of ideas; for he told me afterwards that he considered so many soldiers, having seen us, would be witnesses, should any harm be done, and that circumstance, I suppose, he considered as a security. When I got up, I found him sound asleep in his miserable sty, as I may call it, with a coloured handkerchief tied round his head. With difficulty could I awaken him. It Cocker's Arithmetic about you on your journey? What made you buy such a book at Inverness?" He gave me a very sufficient answer. "Why, Sir, if you are to have but one book with you upon a journey, let it be a book of science. When you have read through a book of entertainment, you know it, and it can do no more for you; but a book of science is inexhaustible." — Boswell. Mr. Curnuthers, in his Highland Note Book, informs us that Lachlan McQueen of Anoch was not a mere knucker, but an occupant of the farm; it was stipulated that he should receive travellers; hence his entertainment of the "Olla Sassenach" (the hearty Highlander). He did not go to the terminal, but received us in the farm of Dalcatag in the same glen. His daughter, the donee of Cocker, married Mr. J. Macintosh, a watch-maker, and died without children in Morarshire. — Croker, 1846." reminded me of Henry the Fourth's fine soliloquy on sleep,1 for there was here as uneasy a pallet as the poet's imagination could possibly conceive.

A red coat of the 15th regiment, whether officer, or only sergeant, I could not be sure, came to the house, in his way to the mountains to shoot deer, which it seems the Laird of Glenmorison does not hinder any one to do. Few, indeed, can do them harm. We had him to breakfast with us. We got away about eight.

McQueen walked some miles to give us a convey. I had, in 1745, joined the Highland army at Fort Augustus, and continued in it till after the battle of Culloden. As he narrated the particulars of that ill-advised, but brave attempt, I could not refrain from tears.

There is a certain association of ideas in my mind upon that subject, by which I am strongly affected. The very Highland names, or the sound of a bagpipe, will stir my blood, and fill me with a mixture of melancholy and respect for courage; with pity for an unfortunate and superstitions regard for antiquity, and thoughtless inclination for war; in short, with a crowd of sensations with which sober rationality has nothing to do.

We passed through Glensheal, with prodigious mountains on each side. We saw where the battle was fought, in the year 1719.2 Dr. Johnson owned he was now in a scene of as wild nature as he could see; but he corrected me sometimes in my inaccurate observations. "There," said I, "is a mountain like a cone." Johnson. "No, Sir, it would be called so in a book; and when a man comes to look at it, he sees it is not so. It is indeed pointed at the top; but one side of it is larger than the other."3 Another mountain I called immense. Johnson. "No; it is no more than a considerable protuberance."

We came to a rich green valley, comparatively

1 "Why, rather, Sleep, lyest thou in smoky cribs, Upon uneasy pallets stretching thee,
And hush'd with buzzing night-flies to thy slumber;
Then in the perfumed chambers of the great,
Under the canopys of costly state,
And full'd with sounds of sweetest melody?"

2 In 1719, Spain projected an invasion of Scotland in behalf of the Whig, and destined a great force for that purpose, under the command of the Duke of Ormond. But owing to storms, only three frigates, with three hundred or four hundred Spaniards on board, arrived in Scotland. They had with them the banished Earl of Seaforth, chief of the Mackenzies, a man of great power, exiled for his share in the rebellion of 1715. He raised a considerable body of Highlanders of his own and friendly clans, and disembarving the Spanish fleet called Glensheal, in the West Highlands. General Wightman marched against them from Inverness with a few regular forces, and several of the Great Chiefs, Macraes, and other clans friendly to government. He found the insurgents in possession of a very strong post called Strachal, from which, after a few days' skirmishing, they retired, Seaforth being alone with them; the latter being a man, and the others having several slain. But the Earl of Seaforth was dangerously wounded in the shoulder, and obliged to be carried back to the ships. His clan deserted or dispersed, and the Spaniards surrendered themselves prisoners of war to General Wightman. — WALTER SCOTT.

whatever may be their present state, were of considerable estimation in the year 1715, when there was a line in a song:

"And aw the brave M‘Craas are coming."

There was great diversity in the faces of the circle around us; some were as black and wild in their appearance as any American savages whatever. One woman was as comely almost as the figure of Sappho, as we see it painted. We asked the old woman, the mistress of the house where we had the milk (which, by the by, Dr. Johnson told me, for I did not observe it myself, was built not of turf, but of stone), what we should pay. She said what we pleased. One of our guides asked her, in Erse, if a shilling was enough. She said, "Yes." But some of the men bade her ask more. This vexed me; because it showed a desire to impose upon strangers, as they knew that even a shilling was high payment. The woman, however, honestly persisted in her first price; so I gave her half a crown. Thus we had one good scene of life uncommon to us. The people were very much pleased, gave us many blessings, and said they had not had such a day since the old Laird of Macleod’s time.

Dr. Johnson was much refreshed by this repast. He was pleased when I told him he would make a good chief. He said, "Were I a chief, I would dress my servants better than myself, and knock a fellow down if he looked saucy to a Macdonald in rags; but I would not treat men as brutes. I would let them know why all of my clan were to have attention paid to them. I would tell my upper servants why, and make them tell the others."

We rode on well, till we came to the high mountain called the Rattakin, by which time both Dr. Johnson and the horses were a good deal fatigued. It is a terrible steep to climb, notwithstanding the road is formed slanting along it; however, we made it out. On the top of it we met Captain Macleod, of Balmnoon (a Dutch officer who had come from Sky), riding with his sword sling across him. He asked, "Is this Mr. Boswell?" which was a proof that we were expected. Going down the hill on the other side was no easy task. As Dr. Johnson was a great weight, the two guides agreed that he should ride the horses alternately. Hay’s were the two best, and the Doctor would not ride but upon one or other of them, a black or a brown. But, as Hay complained much after ascending the Rattakin, the Doctor was prevailed with to mount one of Vass’s grays. As he rode upon it down hill, it did not go well, and he grumbled. I walked on a little before, but was excessively entertained with the method taken to keep him in good humour. Hay led the horse’s head, talking to Dr. Johnson as much as he could; and (having heard him, in the forenoon, express a pastoral pleasure on seeing the goats browsing) just when the Doctor was uttering his displeasure, the fellow cried, with a very Highland accent, "See, such pretty goats!"

But he whistled who! and made them jump. Little did he conceive what Dr. Johnson was. Here now was a common ignorant Highland clown imagining that he could divert, as one does a child, Dr. Samuel Johnson! The ludicrousness, absurdity, and extraordinary contrast between what the fellow fancied, and the reality, was truly comic.

It grew dusky; and we had a very tedious ride for what was called five miles, but I am sure would measure ten. We had no conversation. I was riding forward to the inn at Glenelg, on the shore opposite to Sky, that I might take proper measures, before Dr. Johnson, who was now advancing in dreamy silence, Hay leading his horse, should arrive. Vass also walked by the side of his horse, and Joseph followed behind. As, therefore, he was thus attended, and seemed to be in deep meditation, I thought there could be no harm in leaving him for a little while. He called me back with a tremendous shout, and was really in a passion with me for leaving him. I told him my intentions, but he was not satisfied, and said, "Do you know, I should as soon have thought of picking a pocket, as doing so," Boswell. "I am diverted with you, Sir." Johnson. "Sir, I could never be diverted with incivility. Doing such a thing makes one lose confidence in him who has done it, as one cannot tell what he may do next." His extraordinary warmth confounded me so much, that I justified myself but lamely to him; yet my intentions were not improper. I wished to get on, to see how we were to be lodged, and how we were to get a boat; all which I thought I could best settle myself, without his having any trouble. To apply his great mind to minute particulars is wrong; it is like taking an immense balance (such as is kept on quays for weighing cargoes of ships) to weigh a guinea. I knew I had neat little scales, which would do better; and that his attention to

1 The M‘Craas, or Macraes, were, since that time, brought into the King’s service, by the late Lord Seaforth. When they lay in Edinburgh Castle, in 1778, and were ordered to embark for Jersey, they, with a number of other men in the regiment, for different reasons, were separated. They afterwards learned that they were to be sold to the East India Company, though insisted not to be sent out of Great Britain without their own consent, being of a determined mind, and encamped upon the lofty mountain, Arthur’s Seat, where they remained three days and three nights, bidding defiance to all the force in Scotland. At last they came down, and embarked peacefully, having obtained formal articles of capitulation, signed by Sir Adolphus Oughton, commander-in-chief, General Skene, deputy commander, the Duke of Bucledagh, and the Earl of Dunmore, which quieted them. Since the secession of the Commons of Rome to the Mont Seer, a more spirited exertion has not been made. I gave great attention to it from first to last, and have drawn up a particular account of it. These brave fellows have since served their country equally at Jersey, and also in the East Indies, to which, after being better informed, they voluntarily agreed to go.—Boswell.

Mr. Macpherson observes that Boswell misquotes the "Cherabler’s muster-roll," in which the line is:

"And the wild Mac Ra’s comin."

See Hogg’s Jacobite Relics. —Croker.
everything which falls in his way, and his uncommon desire to be always in the right, would make him weigh, if he knew of the particulars: it was right, therefore, for me to weigh them, and let him have them only in effect. I, however, continued to ride by him, finding he wished I should do so.

As we passed the barracks at Bernera, I looked at them wishfully, as soldiers have always every thing in the best order; but there was only a sergeant and a few men there. We came on to the inn at Glenelg. There was no provender for our horses; so they were sent to grass, with a man to watch them. A maid showed us up stairs into a room damp and dirty, with bare walls, a variety of bad smells, a coarse black greasy fir table, and forms [benches] of the same kind; and out of a wretched bed started a fellow from his sleep, like Edgar in King Lear, "Poor Tom's a cold."

This inn was furnished with not a single article that we could either eat or drink; but Mr. Murchison, factor to the Laird of Macleod, in Glenelg, sent us a bottle of rum and some sugar, with a polite message, to acquaint us, that he was very sorry that he did not hear of us till we had passed his house, otherwise he should have insisted on our sleeping there that night; and that, if he were not obliged to set out for Inverness early next morning, he would have waited upon us. Such extraordinary attention from this gentleman, to entire strangers, deserves the most honourable commemoration.

Our bad accommodation here made me uneasy, and almost fretful. Dr. Johnson was calm. I said he was so from vanity. Johnson. "No, Sir; it is from philosophy." It pleased me to see that the Rambler could practise so well his own lessons.

I resumed the subject of my leaving him on the road, and endeavoured to defend it better. He was still violent upon that head, and said, "Sir, had you gone on, I was thinking that I should have returned with you to Edinburgh, and then have parted from you, and never spoken to you more."

I sent for fresh hay, with which we made beds for ourselves, each in a room equally miserable. Like Wolfe, we had a "a choice of difficulties." 2 Dr. Johnson made things easier by comparison. At McQueen's, last night, he observed, that few were so well lodged in a ship. To-night, he said, we were better than if we had been upon the hill. He lay down buttoned up in his great coat. I had my sheets spread on the hay, and my clothes and great coat laid over me, by way of blankets.3

1 It is amusing to observe the different images which this being presented to Dr. Johnson and me. The Doctor, in his "Journey," compares him to a Cyclops. — Boswell.

2 This phrase, now so common, excited some surprise and criticism when used by General Wolfe, in his despatch from before Quebec. See London Gazette Extraordinary, 15th October, 1759. — Chorner.

3 Johnson thus describes this scene to Mrs. Thrale: "I ordered hay to be laid thick upon the bed, and slept upon it in my great coat. Boswell laid sheets upon his bed, and reposed in linen, like a gentleman." — Letters. — Chorner.

mansion here having been burned in Sir Donald Macdonald’s time.\(^1\)

(The most ancient seat of the chief of the Macdonalds in the Isle of Sky was at Dunluth, where there are the remains of a stately castle. The principal residence of the family is now at Mugstot, at which there is a considerable building. Sir Alexander and Lady Macdonald had come to Armidale in their way to Edinburgh, where it was necessary for them to be soon after this time.

Armidale is situated on a pretty bay of the narrow sea, which flows between the main land of Scotland and the Isle of Sky. In front there is a grand prospect of the rude mounds of Moidart and Knoiart. Behind are hills gently rising and covered with a finer verdure than I expected to see in this climate, and the scene is enlivened by a number of little clear brooks.)

[Instead of finding the head of the Macdonalds surrounded with his clan, and a festive entertainment, we had a small company, and cannot boast of our cheer. The particulars are minut ed in my “Journal,” but I shall not trouble the public with them. I shall mention but one characteristic circumstance. My shrewd and hearty friend, Sir Thomas (Wentworth) Blacket, Lady Macdonald’s uncle, who had preceded us in a visit to this chief, upon being asked by him, if the punch-bowl, then upon the table, was not a very handsome one, replied, “Yes, if it were full.”]

Sir Alexander Macdonald having been an Eton scholar\(^2\), and being a gentleman of talents, Dr. Johnson had been very well pleased with him in London. But my fellow-traveller and I knew full of the old Highland spirit, and were dissatisfied at hearing [heavy complaints] of rents raked, and [the people driven to] emigration; and finding a chief not surrounded by his clan, Dr. Johnson said, “It grieves me to see the chief of a great clan appear to such disadvantage. This gentleman has talents, nay, some learning; but he is totally unfit for his situation.” I meditated an escape from this house the very next day; but Dr. Johnson resolved that we should weather it out till Monday. He said, “Sir, the Highland chiefs should not be allowed to go farther south than Aberdeen. A strong-minded man, like [his brother] Sir James Macdonald, may be improved by an English education; but in general they will be tamed into insignificance.”

We found here Mr. James of Aberdeenshire, a naturalist. Janes said he had been at Dr. Johnson’s in London, with Ferguson the astronomer, Johnson. “It is strange that, in such distant places, I should meet with any one who knows me. I should have thought I might hide myself in Sky.”

Friday, Sept. 3. — This day proving wet, we should have passed our time very uncomfortably, had we not found in the house two chests of books, which we eagerly ransacked. After dinner, when I alone was left at table with the few Highland gentlemen who were of the company, having talked\(^3\) with very high respect of Sir James Macdonald, they were all so much affected as to shed tears. One of them was Mr. Donald Macdonald, who had been lieutenant of grenadiers in the Highland regiment, raised by Colonel Montgomery, now Earl of Eglinton, in the war before last; one of those regiments which the late Lord Chatham prided himself in having brought from the mountains of the north;\(^4\) by doing which he contributed to extinguish in the Highlands the remains of disaffection to the present royal family. From this gentleman’s conversation, I first learnt how very popular his clan was among the Highlanders; of which I had such continued proofs, during the whole course of my Tour, that on my return I could not help telling the noble Earl himself, that I did not before know how great a man he was.

We were advised by some persons here to visit Basay, in our way to Dunvegan, the seat of the Laird of Macleod. Being informed that the Rev. Mr. Donald M’Queen was the most intelligent man in Sky, and having been favoured with a letter of introduction to him, by the learned Sir James Foulis,\(^4\) I sent it to \(^1\) Here commence the variances between the first and second editions of Boswell’s Tour which deserve to be particularly noted. The paragraphs between ( ) were inserted by Mr. Boswell in the second edition to fill the space of those between [ ], which were in the first edition, and omitted in the second. In the first of these substituted paragraphs, Boswell says, that Sir Alexander and his lady \(\bigcirc\) came to Armidale on their way to Edinburgh, where it was necessary they should be; \(\bigcirc\) but both Boswell and Dr. Johnson really believed that they had come to this hovel, to escape the necessity of entertaining the visitors at their usual residence, Johnson, in a letter to Mrs. Thrale, says: “We had a passage of about twelve miles to the point where [Sir A. Macdonald] resides. We dined from his seat, in the middle of the island, to a small house on the shore, as we believe, that he might with less reproach entertain us mauly. If he aspired tomanners, his retrograde action was completely gratified; but he did not succeed equally in escaping reproach. He had no cook, nor I suppose much provision; nor had the lady a mobus of her usual December; we picked our sugar with our fingers. Boswell was very angry, and reproached him with his impious parsimony.” — And again: “I have done thinking of [Sir Alexander], whom we now call Sir Sawney; he has disregarded all mankind by injudicious parsimony, and given occasion to so many stories, that Boswell has some thoughts of collecting them, and making a novel of his life.” — Letters. These passages, and the extracts from the first edition, leave no doubt as to the real purposes of the narration. The alteration was made in the edition, and parsonsious landlord and chieftain, which the reader will find in the subsequent parts of the Tour. It was said at the time that Boswell was induced to make these alterations and suppressions by a hostile remonstrance from Sir A. Macdonald. — See post, p. 408, n. 3. CROKER.

\(^2\) See his Latin verses addressed to Dr. Johnson, in the Appendix. — Boswell. Indifferent, and, indeed, unfeltible, as these verses are, they probably suggested to Johnson the writing those Latin verses in Sige and Jack-Kennish, which we shall see presently. — CROKER.

\(^3\) Here, in the first edition, was a leaf cancelled, which, no doubt, contained some strictures on Sir Alexander Macdonald’s want of hospitality and spirit, still stronger than those which were permitted to appear. — CROKER.

\(^4\) Sir Colliston, R.D., was a man of an ancient family, a good scholar, and a hard student; duly imbued with a large share both of Scottish shrewdness and Scottish prejudice. His property, his income at least, was very moderate. Others might have increased it in a voyage him by an express, and requested he would meet us at Rasay; and at the same time enclosed a letter to the Laird of Macleod, informing him that we intended in a few days to have the honour of waiting on him at Dunvegan.

Dr. Johnson this day endeavoured to obtain some knowledge of the state of the country; but complained that he could get no distinct information about anything, from those with whom he conversed.

Saturday, Sept. 4. — My endeavours to rouse the English-bred chieflain, in whose house we were, to the feudal and patriarchal feelings, proving ineffectual, Dr. Johnson this morning tried to bring him to our way of thinking. Johnson. "Were I in your place, Sir, in seven years I would make this an independent island. I would roast oxen whole, and hang out a flag as a signal to the Macdonalds, to come and get beef and whiskey." Sir Alexander was still starting difficulties. Johnson. "Nay, Sir; if you are born to object, I have done with you. Sir, I would have a magazine of arms." Sir Alexander. "They would rust." Johnson. "Let there be men to keep them clean. Your ancestors did not use to let their arms rust."

We attempted in vain to communicate to him a portion of our enthusiasm. He bore with so polite a good-nature our warm, and what some might call Gothic, expostulations on this subject, that I should not forgive myself were I to record all that Dr. Johnson's ardour led him to say. This day was little better than a blank.

Sunday, Sept. 5. — I walked to the parish church of Slate, which is a very poor one. There are no church bells in the island. I was told there were once some; what became of them, I could not learn. The minister not being at home, there was no service. I went into the church, and saw the monument of Sir James Macdonald, which was elegantly executed at Rome, and has an inscription, written by his friend, George Lord Lyttleton.

Dr. Johnson said, the inscription should have been in Latin, as every thing intended to be universal and permanent should be. This being a beautiful day, my spirits were cheered by the mere effect of climate. I had felt a return of spleen during my stay at Armidale, and had it not been that I had Dr. Johnson to contemplate, I should have sunk into dejection; but his firmness supported me. I looked at him, as a man whose head is turning giddily at sea looks at a rock, or any fixed object. I wondered at his tranquillity. He said, "Sir, when a man retires into an island, he is to turn his thoughts entirely to another world. He has done with this." Boswell. "It appears to me, Sir, to be very difficult to unite a due attention to this world, and that which is to come; for, if we engage eagerly in the affairs of life, we are apt to be totally forgetful of a future state; and, on the other hand, a steady contemplation of the awful concerns of eternity renders all objects here so insignificant, as to make us indifferent and negligent about them. Johnson. "Sir, Dr. Cheyne has laid down a rule to himself on this subject, which should be imprinted on every mind: 'To neglect nothing to secure my eternal peace, more than if I had been certified I should die within the day; nor to mind anything that my secular obligations and duties demanded of me, less than if I had been insured to live fifty years more.'"

I must here observe, that though Dr. Johnson appeared now to be philosophically calm, yet his genius did not shine forth as in companies, where I have listened to him with admiration. The vigour of his mind was, however, sufficiently manifested, by his discovering no symptoms of feeble relaxation in the dull, "weary, flat, and unprofitable" state in which we now were placed.

I am inclined to think that it was on this day he composed the following Ode upon the Isle of Sky, which a few days afterwards he showed me at Rasay: —

"ODA.

Ponti profundis clausa recessibus,
Strepens procellis, rupibus obista,
Quam grata defesso virament Skia sinum nebulosa pandis.

"His cura, credo, sedibus exulat;
His blandae pax habitat locis:
Non ira, non moror quietis
Insidias meditatur horis.

For which, as well as two letters, written by Sir James, in his last illness, to his mother, see Appendix. — Boswell."

3 What a strange perversion of language! universal! Why, if one had been in Latin, so far from being universally understood, it would have been an utter blank to one (the latter) half of the creation, and even of the men who might visit it, ninety-nine will understand it in English for one who could in Latin. Something may be said for epitaphs and inscriptions addressed, as it were, to the world at large — a triumphal arch — the pillar at Blenheim — a monument at Waterloo; but a Latin epitaph, in an English church, appears, in principle, as absurd as the dinner, which the doctor gives in Peregrine Pickle, after the manner of the ancients. A mortal may surely be well satisfied if his fame lasts as long as the language in which he spoke or wrote. — Croker.

After supper, Dr. Johnson told us, that Isaac Hawkins Browne drank freely for thirty years, and that he wrote his poem, "De Animis Immortalitate," in some of the last of these years. I listened to this with the eagerness of one, who, conscious of being himself fond of wine, is glad to hear that a man of so much genius and good thinking as Browne had the same propensity.

Monday, Sept. 6. — We set out, accompanied by Mr. Donald M'Loud, late of Canna, as our guide. We rode for some time along the district of Slate, near the shore. The houses in general are made of turf, covered with grass. The country seemed well peopled. We came into the district of Strath, and passed along a wild moorish tract of land till we arrived at the shore. There we found good verdure, and some curious whin-rocks, or collections of stones, like the ruins of the foundations of old buildings. We saw also three cairns of considerable size. About a mile beyond Broadfoot is Corriechatachin, a farm of Sir Alexander Macdonald's, possessed by Mr. M'Kinnon, who received us with a hearty welcome, as did his wife, who was what we call in Scotland a lady-like woman. Mr. Pennant, in the course of his tour to the Hebrides, passed two nights at this gentleman's house. On its being mentioned, that a present had here been made to him of a curious specimen of Highland antiquity, Dr. Johnson said, "Sir, it was more than he deserved; the dog is a Whig." We here enjoyed the comfort of a table plentifully furnished, the satisfaction of which was heightened by a numerous and cheerful company; and we, for the first time, had a specimen of the joyous social manners of the inhabitants of the Highlands. They talked in their own ancient language, with fluent vivacity, and sung many Erse songs with such spirit, that, though Dr. Johnson was treated with the greatest respect and attention, there were moments in which he seemed to be forgotten. For myself, though but a Lowlander, having picked up a few words of the language, I presumed to mingle in their mirth, and joined in the choruses with as much glee as any of the company. Dr. Johnson, being fatigued with his journey, retired early to his chamber, where he composed the following Ode, addressed to Mrs. Thrale:

"ODA.

Permeo terras, ubi nuda rupe
Saxae miseret nubulis ruinas, Torva ubi rident steriles coloni Rura labores.

decorated with them, by Sir James Grant, Sir Allan M'Lean. The other Highland gentlemen, of landed property, are decorated by their estates, as Rassay, Boudal; and the Hebrides, and Clochad, by the title of Ladies. The gentry, or principal tenants, are named by their farms, as Kingsburgh, Corriechatachin; and their wives are called the mistresses of Kingsburgh, the lady Thrale, and Corriechatachin. Having given this explanation, I am at liberty to use that mode of speech which generally prevails in the Highlands and the Hebrides. — Boswell.

1 Various readings. — Line 2. In the manuscript, Dr. Johnson, instead of rupestris obita, had written imbribus unda, and undulis undaris, but struck them both out. Instead of lines 10 and 11, he had written, but afterwards struck out, the following:

Parar posse, utcumque jactur Grandioquos nimis alta Zeno.— Boswell.

It is very curious that in all the editions of Johnson's Works, which I have seen, even down to the Oxford edition of 1829, this poem is given with certain variations, which seem unintelligible. The first amendment, noted by Mr. Boswell, "obita rupestris" is adopted, but the second is not, and the two lines rejected by Dr. Johnson are replaced: the words "et scupulo," in the 12th line, are changed into "in speculam," and in the penultimate line, "surgunt," is altered to "scuturn." In the last line too, "residunt" is printed for "resident." These last variations look like mere errors of the press; but it is possible that Johnson, a poet in Latin poetry has been so little attended to, that the public has been, for forty years past, acquiescing in what appears to be stark nonsense? It seems wonderful that Mr. Murphy (who was himself a Latin poet) and the late Oxford editor should have overlooked these errors. — Croker.

4 That my readers may have my narrative in the style of the country through which I was then passing, it is proper to inform them, that the chief of a clan is denominated by his surname alone, as M'CLeod, M'Kinnon, M'Intosh. To prefix Mr. to the name is a sign of respect; but when I say that what is proper to inform him, that the chief of a clan is denominated by his surname alone, as M'CLeod, M'Kinnon, M'Intosh. To prefix Mr. to the name is a sign of respect; but when I say that what is proper to inform him of such a person as was then passing through the Highlands, and was not acquainted with the Doctor's gratitude to his friends in Sky, the classical reader will not have failed to observe how much his taste, and perhaps his genius, has improved since the days of the ode "Ae Uriannum," and the epigrams to Sonaca and Eliza.

5 Mr. Boswell does not do full justice to Dr. Johnson, when he leaves it in doubt, whether this was not said (as surely it was) in a spirit of jocularity. Johnson seems to have had a regard for Pennant. See p. 329. — Croker.

6 About fourteen years since, I landed in Sky, with a party of friends, and had the curiosity to ask what was the first idea on every one's mind at landing. All answered separately that it was this Ode. — Walter Scott, 1829.

Sir Walter appended this note to the Ode to Mrs. Thrale, but I should rather suppose that it was the preceding Ode in Sky which he and his Scotch friends recollected with pleasure. Surely, after the jocund and hospitable scene just described, the "vena rura," the "humannus ferus," the "vita nullo decorata culta," and the "aquae inundam," were not grateful. The "ignarus stregus locupletus" is a very striking exception to the general rule which says, that the more a man sallies forth to the business of life, the less he is capable of receiving the benefit of the Doctor's gratitude to his friends in Sky, the classical reader will not have failed to observe how much his taste, and perhaps his genius, has improved since the days of the ode "Ae Uriannum," and the epigrams to Sonaca and Eliza. His verses in "La Théâtre," and those in Sky and InchiKenneth, and this one to Mrs. Thrale, are Corriechatachin still liable to many criticisms, more natural in their thoughts, and more easy in their expressions, than his earlier attempts in this line. — Croker.

"Scriptum in Skia, 6th Sept. 1773."

Tuesday, Sept. 7. — Dr. Johnson was much pleased with his entertainment here. There were many good books in the house: Hector Boethius in Latin; Cave's Lives of the Fathers; Baker's Chronicle; Jeremy Collier's Church History; Dr. Johnson's small Dictionary; Craufurd's Officers of State, and several more; — a mezzotinto of Mrs. Brooks the actress (by some strange chance in Sky 1); and also a print of Macdonald of Clamanald, with a Latin inscription about the cruelties after the battle of Culloden, which will never be forgotten.

It was a very wet stormy day; we were therefore obliged to remain here, it being impossible to cross the sea to Rasay.

I employed a part of the forenoon in writing this journal. The rest of it was somewhat dreary, from the gloominess of the weather, and the uncertain state which we were in, as we could not tell but it might clear up every hour. Nothing is more painful to the mind than a state of suspense, especially when it depends upon the weather, concerning which there can be so little calculation. As Dr. Johnson said of our weariness on the Monday at Aberdeen, "Sensation is sensation:" Corrachtachin, which was last night a hospitable house, was, in my mind, changed to-day into a prison. After dinner I read some of Dr. Macpherson's "Dissertations on the Ancient Caledonians." I was disgusted by the unsatisfactory conjectures as to antiquity, before the days of record. I was happy when tea came. Such, I take it, is the state of those who live in the country. 2 Meals are wished for from the cravings of vacuity of mind, as well as from the desire of eating. I was hurt to find even such a temporary foehness, and that I was so far from being that robust wise man who is sufficient for his own happiness. I felt a kind of lethargy of indolence. I did not exert myself to get Dr. Johnson to talk, that I might not have the labour of writing down his conversation. He inquired here, if there were any remains of the second sight. Mr. [Martin] Macpherson, minister of Slate, said, he was resolved not to believe it, because it was founded on no principle. Johnson. "There are many things then, which we are sure are true, that you will not believe. What principle is there, why a loadstone attracts iron? why an egg produces a chicken by heat? why a tree grows upwards, when the natural tendency of all things is downwards? Sir, it depends upon the degree of evidence that you have." Young Mr. M'Kinnon mentioned one M'Kenzie, who is still alive, who had often fainted in his presence, and when he recovered, mentioned visions which had been presented to him. He told Mr. M'Kinnon, that at such a place he should meet a funeral, and that such and such people would be the bearers, naming four; and three weeks afterwards he saw what M'Kenzie had predicted. The naming the very spot in a country where a funeral comes a long way, and the very people as bearers, when there are so many out of whom a choice may be made, seems extraordinary. We should have sent for M'Kenzie, had we not been informed that he could speak no English. Besides, the facts were not related with sufficient accuracy.

Mrs. M'Kinnon, who is a daughter of old Kingsburgh (a Macdonald), told us that her father was one day riding in Sky, and some women, who were at work in a field on the side of the road, said to him, they had heard two twischs (that is, two voices of persons about to die), and what was remarkable, one of them was an English twisch, which they never heard before. When he returned, he at that very place met two funerals, and one of them was that of a woman who had come from the main land, and could speak only English. This, she remarked, made a great impression upon her father.

How all the people here were lodged, I know not. It was partly done by separating man and wife, and putting a number of men in one room, and of women in another.

Wednesday, Sept. 8. — When I waked, the rain was much heavier than yesterday; but the wind had abated. By breakfast, the day was better, and in a little while it was calm and clear. I felt my spirits much elated. The propriety of the expression, "the sunshine of the breast," 3 now struck me with peculiar

1 Mrs. Brooks's father was a Scotchman of the name of Watson, who lost his property, and fled his country, for the Stuart cause, in 1745. Her portrait would naturally enough be found in such company. — Croker.
2 Mr. Boswell should have recollected, that he and Dr. Johnson were probably the only persons of the party who had nothing to do. A country gentleman's life would be miserable, if he had no more business or interest in the scenes around him than the visitor of a few days at a stranger's house can have. M'Kinnon would probably have been more, and with more reason, enraged in Bolt Court, than Johnson and Boswell were at Corrinachtachin. — Croker.
3 Gray's Ode on the Prospect of Eton College. No poet has, in proportion to the quantity of his works, furnished force; for the brilliant rays penetrated into my very soul. We were all in better humour than before. Mrs. M'Kinnon, with unaffected hospitality and politeness, expressed her happiness in having such company in her house, and appeared to understand and relish Dr. Johnson's conversation; as indeed all the company seemed to do. When I knew she was old Kingsburgh's daughter, I did not wonder at the good appearance which she made.

She talked as if her husband and family would emigrate, rather than be oppressed by their landlord; and said, "how agreeable would it be, if these gentlemen should come in upon us when we are in America." Somebody observed, that Sir Alexander Macdonald was always frightened at sea. Johnson. "He is frightened at sea; and his tenants are frightened when he comes to land."

We resolved to set out directly after breakfast. We had about two miles to ride to the sea side, and there we expected to get one of the boats belonging to the fleet of bounty herring-busses then on the coast, or at least a good country fishing boat. But while we were preparing to set out, there arrived a man with the following card from the Rev. Mr. Donald McQueen:

"Mr. McQueen's compliments to Mr. Boswell, and begs leave to acquaint him that, fearing the want of a proper boat, as much as the rain of yesterday, might have caused a stop, he is now at Skianwen with Macgillichybalchum's carriage, to convey him and Dr. Johnson to Rasay, where they will meet with a most hearty welcome, and where Macleod, being on a visit, now attends their motions."

"Wednesday afternoon."

This card was most agreeable; it was a prologue to that hospitable and truly polite reception which we found at Rasay. In a little while arrived Mr. Donald McQueen himself; a decent minister, an elderly man with his hair black and white, and rather slow of speech, but candid, sensible, and well informed, nay learned. Along with him came, as our pilot, a gentleman whom I had a great desire to see, Mr. Malcolm Macleod, one of the Rasay family, celebrated in the year 1745-6. He was now sixty-two years of age, hale, and well proportioned,—with a manly countenance, tanned by the weather, yet having a ruddiness in his cheeks, over a great part of which his rough beard extended. His eye was quick and lively, yet his look was not fierce, but he appeared at once firm and good humoured. He wore a pair of brogues; tartan hose which came up only near to his knees, and left them bare; a purple camblet kilt; a black waistcoat; a short green cloth coat bound with gold cord; a yellowish bushy wig; a large blue bonnet with a gold thread button. I never saw a figure that gave a more perfect representation of a Highland gentleman. I wished much to have a picture of him just as he was. I found him frank and polite, in the true sense of the word.

The good family at Corrichatachalin said they hoped to see us on our return. We rode down to the shore; but Malcolm walked with graceful agility.

We got into Rasay's carriage, which was a good strong open boat made in Norway. The wind had now risen pretty high, and was against us; but we had four stout rowers, particularly a Macleod, a robust, black-haired fellow, half naked, and bareheaded, something between a wild Indian and an English tar. Dr. Johnson sat high on the stern, like a magnificent Triton. Malcolm sung an Erse song, the chorus of which was "Hatyn foam foam err," with words of his own. The tune resembled "Over the main among the heather." The boatmen and Mr. McQueen choroused, and all went well. At length Malcolm himself took an oar, and rowed vigorously. We sailed along the coast of Scalpa, a rugged island, about four miles in length. Dr. Johnson proposed that he and I should buy it, and found a good school, and an episcopal church (Malcolm said he would come to it), and have a printing-press, where he would print all the Erse that could be found.

Here I was strongly struck with our long projected scheme of visiting the Hebrides being realised. I called to him, "We are contending with seas," which I think were the words of one of his letters to me. "Not much," said he; and though the wind made the sea lash considerably upon us, he was not discomposed. After we were out of the shelter of Scalpa, and in the sound between it and Itasay, which extended about a league, the wind made the sea very rough. I did not like it. Johnson. "This now is the Atlantic. If I should tell, at a tea-table in London, that I have crossed the Atlantic in an open boat, how they'd shudder, and what a fool they'd think me to expose myself to such danger!"

He then repeated Horace's Ode—

"Otium divos rotat in patenti Prensus Egeo—" 1

In the confusion and hurry of this boisterous sail, Dr. Johnson's spurs, of which Joseph had charge, were carried overboard into the sea, and lost. This was the first misfortune that had befallen us. Dr. Johnson was a little angry at first, observing that "there was something wild in letting a pair of spurs be carried into the sea out of a boat;" but then he remarked "that, as Janes the naturalist had said upon losing his pocket-book, it was rather an inconvenience than a loss." He told us he now recollected that he dreamt the night before, that he put his staff into a river, and chanced to let it go, and it was carried down the stream and lost. "So now you see," said he, "that I have lost my spurs; and this story is better than many of those which we have concerning second sight and dreams." 2 Mr. M'Queen said he did not believe the second sight; that he never met with any well-attested instances; and if he should, he should impute them to chance; because all who pretend to that quality often fail in their predictions, though they take a great scope, and sometimes interpret literally, sometimes figuratively, so as to suit the events. He told us that, since he came to be minister of the parish where he now is, the belief of witchcraft, or charms, was very common, insomuch that he had many prosecutions before his session (the parochial ecclesiastical court) against women, for having by these means carried off the milk from people's cows. He disregarded them; and there is not now the least vestige of that superstition. He preached against it; and in order to give a strong proof to the people that there was nothing in it, he said from the pulpit, that every woman in the parish was welcome to take the milk from his cows, provided she did not touch them. 3 Dr. Johnson asked him as to Fingal. He said he could repeat some passages in the original; that he heard his grandfather had a copy of it; but that he could not affirm that Ossian composed all that poem as it is now published. This came pretty much to what Dr. Johnson had maintained 4; though he goes farther, and contends that it is no better than such an epic poem as he could make from the song of Robin Hood; that is to say, that, except a few passages, there is nothing truly ancient but the names and some vague traditions. Mr. M'Queen alleged that Homer was made up of detached fragments. Dr. Johnson denied this; observing, that it had been one work originally, and that you could not put a book of the Iliad out of its place; and he believed the same might be said of the Odyssey.

The approach to Rasay was very pleasing. We saw before us a beautiful bay, well defended by a rocky coast; a good family mansion; a fine verdure about it, with a considerable number of trees; and beyond it hills and mountains in gradation of wildness. Our boatmen sang with great spirit. Dr. Johnson observed, that naval music was very ancient. As we came near the shore, the singing of our rowers was succeeded by that of reapers, who were busy at work, and who seemed to shout as much as to sing, while they worked with a bounding activity. Just as we landed, I observed a cross, or rather the ruins of one, upon a rock, which had to me a pleasing vestige of religion. I perceived a large company coming out from the house. We met them as we walked up. There were Rasay himself; his brother Dr. Macleod, his nephew the Laird of M'Kinnon; the Laird of Macleod; Colonel Macleod of Talisker, an officer in the Dutch service, a very genteel man, and a faithful branch of the family; a Mr. Macleod of Muir-ravenside, best known by the name of Sandie Macleod, who was long in exile on account of the part which he took in 1745; and several other persons. We were welcomed upon the green, and conducted into the house, where we were introduced to Lady Rasay, who was surrounded by a numerous family, consisting of three sons and ten daughters. 5 The Laird of Rasay is a sensible, polite, and most hospitable gentleman. I was told that his island of Rasay, and that of Rona (from which the eldest son of the family has his title), and a considerable extent of land which he has in Sky, do not altogether yield him a very large revenue; 6 and yet he lives in great splendour; and so far is he from distressing his people, that, in the present rage for emigration, not a man has left his estate.

It was past six o'clock when we arrived. Some excellent brandy was served round immediately, according to the custom of the Highlands, where a dram is generally taken every day. They call it a scooch. On a side-board was placed for us, who had come off the sea, a substantial dinner, and a variety of wines. Then we had coffee and tea. I observed in the room several elegantly bound books and other marks of improved life. Soon afterwards a fiddler appeared, and a little ball began. Rasay himself danced with as much spirit as any man, and Malcolm bounded like a roe. Sandle MacLeod, who has at times an excessive flow of spirits, and had it now, was, in his days of absconding, known by the name of *McCruslick*¹, which it seems was the designation of a kind of wild man in the Highlands something between Proteus and Don Quixote; and so he was called here. He made much jovial noise. Dr. Johnson was so delighted with this scene, that he said, “I know not how we shall get away.” It entertained me to observe him sitting by, while we danced, sometimes in deep meditation, sometimes smiling complacently, sometimes looking upon Hooke’s Roman History, and sometimes talking a little, amidst the noise of the ball, to Mr. Donald McQueen, who anxiously gathered knowledge from him. He was pleased with McQueen, and said to me, “This is a critical man, Sir. There must be great vigour of mind to make him cultivate learning so much in the isle of Sky, where he might do without it. It is wonderful how many of the new publications he has. There must be a snatch of every opportunity.” Mr. McQueen told me that his brother (who is the fourth generation of the family following each other as ministers of the parish of Snizort) and he joined together, and bought from time to time such books as had reputation. Soon after we came in, a black cock and gray hen, which had been shot, were shown, with their feathers on, to Dr. Johnson, who had never seen that species of bird before. We had a company of thirty at supper; and all was good humour and gaiety, without intemperance.

Thursday, Sept. 9. — At breakfast this morning, among a profusion of other things, there were oatcakes, made of what is called graddaning meal, that is, meal made of grain separated from the husks, and toasted by fire, instead of being threshed and kiln-dried. This seems to be bad management, as so much fodder is consumed by it. Mr McQueen however defended it, by saying, that it is doing the thing much quicker, as one operation effects what is otherwise done by two. His chief reason however was, that the servants in Sky are, according to him, a faithless pack, and steal what they can; so that much is saved by the corn passing but once through their hands, as at each time they pilfer some. It appears to me, that the graddaning is a strong proof of the laziness of the Highlanders, who will rather make fire act for them, at the expense of fodder, than labour themselves. There was also, what I cannot help disliking at breakfast, cheese: it is the custom over all the Highlands to have it; and it often smells very strong, and poisons to a certain degree the elegance of an Indian repast.² The day was showery; however, Rasay and I took a walk, and had some cordial conversation. I conceived a more than ordinary regard for this worthy gentleman. His family has possessed this island above four hundred years. It is the remains of the estate of Macleod of Lewis, whom he represents. When we returned, Dr. Johnson walked with us to see the old chapel. He was in fine spirits. He said, “This is truly the patriarchal life: this is what we came to find.”

After dinner, McCruslick, Malcolm, and I went out with guns, to try if we could find any black-cock; but we had no sport, owing to a heavy rain. I saw here what is called a Danish fort. Our evening was passed as last night was. One of our company,³ I was told, had hurt himself by too much study, particularly of infidel metaphysicians, of which he gave a proof on second sight being mentioned. He immediately retailed some of the fallacious arguments of Voltaire and Hume against miracles in general. Infidelity in a Highland gentleman appeared to me peculiarly offensive. I was sorry for him, as he had otherwise a good character. I told Dr. Johnson that he had studied himself into infidelity. Johnson. “Then he must study himself out of it again; that is the way. Drinking largely will sober him again.”

Friday, Sept. 10. — Having resolved to explore the island of Rasay, which could be done only on foot, I last night obtained my fellow-traveller’s permission to leave him for a day, he being unable to take so hard a walk. Old Mr. Malcolm Macleod, who had obligingly promised to accompany me, was at my bedside between five and six. I sprang up immediately; and he and I, attended by two other gentlemen, traversed the country during the whole of this day. Though we had passed over not less than four and twenty miles of very rugged ground, and had a Highland dance on the top of Dun Can, the highest mountain in the island, we returned in the evening not at all fatigued, and piqued ourselves at not being outdone at the nightly ball by our less active friends, who had remained at home.

¹ Alexander Macleod, of Muiravisdale, advocate, became extremely obnoxious to government by his zealous personal efforts to engage his chief Macleod, and Macdonald of Sky, in the Chevalier’s attempts of 1745. Had he succeeded, it would have added one third at least to the Jacobite army. Boswell has oddly described McCruslick, the being whose name was conferred upon this gentleman, as something between Proteus and Don Quixote. It is the name of a species of satyr, or esprit follet, a sort of mountain Puck or hobgoblin, seen among the wilds and mountains, as the old Highlanders believed, sometimes mischievous, sometimes virtuous. Boswell says it originated from the Scotch word scurrilous. — Scott. ² Mr. Boswell remarks that there were breakfasts before the Indian luxuries of tea and sugar had been introduced; these were the introducers, the Crooks. ³ Sir Walter Scott thought this was Taitsker, but he was certainly mistaken. Mr. William Macpherson satisfied me, that the gentleman alluded to was the Laird of Mackinnon. — Crooks. 1833.

My survey of Rasay did not furnish much which can interest my readers; I shall therefore put into as short a compass as I can the observations upon it, which I find registered in my journal. It is about fifteen English miles long and four broad. On the south side is the Laird's family seat, situated on a pleasing low spot. The old tower of three stories, mentioned by Martin, was taken down soon after 1748, and a modern house supplies its place. There are very good field and corn-lands about it, well-dressed. I observed, however, hardly any inclosures, except a good garden plentifully stocked with vegetables, and strawberries, raspberries, currants, &c.

On one of the rocks just where we landed, which are not high, there is rudely carved a square, with a crucifix in the middle. Here, it is said, the Laird of Rasay, in old times, used to offer up their devotions. I could not approach the spot without a grateful recollection of the event commemorated by this symbol.

A little from the shore, westward, is a kind of subterraneous house. There has been a natural fissure, or separation of the rock, running towards the sea, which has been roofed over with long stones, and above them turf has been laid. In that place the inhabitants used to keep their oars. There are a number of trees near the house, which grow well; some of them of a pretty good size. They are mostly plane and ash. A little to the west of the house is an old ruined chapel, unroofed, which never has been very curious. We saw some human bones of an uncommon size. There was a heel-bone, in particular, which Dr. Macleod said was such, that if the foot was in proportion, it must have been twenty-seven inches long. Dr. Johnson would not look at the bones. He started back from them with a striking appearance of horror. 1 Mr. M'Queen told us, it was formerly much the custom, in these isles, to have human bones lying above ground, especially in the windows of churches. 2

On the south of the chapel is the family burying-place. Above the door, on the east end of it, is a small bust or image of the Virgin Mary, carved upon a stone which makes part of the wall. There is no church upon the island. It is annexed to one of the parishes of Sky; and the minister comes and preaches either in Rasay's house or some other house, on certain Sundays. I could not but value the family seat more, for having even the ruins of a chapel close to it. There was something comfortable in the thought of being so near a piece of consecrated ground. Dr. Johnson said, "I look with reverence upon every place that has been set apart for religion;" and he kept off his hat while he was within the walls of the chapel.

The eight crosses, which Martin mentions as pyramids for deceased ladies, stood in a semicircular line, which contained within it the chapel. They marked out the boundaries of the sacred territory within which an asylum was to be had. One of them, which we observed upon our landing, made the first point of the semicircle. There are few of them now remaining. A good way farther north, there is a row of buildings about four feet high: they run from the shore on the east along the top of a pretty high eminence, and so down to the shore on the west, in much the same direction with the crosses. Rasay took them to be the marks for the asylum; but Malcolm thought them to be false sentinels, a common deception, of which instances occur in Martin, to make invaders imagine an island better guarded. Mr. Donald M'Queen justly, in my opinion, supposed the crosses which form the inner circle to be the church's landmarks.

The south end of the island is much covered with large stones or rocky strata. The Laird has enclosed and planted part of it with firs, and he showed me a considerable space marked out for additional plantations.

Dun Can is a mountain three computed miles from the Laird's house. The ascent to it is by consecutive risings, if that expression may be used when valleys intervene, so that there is but a short rise at once; but it is certainly very high above the sea. The palm of altitude is disputed for by the people of Rasay and those of Sky; the former contending for Dun Can, the latter for the mountains in Sky, over against it. We went up the east side of Dun Can pretty easily. It is mostly rocks all around, the points of which hem the summit of it. Sailors, to whom it was a good object as they pass along, call it Rasay's cap. Before we reached this mountain, we passed by two lakes. Of the first Malcolm told me a strange fabulous tradition. He said, there was a wild beast in it, a sea-horse, which came and devoured a man's daughter; upon which the man lighted a great fire, and had a sow roasted at it, the smell of which attracted the monster.

1 Lord Stowell told me, that on the road from Newcastle to Berwick, Dr. Johnson and he passed a cottage, at the entrance of which were set up two of those great bones of the whale, which are not unfrequently seen in maritime districts. Johnson expressed great horror at the sight of these bones; and called the people, who could use such relics of mortality as an ornament, mere savages. — Croker.

2 It is perhaps a Celtic custom; for I observed it in Ireland occasionally, especially at [the ruined abbey church on] the celebrated promontory of Muirius, at Killarney. — WALTER SCOTT.
In the fire was put a spit. The man lay concealed behind a low wall of loose stones, and he had an avenue formed for the monster, with two rows of large flat stones, which extended from the fire over the summit of the hill, till it reached the side of the Loch. The monster came, and the man with the red-hot spit destroyed it. Malcolm showed me the little hiding place and the rows of stones. He did not laugh when he told this story. I recollect having seen in the Scots Magazine, several years ago, a poem upon a similar tale, perhaps the same translated from the Erse, or Irish, called "Albin and the Daughter of Mey."

There is a large tract of land, possessed as a common, in Rasay. They have no regulations as to the number of cattle; every man puts upon it as many as he chooses. From Dun Can northward, till you reach the other end of the island, there is much good natural pasture, unenumerated by stones. We passed over a spot which is appropriated for the exercising ground. In 1745, a hundred fighting men were reviewed here, as Malcolm told me, who was one of the officers that led them to the field. They returned home all but about fourteen. What a princely thing is it to be able to furnish such a band! Rasay has the true spirit of a chief. He is, without exaggeration, a father to his people.

There is plenty of limestone in the island, a great quarry of freestone, and some natural woods, but none of any age, as they cut the trees for common country uses. The lakes, of which there are many, are well stocked with trout. Malcolm caught one of four and twenty pounds' weight in the loch next to Dun Can, which, by the way, is certainly a Danish name, as most names of places in these islands are.

The old castle, in which the family of Rasay formerly resided, is situated upon a rock very near the sea. The rock is not one mass of stone, but a congregation of pebbles and earth, so firm that it does not appear to have moulder'd. In this remnant of antiquity I found nothing worthy of being noticed, except a certain accommodation rarely to be found at the modern houses of Scotland, and which Dr. Johnson and I sought for in vain at the Laird of Rasay's new built mansion, where nothing else was wanting. I took the liberty to tell the Laird it was a shame there should be such a deficiency in civilised times. He acknowledged the justice of the remark. But perhaps some generations may pass before the want is supplied. Dr. Johnson observed to me, how quietly people will endure an evil, which they might at any time very easily remedy; and mentioned, as an instance, that the present family of Rasay had possessed the island for more than four hundred years, and never made a commodious landing-place, though a few men with pickaxes might have cut an ascent of stairs out of any part of the rock in a week's time.

The north end of Rasay is as rocky as the south, and. From it I saw the little island of Fladda, belonging to Rasay, all fine green ground; and Rona, which is of so rocky a soil that it appears to be a pavement. I was told, however, that it has a great deal of grass in the interstices. The Laird has it all in his own hands. At this end of the island of Rasay is a cave in a striking situation; it is in a recess of a great cliff, a good way up from the sea. Before it the ocean roars, being dashed against monstrous broken rocks; grand and awful propygnacula. On the right hand of it is a longitudinal cave, very low at the entrance, but higher as you advance. The sea having scooped it out, it seems strange and unaccountable that the interior part, where the water must have operated with less force, should be loftier than that which is more immediately exposed to its violence. The roof of it is all covered with a kind of petrifactions formed by drops, which perpetually distil from it. The first cave has been a place of much safety. I find a great difficulty in describing visible objects. I must own too, that the old castle and cave, like many other things, of which one hears much, did not answer my expectations. People are every where apt to magnify the curiosities of their country.

This island has abundance of black cattle, sheep, and goats; a good many horses, which are used for ploughing, carrying out dung, and other works of husbandry. I believe the people never ride. There are indeed no roads through the island, unless a few detached beaten tracks deserve that name. Most of the houses are upon the shore; so that all the people have little boats, and catch fish. There is great plenty of potatoes here. There are black-cock in extraordinary abundance, moor-fowl, plover, and wild pigeons, which seemed to me to be the same as we have in pigeon-houses, in their state of nature. Rasay has no pigeon-house. There are no hares nor rabbits in the island, nor was there ever known to be a fox, till last year, when one was landed on it by some malicious person, without whose aid he could not have got thither, as that animal is known to be a very bad swimmer. He has done much mischief. There is a great deal of fish caught in the sea round Rasay; it is a place where one may live in plenty, and even in luxury. There are no deer; but Rasay told us he would get some.

1 An Hebridean version, it would seem, of the story of Perseus and Andromeda. — Croker.

2 It is now an Erse or Celtic name, compounded of Dun, a hill, and Cam, the head — i.e. the highest hill. So in Scotland, Kan-ityr, the head land or promontory. It may be observed that Ken — the ancient promontory of England — is no doubt a contraction of Kan-ityr, the head land, as the name of the capital — Can-ityr-bury, the fortress of the promontorial land — denotes. — Croker.

3 Though Johnson thus censured Rasay and his ancestors for having remained four hundred years without rendering their island accessible by a landing place, yet, when he came to write his Journal, he remembered that, perhaps, it was only for the last few years that it was desirable it should be accessible. "I knew not whether, for many ages, it was not considered as a part of military policy to keep the country not easily accessible." — Croker.

They reckon it rains nine months in the year in this island, owing to its being directly opposite to the western coast of Sky, where the watery clouds are broken by high mountains. The hills here, and indeed all the heathy grounds in general, abound with the sweet-smelling plant which the Highlanders call gauld, and (I think) with dwarf juniper in many places. There is enough of turf, which is their fuel, and it is thought there is a mine of coal. Such are the observations which I made upon the island of Rasay, upon comparing it with the description given by Martin, whose book I had with us.

There has been an ancient league between the families of Macdonald and Rasay. Whenever the head of either family dies, his sword is given to the head of the other. The present Rasay has the late Sir James Macdonald's sword. Old Rasay joined the Highland army in 1745, but prudently guarded against a forfeiture, by previously conveying his estate to the present gentleman, his eldest son. On that occasion, Sir Alexander, father of the late Sir James Macdonald, was very friendly to his neighbour. "Don't be afraid, Rasay," said he, "I'll use all my interest to keep you safe; and if your estate should be taken, I'll buy it for the family." And he would have done it.

Let me now gather some gold dust, some more fragments of Dr. Johnson's conversation, without regard to order of time. He said, "he thought very highly of Bentley; that no man now went so far in the kinds of learning that he cultivated; that the many attacks on him were owing to envy, and to a desire of being known, by being in competition with such a man; that it was safe to attack him, because he never answered his opponents, but let them die away. It was attacking a man who would not beat them, because his beating them would make them live the longer. And he was right not to answer; for, in his hazardous method of writing, he could not but be often enough wrong; so it was better to leave things to their general appearance, than own himself to have erred in particulars." He said, "Mallet was the prettiest dressed puppet about town, and always kept good company.

That, from his way of talking, he saw, and always said, that he had not written any part of the Life of the Duke of Marlborough, though perhaps he intended to do it at some time, in which case he was not culpable in taking the pension. That he imagined the Duchess furnished the materials for her Apology, which Hooke wrote, and Hooke furnished the words and the order, and all that in which the art of writing consists. That the Duchess had not superior parts, but was a bold frontless woman, who knew how to make the most of her opportunities in life. That Hooke got a large sum of money for writing her Apology. That he wondered Hooke should have been weak enough to insert so profligate a maxim, as that to tell another's secret to one's friend is no breach of confidence; though perhaps Hooke, who was a virtuous man, as his History shows, and did not wish her well, though he wrote her Apology, might see its ill tendency, and yet insert it at her desire. If he was acting only ministerially," I apprehend, however, that Hooke was bound to give his best advice. I speak as a lawyer. Though I have had clients whose causes I could not, as a private man, approve; yet, if I undertook them, I would not do anything that might be prejudicial to them, even at their desire, without warning them of their danger.

Saturday, Sept. 11. — It was a storm of wind and rain, so we could not set out. I wrote some of this journal, and talked awhile with Dr. Johnson in his room, and passed the day, I cannot well say how, but very pleasantly. I was here amused to find Mr. Cumberland's comedy of the "Fashionable Lover," in which he has very well drawn a Highland character, Colin Macleod, of the same name with the family under whose roof we now were. Dr. Johnson was much pleased with the Laird of Macleod, who is indeed a most promising youth, and with a noble spirit struggles with difficulties, and endeavours to preserve his people. He has been left with an incurrence of forty thousand pounds debt, and annuities to the amount of thirteen hundred pounds a year. Dr. Johnson said, "If he gets the better of all this, he'll be a hero; and I hope he will. I have not met with a young man who had more desire to learn, or who has learnt more. I have seen nobody that I wish more to do a kindness to than Macleod." Such was the honourable eulogium on this young chieftain, pronounced by an accurate observer, whose praise was never lightly bestowed.

1 So in all the editions, but the eastern coast of Sky is next to Rasay. Boswell means that the eastern coast of Sky is overeard of Rasay. — Croker.

3 The late General Macleod, born in 1734. In 1776, he entered the army, raising, then, an independent company, and in 1780, the second battalion of the forty-second, which he led to India, where he served with great distinction. On his return home, he became M.P. for the county of Inverness, as his grandfather had been; but so far from extinguishing the debt on his estate, he increased it; for though he had sold a great tract of land in Harris, he left at his death, in 1801, the original debt of 50,000l. increased to 70,000l. — C. An autobiographical fragment by General Macleod was communicated to me by that gentleman's son, the late M.P. for Sudbury, and published in the Appendix of my first edition; but too small a part of it relates to Dr. Johnson to allow of its introduction into this compressed volume. The General, with much compliment to the character of his illustrious guest, complains of his incredulity as to Ossian. — Croker, 1846.
There is neither justice of peace nor constable in Rasay. Sky has Mr. Macleod of Ulinish, who is the sheriff substitute, and no other justice of peace. The want of the execution of justice is much felt among the islanders. Macleod very sensibly observed, that taking away the heritable jurisdictions had not been of such service in the islands as was imagined. They had not authority enough in lieu of them. What could formerly have been settled at once, must now either take much time and trouble, or be neglected. Dr. Johnson said, "A country is in a bad state, which is governed only by laws; because a thousand things occur for which laws cannot provide, and where authority ought to interpose. Now destroying the authority of the chiefs sets the people loose. It did not pretend to bring any positive good, but only to cure some evil; and I am not well enough acquainted with the country to know what degree of evil the heritable jurisdictions occasioned." I maintained, hardly any; because the chiefs generally acted right, for their own sakes.

Dr. Johnson was now wishing to move. There was not enough of intellectual entertainment for him, after he had satisfied his curiosity, which he did, by asking questions, till he had exhausted the island; and where there was so numerous a company, mostly young people, there was such a flow of familiar talk, so much noise, and so much singing and dancing, that little opportunity was left for his energetic conversation. He seemed sensible of this; for when I told him how happy they were at having him there, he said, "Yet we have not been able to entertain them much." I was fretted, from irritability of nerves, by M'Cruslick's too obstreperous mirth. I complained of it to my friend, observing we should be better if he was gone. "No, Sir," said he, "He puts something into our society, and takes nothing out of it." Dr. Johnson, however, had several opportunities of instructing the company; but I am sorry to say, that I did not pay sufficient attention to what passed, as his discourse now turned chiefly on mechanics, agriculture, and such subjects, rather than on science and wit. Last night Lady Rasay showed him the operation of wakening cloth, that is, thickening it in the same manner as is done by a mill. Here it is performed by women, who kneed upon the ground, and rub it with both their hands, singing an Erse song all the time. He was asking questions while they were performing this operation, and, amidst their loud and wild howl, his voice was heard even in the room above.

They dance here every night. The queen of our ball was the eldest Miss Macleod, of Rasay, an elegant well-bred woman, and celebrated for her beauty over all those regions, by the name of Miss Flora Rasay. There seemed to be no jealousy, no discontent among them; and the gaiety of the scene was such, that I for a moment doubted whether unhappiness had any place in Rasay. But my delusion was soon dispelled, by recollecting the following lines of my fellow-traveller:

"Yet hope not life from pain or danger free,
Or think the doom of man reversed for thee!"

Sunday, Sept. 12.—It was a beautiful day, and although we did not approve of travelling on Sunday, we resolved to set out, as we were in an island from whence one must take occasion as it serves. Macleod and Tullisker sailed in a boat of Rasay's for Sconer, to take the shortest way to Dunvegan. M'Cruslick went with them to Sconer, from whence he was to go to Slate, and so to the main land. We were resolved to pay a visit at Kingsburgh, and see the celebrated Miss Flora Macdonald, who is married to the present Mr. Macdonald of Kingsburgh; so took that road, though not so near. All the family, but Lady Rasay, walked down to the shore to see us depart. Rasay himself went with us in a large boat, with eight oars, built in his island; as did Mr. Malcolm Macleod, Mr. Donald M'Queen, Dr. Macleod, and some others. We had a most pleasant sail between Rasay and Sky; and passed by a cave, where Martin says Fowler were caught by lighting fire in the mouth of it. Malcolm remembers this. But it is not now practised, as few Fowls come into it.

We spoke of Death. Dr. Johnson on this subject observed, that the boastings of some men, as to dying easily, were idle talk proceeding from partial views. I mentioned Hawthornden's Cypresses Grove, where it is said that the world is a mere show; and that it is unreasonable for a man to wish to continue in a show-room after he has seen it. Let him go cheerfully out, and give place to other spectators.

"Yes, Sir; if he is sure he is to be well, after he goes out of it. But if he is to grow blind after he goes out of the show-room, and never to see anything again; or if he does not know whither he is to go next, a man will not go cheerfully out of a show-room. No wise man will be contented to die, if he thinks he is to go into a state of punishment. Nay, no wise man will be contented to die, if he thinks he is to fall into annihilation; for, however unhappy any man's existence may be..."

2 She had been some time at Edinburgh, to which she again went, and was married [1775] to my worthy neighbour, Colonel Mure Campbell, now Earl of Loudoun; but she died soon afterwards, leaving one daughter.—Boswell.

4 "They which forewent us did leave a room for us, as why should we grive to doe the same to those which should come after us? he yet would rather have it, than not exist at all. No; there is no rational principle by which a man can die contented, but a trust in the mercy of God, through the merits of Jesus Christ." This short sermon, delivered with an earnest tone, in a boat upon the sea, which was perfectly calm, on a day appropriated to religious worship, while every one listened with an air of satisfaction, had a most pleasing effect upon my mind.

Pursuing the same train of serious reflection, he added, that it seemed certain that happiness could not be found in this life, because so many had tried to find it, in such a variety of ways, and had not found it.

We reached the harbour of Portree, in Sky, which is a large and good one. There was lying in it a vessel to carry off the emigrants, called the Nestor. It made a short settlement of the differences between a chief and his clan:

"Nestor componere lites Inter Peleiden festinat et inter Atriden."

We approached her, and she hoisted her colours. Dr. Johnson and Mr. McQueen remained in the boat: Basay and I, and the rest, went on board of her. She was a very pretty vessel, and, as we were told, the largest in Clyde. Mr. Harrison, the captain, showed her to us. The cabin was commodious, and even elegant. There was a little library, finely bound. Portree has its name from King James the Fifth having landed there in his tour through the Western Isles, ree in Erse being king, as re is in Italian; so it is Port-Royal. There was here a tolerable inn. On our landing, I had the pleasure of finding a letter from home; and there were also letters to Dr. Johnson and me, from Lord Elibank, which had been sent after us from Edinburgh. His lordship's letter to me was as follows:

LORD ELIBANK TO BOSWELL.

"21st August, 1773.

"Dear Boswell,—I flew to Edinburgh the moment I heard of Mr. Johnson's arrival; but so defective was my intelligence, that I came too late. It is but justice to believe, that I could never forgive myself, nor deserve to be forgiven by others, if I was to fail in any mark of respect to that very great genius. I hold him in the highest veneration; for that very reason I was resolved to take no share in the merit, perhaps guilt, of enticing him to honour this country with a visit. I could not persuade myself there was any thing in Scotland worthy to have a summer of Samuel Johnson be-slowed on it; but since he has done us that compliment, for Heaven's sake inform me of your motions. I will attend them most religiously; and though I should regret to let Mr. Johnson go a mile out of his way on my account, old as I am, I shall be glad to go five hundred miles to enjoy a day of his company. Have the charity to send a council-post with intelligence; the post does not suit us in the country. At any rate, write to me. I will attend you in the north, when I shall know where to find you. I am, my dear Boswell, your sincerely obedient humble servant, Elibank."

The letter to Dr. Johnson was in these words:

LORD ELIBANK TO JOHNSON.

"Dear Sir,—I was to have kissed your hands at Edinburgh, the moment I heard of you, but you were gone.

"I hope my friend Boswell will inform me of your motions. It will be cruel to deprive me an instant of the honour of attending you. As I value you more than any king in Christendom, I will perform that duty with infinitely greater alacrity than any courtier. I can contribute but little to your entertainment; but my sincere esteem for you gives me some title to the opportunity of expressing it.

"I dare say you are by this time sensible that things are pretty much the same as when Buehaneh complained of being born solo et seculo ineredito. Let me hear of you, and be persuaded that none of your admirers is more sincerely devoted to you, than, dear Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant, Elibank."

Dr. Johnson, on the following Tuesday, answered for both of us, thus:

JOHNSON TO LORD ELIBANK.

"My Lord,—On the rugged shore of Skie I had the honour of your lordship's letter, and can with great truth declare that no place is so gloomy but that it would be cheered by such a testimony of regard, from a mind so well qualified to estimate characters, and to deal out approbation in its due proportions. If I have more than my share, it is your lordship's fault; for I have always reverenced your judgment too much, to exalt myself in your presence by any false pretensions.

"Mr. Boswell and I are at present at the disposal of the winds, and therefore cannot fix the time at which we shall have the honour of seeing your lordship. But we should either of us think ourselves injured by the supposition that we would

and of social or political life, seem to have been borrowed from foreigner, as king, port, horse, cow, &c., unless, indeed, as some philologers imagine, these were derived from roots common to all languages. — Croker.

miss your lordship's conversation when we could enjoy it; for I have often declared that I never met you without going away a wiser man. I am, my Lord, your lordship's most obedient and most humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON.

At Portree, Mr. Donald M'Queen went to church and officiated in Erse, and then came to dinner. Dr. Johnson and I resolved that we should treat the company, so I played the landlord, or master of the feast, having previously ordered Joseph to pay the bill.

Sir James Macdonald intended to have built a village here, which would have done great good. A village is like a heart to a country. It produces a perpetual circulation, and gives the people an opportunity to make profit of many little articles, which would otherwise be in a good measure lost. We had here a dinner, et prateria nihil. Dr. Johnson did not talk. When we were about to depart, we found that Rasay had been beforehand with us, and that all was paid; I would fain have contested this matter with him, but seeing him resolved, I declined it. We parted with cordial embraces from him and worthy Malcolm. In the evening Dr. Johnson and I remounted our horses, accompanied by Mr. M'Queen and Dr. Macleod. It rained very hard. We rode what they call six miles, upon Rasay's lands in Sky, to Dr. Macleod's house. On the road Dr. Johnson appeared to be somewhat out of spirits. When I talked of our meeting Lord Elibank, he said, "I cannot be with him much. I long to be again in civilised life; but can stay but a short while" (he meant at Edinburgh). He said, "Let us go to Dunvegan to-morrow." "Yes," said I, "if it is not a deluge." "At seven o'clock," he replied. This showed a kind of fretful impatience; nor was it to be wondered at, considering our disagreeable ride. I feared we would give up Mull and Icolmkill; for he said something of his apprehensions of being detained by bad weather in going to Mull and Iona. However, I hoped well. We had a dish of tea at Dr. Macleod's, who had a pretty good house, where was his brother, a half-pay officer. His lady was a polite, agreeable woman. Dr. Johnson said, he was glad to see that he was so well married, for he had an esteeem for physicians. The doctor accompanied us to Kingsburgh, which is called a mile farther; but the computation of Sky has no connection whatever with real distance.

I was highly pleased to see Dr. Johnson safely arrived at Kingsburgh, and received by the hospitable Mr. Macdonald, who, with a most respectful attention, supported him into the house. Kingsburgh was completely the figure of a gallant Highlander,—exhibiting "the graceful mien and manly looks," which our popular Scotch song has justly attributed to that character. He had his tartan plaid thrown about him, a large blue bonnet with a knot of black riband like a cockade, a brown short coat of a kind of duffil, a tartan waistcoat with gold buttons and gold button-holes, a bluish philibeg, and tartan hose. He had jet black hair tied behind, and was a large stately man, with a steady sensible countenance.

There was a comfortable parlour with a good fire, and a dram went round. By and by supper was served, at which there appeared the lady of the house, the celebrated Miss Flora Macdonald. She is a little woman, of a genteel appearance, and uncommonly mild and well bred. To see Dr. Samuel Johnson, the great champion of the English Tongues, salute Miss Flora Macdonald in the isle of Sky, was a striking sight; for, though somewhat congenial in their notions, it was very improbable they should meet here.

Miss Flora Macdonald (for so I shall call her) told me, she heard upon the main land, as she was returning home about a fortnight before, that Mr. Boswell was coming to Sky, and one Mr. Johnson, a young English buck, with him. He was highly entertained with this fancy. Giving an account of the afternoon which we passed at Anock, he said, "I, being a buck, he, Mr. Johnson, in "make tea." He was rather quiescent to night, and went early to bed. I was in a cordial humour, and promoted a cheerful glass. The punch was excellent. Honest Mr. M'Queen observed that I was in high glee, "my governor being gone to bed." Yet in reality my heart was grieved, when I recollected that Kingsburgh was embarrassed in his affairs, and intended to go to America. However, nothing but what was good was present, and I pleased myself in thinking that so spirited a man would be well every where. I slept in the same room with Dr. Johnson. Each had a neat bed, with tartan curtains, in an upper chamber.

1 It is stated in the account of the rebellion, published under the title of "Aeneas," that she was the daughter of Mr. Macdonald, a tackman or gentleman-farmer, of Melton, in South Uist, and was, in 1745, about twenty-four years old. It is also said, that her portrait was painted in London in 1747, for Commodore Smith, in whose ship she had been brought prisoner from Scotland, but I have not been able to trace it. Dr. Johnson says of her to Mrs. Thrale: "She must then have been a very young lady; she is now not old of a pleasing person, and elegant behaviour. She told me that she thought herself honoured by my visit; and I am sure that whatever regard she bestowed on me, I literally repaid. If thou likest her opinions, thou wilt praise her virtue." She was carried to London, but dismissed without a trial, and came down with Malcolm Macleod, against whom sufficient evidence could not be procured. She and her husband are poor, and are going to try their fortune in America.

2 It may be useful to future readers to know that the word "macaroni" in a former passage of this work, and the word "macaroni" as here employed, are nearly synonymous with the term "dandy," employed now-a-days (1831–1846) express a young gentleman who in his dress and man's affects the extreme of the fashion. Macaroni is preserved in the "School for Scandal."—CROKER.
Monday, Sept. 12.—The room where we lay was a celebrated one. Dr. Johnson's bed was the very bed in which the grandson of the unfortunate King James the Second lay, on one of the nights after the failure of his rash attempt in 1745—6, while he was eluding the pursuit of the emissaries of government, which had offered thirty thousand pounds as a reward for apprehending him. To see Dr. Samuel Johnson lying in that bed, in the house of Sky, in the house of Miss Flora Macdonald, struck me with such a group of ideas as it is not easy for words to describe, as they passed through the mind. He smiled, and said, "I have had no ambitious thoughts in it." The room was decorated with a great variety of maps and prints. Among others, was Hogarth's print of Wilkes grinning, with the cap of liberty on a pole by him. That, too, was a curious circumstance in the scene this morning; such a contrast was Wilkes to the above group. It reminded me of Sir William Chambers's "Account of Oriental Gardening," in which, we are told, all odd, strange, ugly, and even terrible objects, are introduced for the sake of variety; a wild extravagance of taste which is so well ridiculed in the celebrated Epistle to him. The following lines of that poem immediately occurred to me:—

"Here too, O king of vengeance! in thy fame, Tremendous Wilkes shall rattle his gold chain."

Upon the table in our room I found in the morning a slip of paper, on which Dr. Johnson had written with his pencil these words:—

"Quantum sedat virtutibus aurum." What he meant by writing them I could not tell. He had caught cold a day or two ago, and the rain yesterday having made it worse, he was become very deaf. At breakfast he said, he would have given a good deal rather than not have lain in that bed. I owned he was the lucky man; and observed, that without doubt it had been contrived between Mrs. Macdonald and him. She seemed to acquiesce; adding, "You know young bucks are always favourites of the ladies." He spoke of Prince Charles being here, and asked Mrs. Macdonald "Who was with him? We were told, Madam, in England, there was one Miss Flora Macdonald with him." She said, "they were very right;" and perceiving Dr. Johnson's curiosity, though he had delicacy enough not to question her, very obligingly entertained him with a recital of the particulars which she herself knew of that escape, which does so much honour to the humanity, fidelity, and generosity of the Highlanders. Dr. Johnson listened to her with placid attention, and said, "All this should be written down."

From what she told us, and from what I was told by others personally concerned, and from a paper of information which Rossay was so good as to send me, at my desire, I have compiled an abstract, which, as it contains some curious anecdotes, will, I imagine, not be uninteresting to my readers, and even, perhaps, be of some use to future historians.

1 In the examination of Kingsburgh and his wife, by Captain Fergusson of the Furnace man of war, relative to this lady, I cannot help questioning the accuracy of this note in woman's clothes, who was with her, lay? Kingsburgh answered with gentlemanly spirit, "He knew where Miss Flora lay; but as for servants, he had asked my questions about them." The captain then, brutally enough, asked Mrs. Macdonald "whether she laid the young Pretender and Miss Flora in the same bed, or with great temper and readiness, "Sir, whom you mean by the young Pretender, I do not pretend to guess; but I can assure you it is not the fashion in Sky to lay mistress and maid in the same bed together." The captain then desired to see the rooms where they lay, and shrewdly enough remarked that the room wherein the supposed maid-servant lay was better than that of her mistress. — Ascansius. — Croker.

2 I do not call him the Prince of Wales, or the Prince, because I am quite satisfied that the right which the house of Stuart had to the throne is extinguished. I do not call him the Pretender, because it appears to me as an insult to one who is still alive, and, I suppose, thinks very differently. It may be a parliamentary expression; but it is not a gentle- manly expression, I know, and I exist in having it in my power to tell, that "the only person in the world who is enti- tled to be offended at this delicacy thinks and feels as I do;" and has liberality of mind and generosity of sentiment enough to approve of my tenderness for what even has been blood royal. That he is a prince by courtesy cannot be denied; because his mother was the daughter of Solfic of Poland, I shall, therefore, on that account alone, distinguish him by the name of Prince Charles Edward. — Boswell.

3 The genius of King George the Third, for which this note was followed up by his successor, who caused a monument to be erected over the remains of the Cardinal of York, in whom the line of James the Second ended. It was a liberal and judicious tribute to private and to public feeling; the political danger had been extinguished for more than half a century; and the claims of kindred, and the honour of the English name, not only justified, but seemed to require such an exercise of royal generosity. — Croker.

4 This, perhaps, was said in allusion to some lines ascribed to Pope, on his lying, at John Duke of Argyle's, at Adder- bury, in the same bed in which Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, had slept:—

"With no poetical armour fired, I press the bed where Wilmot lay; That here he lived, or here expired, Begets no numbers, grave or gay." — Boswell.

5 The Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers, by Mason, and, as I think, Horace Walpole, had just appeared. A published letter of Walpole to Mason seems to prove that it was altogether Mason's. But I have seen another letter of Wal- pole's to Mason that satisfies me that it was a joint produc- tion — Walpole perhaps supplying the points, and Mason the poetry. — Croker, 1831. 1469.

6 With virtue weigh'd, what worthless trash is gold!" — Boswell.

Since the first edition of this book, an Ingenious friend has observed to me, that Dr. Johnson had probably been thinking on the reward which was offered by government for the apprehension of the grandson of King James II., and that he meant by these words to express his admiration of the Highlanders, whose fidelity and attachment had resisted the golden temptation that had been held out to them. — Boswell.
CHAPTER XXXVII.

Adventures of the Pretender.

Prince Charles Edward, after the battle of Culloden, was conveyed to what is called the Long Island, where he lay for some time concealed. But intelligence having been obtained where he was, and a number of troops having come in quest of him, it became absolutely necessary for him to quit that country without delay. Miss Flora Macdonald, then a young lady, animated by what she thought the sacred principle of loyalty, offered, with the magnanimity of a heroine, to accompany him in an open boat to Sky, though the coast they were to quit was guarded by ships. He dressed himself in women's clothes, and passed as her supposed maid, by the name of Betty Bourke, an Irish girl. They got off undiscovered, though several shots were fired to bring them to, and landed at Mugstot, the seat of Sir Alexander Macdonald. Sir Alexander was then at Fort Augustus, with the Duke of Cumberland; but his lady was at home. Prince Charles took his post upon a hill near the house. Flora Macdonald waited on Lady Margaret, and acquainted her of the enterprise in which she was engaged. Her ladyship, whose active benevolence was ever seconded by superior talents, showed a perfect presence of mind and readiness of invention, and at once settled that Prince Charles should be conducted to old Rossay, who was himself concealed with some select friends. The plan was instantly communicated to Kingsburgh, who was despatched to the hill to inform the wanderer, and carry him refreshments. When Kingsburgh approached, he started up, and advanced, holding a large knotted stick, and in appearance ready to knock him down, till he said, "I am Macdonald of Kingsburgh, come to serve your Highness." The wanderer answered, "It is well," and was satisfied with the plan.

Flora Macdonald dined with the Lady Margaret, at whose table there sat an officer of the army, stationed here with a party of soldiers to watch for Prince Charles in case of his flying to the Isle of Sky. She afterwards often laughed in good humour with this gentleman on her having so well deceived him.

After dinner, Flora Macdonald on horseback, and her supposed maid, and Kingsburgh, with a servant carrying some linen, all on foot, proceeded towards that gentleman's house. Upon the road was a small rivulet which they were obliged to cross. The wanderer, forgetting his assumed sex, that his clothes might not be wet, held them up a great deal too high. Kingsburgh mentioned this to him, observing, it might make a discovery. He said he would be more careful for the future. He was as good as his word; for the next brook they crossed he did not hold up his clothes at all, but let them float upon the water. He was very awkward in his female dress. His size was so large, and his strides so great, that some women whom they met reported that they had seen a very big woman, who looked like a man in women's clothes, and that perhaps it was (as they expressed themselves) the Prince, after whom so much search was making.

At Kingsburgh he met with a most cordial reception; seemed gay at supper, and after it indulged himself in a cheerful glass with his worthy host. As he had not had his clothes off for a long time, the comfort of a good bed was highly relished by him, and he slept soundly till next day at one o'clock.

The Mistress of Corrichatachin told me that in the forenoon she went into her father's room, who was also in bed, and suggested to him her apprehensions that a party of the military might come up, and that his guest and he had better not remain here too long. Her father said, "Let the poor man repose himself after his fatigues! and as for me, I care not, though they take off this old grey head ten or eleven years sooner than I should die in the course of nature." He then wrapped himself in the bed-clothes, and again fell fast asleep.

On the afternoon of that day, the wanderer, still in the same dress, set out for Portree, with Flora Macdonald and a man-servant. His shoes being very bad, Kingsburgh provided him with a new pair, and taking up the old ones, said, "I will faithfully keep them till you are safely settled in St. James's. I will then introduce myself by shaking them at you, to put you in mind of your night's entertainment and protection under my roof!" He smiled and said, "Be as good as your word!" Kingsburgh kept the shoes as long as he lived. After his death, a zealous Jacobite gentleman gave twenty guineas for them.

Old Mrs. Macdonald, after her guest had left the house, took the sheets in which he had lain, folded them carefully, and charged her daughter that they should be kept unwashed and that, when she died, her body should be

1 She was daughter of the ninth Earl of Eglintrae, and died in March 1790. Though her husband took arms for the house of Hanover, she was suspected of being an ardent Jacobite; and, on that supposition, Flora Macdonald guided the Pretender to Mugstot. — Croker. On the subject of Lady Margaret Macdonald, it is impossible to omit an anecdote which does much honour to Frederick, Prince of Wales. By some chance Lady Margaret had been presented to the princess, who, when she learnt what share she had taken in the Chevalier's escape, hastened to excuse herself to the prince, and explain to him that she was not aware that Lord Macdonald was the person who had harboured the fugitive. The prince's answer was noble: "And would you not have done the same, madam, had he come to you, as to her?" — Walter Scott.
wrapped in them as a winding sheet. Her will was religiously observed.

Upon the road to Portree, Prince Charles changed his dress, and put on man's clothes again; a tartan short coat and waistcoat, with phillibeg and short hose, a plaid, and a wig and bonnet.

Mr. Donald McDonald, called Donald Roy, had been sent express to the present laird [Rasay], who was at that time at his sister's house, about three miles from Portree, attending his brother, Dr. Macleod, who was recovering of a wound he had received at the battle of Culloden. Mr. McDonald communicated to young Rasay the plan of conveying the wanderer to where old Rasay was; but was told that old Rasay had fled to Knockard, a part of Glengarry's estate. There was then a dilemma as what should be done. Donald Roy proposed that he should conduct the wanderer to the main land; but young Rasay thought it too dangerous at that time, and said it would be better to conceal him in the island of Rasay, till old Rasay could be informed where he was, and give his advice what was best. But the difficulty was, how to get him to Rasay. They could not trust a Portree crew, and all the Rasay boats had been destroyed, or carried off by the military, except two belonging to Malcolm Macleod, which he had concealed somewhere.

Dr. Macleod, being informed of this difficulty, said he would risk his life once more for Prince Charles; and it having occurred, that there was a little boat upon a freshwater lake in the neighbourhood, young Rasay and Dr. Macleod, with the help of some women, brought it to the sea, by extraordinary exertion, across a Highland mile of land, one half of which was bog, and the other a steep precipice.

These gallant brothers, with the assistance of one little boy, rowed the small boat to Rasay, where they were to endeavour to find Captain Macleod, as Malcolm was then called, and get one of his good boats, with which they might return to Portree, and receive the wanderer; or, in case of not finding him, they were to make the small boat serve, though the danger was considerable.

Fortunately, on their first landing, they found their cousin Malcolm, who, with the utmost alacrity, got ready one of his boats, with two strong men, John M'Kenzie and Donald M'Frier. Malcolm, being the oldest man, and most cautious, said, that as young Rasay had not hitherto appeared in the unfortunate business, he ought not to run any risk; but that Dr. Macleod and himself, who were already publicly engaged, should go on this expedition. Young Rasay answered, with an oath, that he would go at the risk of his life and fortune. "In God's name then," said Malcolm, "let us proceed." The two boatmen, however, now stopped short, till they should be informed of their destination; and M'Kenzie declared he would not move an oar till he knew where they were going. Upon which they were both sworn to secrecy; and the business being imparted to them, they were eager to put off to sea without loss of time. The boat soon landed about half a mile from the inn at Portree.

All this was negotiated before the wanderer got forward to Portree. Malcolm Macleod and M'Frier were despatched to look for him. In a short time he appeared, and went into the public house. Here Donald Roy, whom he had seen at Mugstet, received him, and informed of what he had been concerted. He wanted silver for a guinea, but Donald Roy very judiciously observed, that it would discover him to be some great man; so he desisted. He slipped out of the house, leaving his fair protectress, whom he never again saw; and Malcolm Macleod was presented to him by Donald Roy, as a captain in his army. Young Rasay and Dr. Macleod had waited, in impatient anxiety, in the boat. When he came, their names were announced to him. He would not permit the usual ceremonies of respect, but saluted them as his equals.

Donald Roy said in Sky, to be in readiness to get intelligence, and give an alarm in case the troops should discover the retreat to Rasay; and Prince Charles was then conveyed in a boat to that island in the night. He slept a little upon the passage, and they landed about daybreak. There was some difficulty in accommodating him with a lodging, as almost all the houses in the island had been burnt by the soldiery. They repaired to a little hut, which some shepherds had lately built, and having prepared it as well as they could and made a bed of heath for the stranger, they kindled a fire, and partook of some provisions which had been sent with him from Kingsburgh. It was observed, that he would not taste wheat-bread or brandy, while oat-bread and whisky lasted; "for these," said he, "are my own country bread and drink." This was very engaging to the Highlanders.

Young Rasay being the only person of the company that durst appear with safety, he went in quest of something fresh for them to eat; but though he was amidst his own cows, sheep, and goats, he could not venture to take any of them for fear of a discovery, but was obliged to supply himself by stealth. He therefore caught a kid and brought it to the hut in his plaid, and it was killed and dressed, and furnished them a meal which they relished much. The distressed wanderer, whose health was now a good deal impaired by hunger, fatigue, and watching, slept a long time, but seemed to be frequently disturbed. Malcolm told me he would start from broken slumbers, and speak to himself in different languages, French, Italian, and English. I must however acknowledge, that it is highly probable that my worthy friend Malcolm did not know precisely the difference between French and Italian. One of his expressions in English was, "O God! poor Scotland."

While they were in the hut, McKenzie and Friar, the two boatmen, were placed as sentinels upon different eminences; and one day an incident happened, which must not be omitted. There was a man wandering about the island, selling tobacco. Nobody knew him, and he was suspected to be a spy. McKenzie came running to the hut, and told that this suspected person was approaching. Upon which the three gentlemen, young Rasay, Dr. Macleod, and Malcolm, held a council of war upon him, and were unanimously of opinion that he should instantly be put to death. Prince Charles, at once assuming a grave and even severe countenance, said, "God forbid that we should take away a man's life, who may be innocent, while we can preserve our own." The gentlemen however persisted in their resolution, while he as strenuously continued to take the merciful side. John McKenzie, who sat watching at the door of the hut, and overheard the debate, said in Erse, "Well, well; he must be shot. You are the king, but we are the parliament, and will do what we choose." Prince Charles, seeing the gentlemen smile, asked what the man had said, and being told it in English, he observed that he was a clever fellow, and, notwithstanding the perilous situation in which he was, laughed loud and heartily. Luckily the unknown person did not perceive that there were people in the hut, at least did not come to it, but walked on past it, unknowing of his risk. It was afterwards found out that he was one of the Highland army, who was himself in danger. Had he come to them, they were resolved to despatch him; for, as Malcolm said to me, "We could not keep him with us, and we durst not let him go. In such a situation, I would have shot my brother, if I had not been sure of him." John McKenzie was at Rasay's house when we were there. About eighteen years before he hurt one of his legs while dancing, and being obliged to have it cut off, he was now going about with a wooden leg. The story of his being a member of parliament is not yet forgotten. I took him out a little way from the house, gave him a shilling to drink Rasay's health, and led him into a detail of the particulars which I have just related. With less foundation, some writers have traced the idea of a parliament, and of the British constitution, in rude and early times. I was curious to know if he had really heard, or understood, any thing of that subject, which, had he been a greater man, would probably have been eagerly maintained. "Why, John," said I, "did you think the king should be controlled by a parliament?" He answered, "I thought, Sir, there were many voices against one."

The conversation then turning on the times, the wanderer said, that, to be sure, the life he had led of late was a very hard one; but he would rather live in the way he now did, for ten years, than fall into the hands of his enemies. The gentlemen asked him, what he thought his enemies would do with him, should he have the misfortune to fall into their hands. He said, he did not believe they would dare take his life publicly, but he dreaded being privately destroyed by poison or assassination. He was very particular in his inquiries about the wound which Dr. Macleod had received in the battle of Culloden, from a ball which entered at one shoulder, and went across to the other. The doctor happened still to have on the coat which he wore on that occasion. He mentioned, that he himself had his horse shot under him at Culloden; that the ball hit the horse about two inches from his knee, and made him so unruly that he was obliged to change him for another. He threw out some reflections on the conduct of the disastrous affair at Culloden, saying, however, that perhaps it was rash in him to do so. I am now convinced that his suspicions were groundless; for I have had a good deal of conversation upon the subject with my very worthy and ingenious friend, Mr. Andrew Lumisden, who was under secretary to Prince Charles, and afterwards principal secretary to his father at Rome, who, he assured me, was perfectly satisfied both of the abilities and honour of the generals who commanded the Highland army on that occasion. Mr. Lumisden has written an account of the three battles in 1745-6, at once accurate and classical. Talking of the different Highland corps, the gentlemen who were present wished to have his opinion which were the best soldiers. He said, he did not like comparisons among those corps: they were all best.

He told his conductors, he did not think it advisable to remain long in any one place; and that he expected a French ship to come for him to Lochbroom, among the Mackenzies. It then was proposed to carry him in one of Malcolm's boats to Lochbroom, though the distance was fifteen leagues coastwise. But he thought this would be too dangerous, and desired that, at any rate, they might first endeavour to obtain intelligence. Upon which young Rasay wrote to his friend, Mr. Mackenzie of Applecross, but received an answer, that there was no appearance of any French ship.

It was therefore resolved that they should return to Skye, which they did, and landed in Strath, where they reposed in a cow-house belonging to Mr. Nicolson of Scarbrough. The sea was very rough, and the boat took in a good deal of water. The wanderer asked if there was danger, as he was not used to such a vessel. Upon being told there was not, he sung an Erse song with much vivacity. He had by this time acquired a good deal of the Erse language.

Young Rosay was now despatched to where Donald Roy was, that they might get all the intelligence they could; and the wanderer, with much earnestness, charged Dr. Macleod to have a boat ready, at a certain place about seven miles off, as he said he intended it should carry him upon a matter of great consequence; and gave the doctor a case, containing a silver spoon, knife and fork, saying, "Keep you that till I see you," which the Doctor understood to be two days from that time. But all these orders were only blinds: for he had another plan in his head, but wisely thought it safest to trust his secrets to no more persons than was absolutely necessary. Having then desired Malcolm to walk with him a little way from the house, he soon opened his mind, saying, "I deliver myself to you. Conduct me to the Laird of M'Kinnon's country." Malcolm objected that it was very dangerous, as so many parties of soldiers were in motion. He answered, "There is nothing now to be done without danger." He then said that Malcolm must be the master, and he the servant; so he took the bag, in which his linen was put up, and carried it on his shoulder; and observing that his waistcoat, which was of scarlet tartan, with a gold twist button, was finer than Malcolm's, which was of a plain ordinary tartan, he put on Malcolm's waistcoat, and gave him his; remarking at the same time, that it did not look well that the servant should be better dressed than the master.

Malcolm, though an excellent walker, found himself excelled by Prince Charles, who told him he should not much mind the parties that were looking for him, were he once but a musquet-shot from them; but that he was somewhat afraid of the Highlanders who were against him. He was well used to walking in Italy, in pursuit of game; and he was even now so keen a sportsman that, having observed some partridges, he was going to take a shot; but Malcolm cautioned him against it, observing that the firing might be heard by the tenderers who were hovering upon the coast. As they proceeded through the mountains, taking many a circuit to avoid any houses, Malcolm, to try his resolution, asked him what they should do, should they fall in with a party of soldiers: he answered, "Fight, to be sure!" Having asked Malcolm if he should be known in his present dress, and Malcolm having replied he would, he said, "Then I'll blacken my face with powder."

"That," said Malcolm, "would discover you at once." "Then," said he, "I must be put in the greatest dishabille possible." So he pulled off his wig, tied a handkerchief round his head, and put his nightcap over it, tore the ruffles from his shirt, took the buckles out of his shoes, and made Malcolm fasten them with strings; but still Malcolm thought he would be known. "I have so odd a face," said he, "that no man ever saw me but he would know me again."

He seemed unwilling to give credit to the horrid narrative of men being massacred in cold blood, after victory had declared for the army commanded by the Duke of Cumberland. He could not allow himself to think that a general could be so barbarous.

When they came within two miles of M'Kinnon's house, Malcolm asked if he chose to see the laird. "No," said he, "by no means. I know M'Kinnon to be as good and as honest a man as any in the world, but he is not fit for my purpose at present. You must conduct me to some other house; but let it be a gentleman's house." Malcolm then determined that they should go to the house of his brother-in-law, Mr. John M'Kinnon, and from thence be conveyed to the main land of Scotland, and claim the assistance of Macdonald of Scatohouse. The wanderer at first objected to this, because Scatohouse was cousin to a person of whom he had suspicions. But he acquiesced in Malcolm's opinion.

When they were near to Mr. John M'Kinnon's house, they met a man of the name of Ross, who had been a private soldier in the Highland army. He fixed his eye steadily on the wanderer in his disguise, and having at once recognised him, he clapped his hands, and exclaimed, "Alas! Is this the case?" Finding that there was now a discovery, Malcolm asked, "What's to be done?" "Swear him to secrecy," answered Prince Charles. Upon which Malcolm drew his dirk, and on the naked blade made him take a solemn oath, that he would say nothing of his having seen the wanderer, till his escape should be made public.

Malcolm's sister, whose house they reached pretty early in the morning, asked him who the person was that was along with him. He said it was one Lewis Caw, from Crief, who, being a fugitive like himself, for the same reason, he had engaged him as his servant, but that he had fallen sick. "Poor man!" said she, "I pity him. At the same time my heart warns to a man of his appearance." Her husband was gone a little way from home; but was expected every minute to return. She set down to her brother a plentiful Highland breakfast. Prince Charles acted the servant very well, sitting at a respectful distance, with his bonnet off. Malcolm then said to him, "Mr. Caw, you have as much need of this as I have; there is enough for us both: you had better draw nearer and share with me." Upon which he rose, made a profound bow, sat down at table with his supposed master, and ate very heartily. After this there came in an old woman, who, after the mode of ancient hospitality, brought warm water and washed Malcolm's feet. He desired her to wash the feet of the poor man who attended him. She at first seemed averse to this, from pride, as thinking him beneath her, and in the periphrastic language of the Highlanders and the Irish, said warily, "Though I wash your father's son's feet, why should I wash his father's son's feet?" She was, however, persuaded to do it.

They then went to bed, and slept for some time; and when Malcolm awakened, he was told that Mr. John McKinnon, his brother-in-law, was in sight. He sprang out to talk to him before he should see Prince Charles. After saluting him, Malcolm, pointing to the sea, said, "What, John, if the prince should be prisoner on board one of those tenders?" "God forbid!" replied John. "What if we had him here?" said Malcolm. "I wish we had," answered John; "we should take care of him." "Well, John," said Malcolm, "he is in your house." John, in a transport of joy, wanted to run directly in, and pay his obeisance; but Malcolm stopped him, saying, "Now is your time to behave well, and do nothing that can discover him." John composed himself, and having sent away all his servants upon different errands, he was introduced into the presence of his guest, and was then desired to go and get ready a boat lying near his house, which, though but a small leaky one, they resolved to take, rather than go to the Laird of McKinnon. John McKinnon, however, thought otherwise; and upon his return told them, that his chief and Lady McKinnon were coming in the laird's boat. Prince Charles said to his trusty Malcolm, "I am sorry for this, but must make the best of it." McKinnon then walked up from the shore, and did homage to the wanderer. His lady waited in a cave, to which they all repaired, and were entertained with cold meat and wine. Mr. Malcolm Macleod being now superseded by the Laird of McKinnon, desired leave to return, which was granted him, and Prince Charles wrote a short note, which he subscribed James Thompson, informing his friends that he had got away from Sky, and thanking them for their kindness; and he desired this might be speedily conveyed to young Rosay and Dr. Macleod, that they might not wait longer in expectation of seeing him again. He bade a cordial adieu to Malcolm, and insisted on his accepting of a silver stock-buckle, and ten guineas from his purse, though, as Malcolm told me, it did not appear to contain above forty. Malcolm at first begged to be excused, saying, that he had a few guineas at his service; but Prince Charles answered, "You will have need of money: I shall get enough when I come upon the main land."

The Laird of McKinnon then conveyed him to the opposite coast of Knoydart. Old Rosay, to whom intelligence had been sent, was crossing at the same time to Sky; but as they did not know of each other, and each had apprehensions, the two boats kept apart.

These are the particulars which I have collected concerning the extraordinary concealment and escapes of Prince Charles in the Hebrides. He was often in imminent danger. The troops traced him from the Long Island, across Sky, to Portree, but there lost him.

Here I stop, having received no farther authentic information of his fatigues and perils before he escaped to France. Kings and subjects may both take a lesson of moderation from the melancholy fate of the house of Stuart; that kings may not suffer degradation and exile, and subjects may not be harassed by the evils of a disputed succession.

Let me close the scene on that unfortunate house with the elegant and pathetic reflections of Voltaire, in his Histoire Générale.

"Que les hommes privés," says that brilliant writer, speaking of Prince Charles, "qui se croyent malheureux, jettent les yeux sur ce prince et ses ancêtres."

In another place he thus sums up the sad story of the family in general:—

The gallant Malcolm was apprehended in about ten days after they separated, put aboard a ship, and carried prisoner to London. He said, the prisoners in general were very ill treated in their passage; but there were soldiers on board who lived well, and sometimes invited him to share with them; that he had the good fortune not to be thrown into jail, but was confined in the house of a messenger of the name of Dick. To his astonishment, only one witness could be found against him, though he had been so openly engaged; and therefore, for want of sufficient evidence, he was set at liberty. He added, that he thought himself in such danger, that he would gladly have compounded for banishment. Yet, he said, "he should never be so ready for death as he then was." There is philosophical truth in this. A man will meet death much more firmly at one time than another. The enthusiasm even of a mistaken principle warms the mind, and sets it above the fear of death; which in our cooler moments, if we really think of it, cannot but be terrible, or at least very awful.

Miss Flora Macdonald being then also in London, under the protection of Lady Primrose, that lady provided a post-chaise to convey her to Scotland, and desired that she might choose any friend she pleased to accompany her. She chose Malcolm. "So," said he with a triumphant air, "I went to London to be hanged, and returned in a post-chaise with Miss Flora Macdonald."

Mr. Macleod of Muiravonside, whom we saw at Rasay, assured us that Prince Charles was in London in 1759, and that there was then a plan in agitation for restoring his family. Dr. Johnson could scarcely credit this story, and said there could be no probable plan at that time. Such an attempt could not have succeeded, unless the King of Prussia had stopped the army in Germany; for both the army and the fleet would, even without orders, have fought for the king, to whom they had engaged themselves.

Having related so many particulars concerning the grandson of the unfortunate King James the Second; having given due praise to fidelity and generous attachment, which, however erroneous the judgment may be, are honourable for the heart; I must do the Highlanders the justice to attest, that I found every where amongst them a high opinion of the virtues of the king now upon the throne, and an honest disposition to be faithful subjects to his Majesty, whose family has possessed the sovereignty of this country so long, that a change, even for the abated family, would now hurt the best feelings of all his subjects.

The abstract point of right would involve

1 The foregoing account is by no means so full, or so curious, as might have been expected from Mr. Boswell's activity of inquiry, and his means of information. It relates only to a few days of the Pretender's adventures, which, however, lasted five months. Even of Miss Flora Macdonald it tells less than a hundred pages. In private letters, before drafts of Mr. Boswell's publication. It does not say who she was, nor relate her history; and indeed, so small a collection or index to the events, and, in short, tells as little as possible of her personal share in the events. We should particularly have liked to know from her own mouth, the particular points of her examination and reception in London. The reader who may be curious to know more of the details of the Pretender but cannot find them, he was in the same Magazine for 1717, pp. 531, 638; in the little paper referred to, called Sequences; and in a Journal in the second volume of the Lockhart Papers. — Crockha.

2 Who had succeeded Flora Macdonald as guide to the Prince, and had so greatly contributed to his escape. — Crockha.

3 When arrested, which was a few days after parting from the Prince, Flora was conveyed by a board the Furnace, Captain Ferguson, and conveyed to Leith. There she was removed on board Commodore Smith's ship, and conveyed to the Nore, whence, on the 6th of December, after being five months on ship-board, she was transferred to the custody of the messenger Dick, in which she remained till July, 1747, when she was discharged, and returned to Edinburgh. — Sequences. It seems strange that Mr. Boswell, afflicting to give an accurate account of all this affair, should use expressions which not only give no intimation of Flora's arrest and confinement, but are inconsistent with the design of his paper. It is possible that the lady's delicacy wished to suppress all recollection of her arrest; but, if so, it will be seen, by a comparison of Mr. Boswell's account with other statements of the transaction, that Flora gave him very little information — now, indeed, that had not been already published. Lady Primrose's protection must have been very short, for Flora returned, it seems, to Scotland immediately after her release from confinement. Lady Primrose was Miss Drelincourt, daughter of the Dean of Armath, and relict of Hagg, third Viscount Primrose. It is not known how she became so ardent a Jacobite; it is but the reflection of a young Pretender's visit to London, which (notwithstanding Dr. Johnson's disbelief) did certainly occur in 1758. — Crockha.

4 Dr. King states, ante, p. 92, the visit at which he saw the Pretender at Lady Primrose's to have been in 1730, while other authorities (if there were not two visits) place it in 1753. Of this last there can be no doubt. — Humo so stated it (see his letter to Sir John Pringle in the Gent. Mag. for 1753) on the separate, but concerning authority of Lord Maitland, who saw him at Lady Primrose's, and of Lord Inchard, Secretary from 1747 to 1754, who had official knowledge of the plan. — King's Memorial; it is very likely that there were two visits so near together, and I therefore still incline to think that Dr. King's Memorials is an error. — Humo adds, that he was assured, that on this occasion the Prince formally renounced the Roman Catholic religion in the presence of Dr. King. I have found nowhere any confirmation of Mr. Macleod's statement of a visit in 1753, and believe that to be also a mistake for 1753.

5 Mr. Cole, of Norton Street, possesses, and permits me to print, an original letter of Flora Macdonald's, which proves that a small provision was made for her by her Jacobite friends, perhaps the Prince himself, through the hands of Lady Primrose. I give this Jacobite relic Iteratim. — Crockha.
us in a discussion of remote and perplexed questions; and, after all, we should have no clear principle of decision. That establishment, which, from political necessity, took place in 1688, by a breach in the succession of our kings, and which, whatever benefits may have accrued from it, certainly gave a shock to our monarchy, the able and constitutional Blackstone wisely rests on the solid footing of authority. Our ancestors having most indisputably a competent jurisdiction to decide this great and important question, and having, in fact, decided it, is now become our duty, at this distance of time, to acquiesce in their determination.

Mr. Paley, the present Archdeacon of Carlisle, in his "Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy," having, with much clearness of argument, shown the duty of submission to civil government to be founded neither on an indefensible jus divinum, nor on compact, but on expediency, lays down this rational position: "Irregularity in the first foundation of a state, or subsequent violence, fraud, or injustice, in getting possession of the supreme power, are not sufficient reasons for resistance, after the government is once peaceably settled. No subject of the British empire conceives himself engaged to vindicate the justice of the Norman claim or conquest, or apprehends that his duty in any manner depends upon that controversy. So likewise, if the house of Lancaster, or even the pesterly of Cromwell, had been at this day seated upon the throne of England, we should have been as little concerned to inquire how the founder of the family came there."

In conformity with this doctrine, I myself, though fully persuaded that the house of Stuart had originally no right to the crown of Scotland, for that Bajiol, nor Mr. Bruce, was the lawful heir, should yet have thought very culpable to have rebelled, on that account, against Charles the First, or even a prince of that house much nearer the time, in order to assert the claim of the posterity of Bajiol.

However convinced I am of the justice of that principle, which holds allegiance and protection to be reciprocal, I do, however, acknowledge, that I am not satisfied with the cold sentiment which would confine the exertions of the subject within the strict line of duty. I would have every breast animated with the fervour of loyalty; with that generous attachment which delights in doing somewhat more than is required, and makes "service perfect freedom." And, therefore, as our most gracious sovereign, on his accession to the throne, gloried in being born a Briton: so, in my more private sphere, Ego me nunc demique natum, gridiator. I am happy that a disputed succession no longer distracts our minds; and that a monarchy, established by law, is now so sanctioned by time, that we can fully indulge those feelings of loyalty which I am ambitious to excite. They are feelings which have ever actuated the inhabitants of the Highlands and the Hebrides. The plant of loyalty is there in full vigour, and the Brunswick graft now flourishes like a native shoot. To that spirited race of people I may with propriety apply the elegant lines of a modern poet, on the "facile temper of the beau-tious sex:"

"Like birds new-caught, who flutter for a time,
And struggle with captivity in vain;
But by-and-by they rest, they smooth their plumes,
And to new masters sing their former notes."

Surely such notes are much better than the querulous growlings of suspicious Whigs and discontented republicans.

2 Book vi. chap. 3. Since I have quoted Mr. Archdeacon Paley upon one subject, I cannot but transcribe, from his excellent work, a distinguished passage in support of the Christian revelation. After showing, in decent but strong terms, the unanswerableness of the indirect attempts of modern infidels to unsettle and perplex religious principles, and particularly the irreligious plan, and sneer of one, whom he politely calls "an eloquent historian," the Archdeacon thus expresses himself:

"Seriousness is not constraint of thought; nor levity, freedom. Every mind which wishes the advancement of truth and knowledge, in the most important of all human researches, must abhor this licentiousness, as violating no less the laws of reasoning than the rights of decency. There is but one description of men to whose principles it ought to be tolerable. I mean that class of reasoners who can see titulus in Christianity, even supposing it to be true. To such adversaries we address this reflection. Had Jesus Christ delivered no other declaration than the following: 'The hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation,' he had pronounced a message of inestimable importance, and well worthy of that splendid apparatus of prophecy and miracles with which his mission was introduced and attested: a message in which the wisest of mankind would rejoice to find an answer to their doubts, and rest to their inquiries. It is idle to say that a future state had been discovered already. It had been discovered as the Copernican system was; it was one guess amongst many. He alone discovers who proves; and no man can prove this point but the teacher who testifies by miracles that his doctrine comes from God."—Book v. chap. 9.

If indelity be disingenuously dispersed in every shape that is likely to allure, surprise, or beguile the imagination, in a fable, a tale, a novel, a poem, in books of travels, of philosophy, of natural history, as Mr. Paley has well observed, I hope it is fair in me thus to meet such poison with an unexpeeted antidote, which I cannot doubt will be found powerful. — Bolingbroke. It is almost unnecessary to add, how much Paley increased and confirmed the early reputation acquired by the work so justly praised by Boswell, by his Hercule Penela. 1790, Evidences of Christianity, 1784, Natural Theology, 1803, — and many of the best, as I venture to think, sermons in our language. — He was born in July, 1745, and died 29th May, 1805. Mr. Winckham once pronounced to me a glowing panegyric on the intrinsic excellence and public utility of Paley's works. — Chorley, 1846.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Kingsburgh conducted us in his boat across one of the lochs, as they call them, or arms of the sea, which flow in upon all the coasts of Sky, to a mile beyond a place called Grishinish. Our horses had been sent round by land to meet us. By this sail we saved eight miles of bad riding. Dr. Johnson said, "When we take into the computation what we have saved, and what we have gained, by this agreeable sail, it is a great deal." He observed, "It is very disagreeable riding in Sky. The way is so narrow, one only at a time can travel, so it is quite unsocial; and you cannot indulge in meditation by yourself, because you must be always attending to the steps which your horse takes." This was a just and clear description of its inconveniences.

The topic of emigration being again introduced, Dr. Johnson said, that "a rapacious chief would make a wilderness of his estate." Mr. Donald McQueen told us, that the oppression, which then made so much noise, was owing to landlords listening to bad advice in the letting of their lands; that interested and designing people flattered them with golden dreams of much higher rents than could reasonably be paid; and that some of the gentlemen tenants, or upper tenants, were themselves in part the occasion of the mischief, by overrating the farms of others. That many of the tenants, rather than comply with exorbitant demands, had gone off to America, and impoverished the country, by draining it of its wealth; and that their places were filled by a number of poor people, who had lived under them, properly speaking, as servants, paid by a certain proportion of the produce of the lands, though called sub-tenants. I observed, that if the men of substance were once banished from a Highland estate, it might probably be greatly reduced in its value; for one had year might ruin a set of poor tenants, and men of any property would not settle in such a country, unless from the temptation of getting land extremely cheap; for an inhabitant of any good county in Britain had better go to America than to the Highlands or the Hebrides. Here, therefore, was a consideration that ought to induce a chief to act a more liberal part, from a mere motive of interest, independent of the lofty and honourable principle of keeping a clan together, to be in readiness to serve his king. I added, that I could not help thinking a little arbitrary power in the sovereign, to control the bad policy and greediness of the chiefs, might sometimes be of service. In France, a chief would not be permitted to force a number of the king's subjects out of the country. Dr. Johnson concurred with me, observing, that "there were an oppression chieftain a subject of the French king, he would, probably, be admonished by a letter."

During our sail, Dr. Johnson asked about the use of the dirk, with which he imagined the Highlanders cut their meat. He was told, they had a knife and fork besides to eat with. He asked, how did the women do? and was answered, some of them had a knife and fork too; but in general the men, when they had cut their meat, handed their knives and forks to the women, and they themselves eat with their fingers. The old tutor of Macdonald always eat fish with his fingers, alleging that a knife and fork gave it a bad taste. I took the liberty to observe to Dr. Johnson, that he did so. "Yes," said he, "but it is because I am short-sighted, and afraid of bones, for which reason I am not fond of eating many kinds of fish, because I must use my fingers."

Dr. McPherson's "Dissertations on Scottish Antiquities," which he had looked at when at Corrichatachin, being mentioned, he remarked, that "you might read half an hour, and ask yourself what you had been reading: there were so many words to so little matter, that there was no getting through the book."

As soon as we reached the shore, we took leave of Kingsburgh, and mounted our horses. We passed through a wild moor, in many places so soft that we were obliged to walk, which was very fattiging to Dr. Johnson. Once he had advanced on horseback to a very bad step. There was a steep declivity on his left, to which he was so near, that there was not room for him to dismount in the usual way. He tried to alight on the other side, as if he had been a young buck indeed, but in the attempt he fell at his length upon the ground; from which, however, he got up immediately without being hurt. During this dreary ride, we were sometimes relieved by a view of branches of the sea, that universal medium of connection amongst mankind. A guide, who had been sent with us from Kingsburgh, explored the way (much in the same manner as, I suppose, is pursued in the wilds of America) by observing certain marks known only to the inhabitants. We arrived at Dunvegan late in the afternoon. The great size of the castle, which is partly old and partly new, was guardian during the minority of the young heir. — Croker.
and is built upon a rock close to the sea, while the land around it presents nothing but wild, moorish, hilly, and craggy appearances, gave a rude magnificence to the scene. Having dismounted, we ascended a flight of steps, which was made by the late Macleod, for the accommodation of persons coming to him by land, there formerly being, for security, no other access to the castle but from the sea; so that visitors who came by the land were under the necessity of getting into a boat, and sailed round to the only place where it could be approached. We were introduced into a stately dining-room, and received by Lady Macleod, mother of the Laird, who, with his friend Talisker, having been detained on the road, did not arrive till some time after us.

We found the lady of the house a very polite and sensible woman, who had lived for some time in London, and had there been in Dr. Johnson's company. After we had dined, we repaired to the drawing-room, where some of the young ladies of the family, with their mother, were at tea. This room had formerly been the bed-chamber of Sir Roderick Macleod, one of the old lairds: and he chose it, because behind it there was a considerable cascade, the sound of which disposed him to sleep. Above his bed was this inscription: "Sir Rorie Macleod of Dunvegan, Knight. God send good rest!"] Rorie is the contraction of Roderick. He was called Rorie More, that is, great Rorie, not from his size, but from his spirit. Our entertainment here was so elegant a style, and reminded my fellow-traveller so much of England, that he became quite joyous. He laughed, and said, "Boswell, we came in at the wrong end of this island."

"Sir," said I, "it was best to keep this for the last." He answered, "I would have it both first and last."

Tuesday, Sept. 14. — Dr. Johnson said in the morning, "Is not this a fine lady?"

There was not a word now of his "impatience to be in civilized life;" though indeed I should beg pardon — he found it here. We had slept well, and lain long. After breakfast we surveyed the castle and the garden. Mr. Bethune, the parish minister, Magnus Macleod of Craggan, brother to Talisker, and Macleod of Bay, two substantial gentlemen of the clan, dined with us. We had admirable venison, generous wine; in a word, all that a good table has. This was really the hall of a chief. Lady Macleod had been much obliged to my father, who had settled, by arbitration, a variety of perplexed claims between her and her relation, the Laird of Brodie, which she now repaid by particular attention to me. Macleod started the subject of making women do penance in the church for fornication. Johnson. "It is right, Sir. Infamy is attached to the crime, by universal opinion, as soon as it is known. I would not be the man who would discover it, if I alone knew it, for a woman may reform; nor would I commend a parson who divulges a woman's first offence; but being once divulged, it ought to be infamous. Consider of what importance to society the chastity of women is. Upon that all the property in the world depends. We hang a thief for stealing a sheep, but the un chastity of a woman transfers sheep, and farm, and all, from the right owner. I have much more reverence for a common prostitute than for a woman who conceals her guilt. The prostitute is known. She cannot deceive: she cannot bring a strumpet in the arms of an honest man, without his knowledge." Boswell. "There is, however, a great difference between the licentiousness of a single woman, and that of a married woman." Johnson. "Yes, Sir; there is a great difference between stealing a shilling and stealing a thousand pounds; between simply taking a man's purse, and murdering him first, and then taking it. But when one begins to be vicious, it is easy to go on. Where single women are licentious, you rarely find faithful married women." Boswell. "And yet we are told, that in some nations in India, the distinction is strictly observed." Johnson. "Nay, don't give us India. That puts me in mind of Montesquieu, who is really a fellow of genius too in many respects; whenever he wants to support a strange opinion, he quotes you the practice of Japan, or of some other distant country, of which he knows nothing. To support polygamy, he tells you of the island of Formosa, where there are ten women born for one man. He had but to suppose another island, where there are ten men born for one woman, and so make a marriage between them.

At supper, Lady Macleod mentioned Dr. Cadogan's book on the gout. Johnson. "It is a good book in general, but a foolish one in particulars. It is good in general, as recommending temperance, and exercise, and cheerfulness. In that respect it is only Dr. Cheyne's book told in a new way; and there should come out such a book every thirty years, dressed in the mode of the times. It is foolish, in maintaining that the gout is not hereditary, and that one fit of it, when gone, is like a fever

\(1\) She was the daughter of Alexander Brodie, Esq., of Brodie, Lyon King at Arms. She had lately come with her daughters out of Hungary, to superintend her brother at Dunvegan. This respectable lady died in 1803. It has been said that she expressed considerable dissatisfaction at Dr. Johnson's rude behaviour at Dunvegan. Her grandson, the present Macleod, assures me that it was not so: "they were all," he says emphatically, "delighted with him;" and, indeed, his father's Memoirs give the same impression of satisfaction on all points but Osian. — Croker.

\(2\) See post, p. 237, and 10th Oct., 1779, where again Johnson argues, I think, this great moral question on too narrow grounds. — Croker.

when gone." Lady Macleod objected that the author does not practise what he teaches. 1

"No, Madam, no more than a wolf." BOSWELL. "Nor a woman, Sir?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir." Lord Macleod started at this, saying, in a low voice. "This is worse than Swift!"

Macleod of Ullinish had come in the afternoon. We were a jovial company at supper. The Laird, surrounded by so many of his clans, was to me a pleasing sight. They listened with wonder and pleasure, while Dr. Johnson harangued. I am vexed that I cannot take down his full strain of eloquence.

Wednesday, Sept. 15. — The gentlemen of the clan went away early in the morning to the harbour of Lochbracadale, to take leave of some of their friends who were going to America. It was a very wet day. We looked at Rorie More's horn, which is a large cow's horn, with the mouth of it ornamented with silver curiously carved. It holds rather more than a bottle and a half. Every Laird of Macleod, it is said, must, as a proof of his manhood, drink it off full of claret without laying it down. From Rorie More many of the branches of the family are descended; in particular, the Talisker branch; so that his name is much talked of. We also saw his bow, which hardly any man now can bend, and his claymore 2, which was wielded with both hands, and is of a prodigious size. We saw here some old pieces of iron armour, immensely heavy. The broad-sword now used, though called the claymore (i.e. the great sword), is much smaller than that used in Rorie More's time. There is hardly a target now to be found in the Highlands. After the disarming act, they made them serve as covers to their butter-milk barrels; a kind of change, like beating spears into pruning-hooks.

Sir George Mackenzie's Works (the folio edition) happened to lie in a window in the dining-room. I asked Dr. Johnson to look at the Characteres Advocateorum. He allowed him power of mind, and that he understood very well what he tells; but said, that there was too much declamation, and that the Latin was not correct. He found fault with appropriandum in the character of Gilmour. I tried him with the opposition between gloria and palma, in the comparison between Gilmour and Nisbet, which Lord Hailes, in his "Catalogue of the Lords of Session," thinks difficult to be understood. The words are, "penes illum gloria, penes hunc palma." 3 In a short Account of the Kirk of Scotland, which I published some years ago, I applied these words to 1 This was a general reflection against Dr. Cadogan, when his very popular book was first published. It was said, that whatever he precepts he preaches to others, he himself indulges freely in the bottle. But I have since had the pleasure of becoming acquainted with him, and, if his own example may be believed (and I have never heard it impeached), his course of life has been conformable to his doctrine. — BOSWELL. Dr. Cadogan died in 1735, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. — Wright.

the two contending parties, and explained them thus: "The popular party has most eloquence; Dr. Robertson's party most influence." I was very desirous to hear Dr. Johnson's explanation. Johnson. "I see no difficulty. Gilmour was admired for his parts; Nisbet carried his cause by his skill in law. Palma is victory." I observed, that the character of Nicholson, in this book, resembled that of Burke; for it is said, in one place, "in omnes lausos et jocos se sapere resolevatur;" and, in another, "sed accipitris more, conspectu alta, quando auctorum sublimi se prorogens volat, in praedam mirro impetu descendebat." 2 Johnson. "No, Sir; I never heard Burke make a good joke in my life." Boswell. "But, Sir, you will allow he is a hawk." Dr. Johnson, thinking that I meant this of his joking, said, "No, Sir, he is not the hawk there. He is the beetle in the mire." I still adhered to my metaphor; "but he soars as the hawk." Johnson. "Yes, Sir; but he catches nothing." Macleod asked, what is the particular excellence of Burke's eloquence? Johnson. "Copiousness and fertility of allusion; a power of diversifying his matter, by placing it in various relations. Burke has great information, and great command of language; though, in my opinion, it has not in every respect the highest elegance. Boswell. "Do you think, Sir, that Burke has read Cicero much?" Johnson. "I don't believe it, Sir. Burke has great knowledge, great fluency of words, and great promptness of ideas, so that he can speak with great illustration on any subject that comes before him. He is neither like Cicero, nor like Demosthenes, nor like any one else, but speaks as well as he can."

In the sixty-fifth page of the first volume of Sir George Mackenzie, Dr. Johnson pointed out a paragraph beginning with Aristotle, and told me there was an error in the text, which he bade me try to discover. I was lucky enough to hit it at once. As the passage is printed, it is said that the devil answers even in engines. I corrected it to — ever inuenitus. "Sir," said he, "you are a good critic. This would have been a great thing to do in the text of an ancient author." Thursday, Sept. 16. — Last night much care was taken of Dr. Johnson, who was still distressed by his cold. He had hitherto most strangely slept without a nightcap. Miss Macleod made him a large flannel one, and he was prevailed with to drink a little brandy when he was going to bed. He has great virtue in not drinking wine or any fermented liquor, because, as he acknowledged to us, he could not do it in moderation. Lady Macleod would hardly believe him, and said, "I am sure, Sir, you would not carry it too far." Johnson. "Nay, Madam, it carried me. I took the opportunity of a long illness to leave it off. It was then prescribed to me not to drink wine; and having broken off the habit, I have never returned to it."

In the argument on Tuesday night, about natural genius, Dr. Johnson denied that any child was better than another, but by difference of instruction; though, in consequence of greater attention being paid to instruction by one child than another, and of a variety of imperceptible causes, such as instruction being counteracted by servants, a notion was conceived, that of two children, equally well educated, one was naturally much worse than another. He owned, this morning, that one might have a greater aptitude to learn than another, and that we inherit dispositions from our parents. "I inherited," said he, "a vile melancholy from my father, which has made me mad all my life, at least not sober." Lady Macleod wondered he should tell this. "Madam," said I, "he knows that with that madness he is superior to other men."

I have often been astonished with what exactness and perspicuity he will explain the process of any art. He this morning explained to us all the operation of coining, and, at night, all the operation of brewing, so very clearly, that Mr. McQueen said, when he heard the first, he thought he had been bred in the Mint; when he heard the second, that he had been bred a brewer.

I was elated by the thought of having been able to entice such a man to this remote part of the world. A ludicrous, yet just image presented itself to my mind, which I expressed to the company. I compared myself to a dog who has got hold of a large piece of meat, and runs away with it to a corner, where he may devour it in peace, without any fear of others taking it from him. "In London, Reynolds, Beaucler, and all of them, are contending who shall enjoy Dr. Johnson's conversation. We are feasting upon it, undisturbed, at Dunvegan."

It was still a storm of wind and rain. Dr. Johnson however walked out with Macleod, and saw Hortie More's cascade in full perfection. Colonel Macleod, instead of being all life and gaiety, as I have seen him, was at present grave, and somewhat depressed by his anxious concern about Macleod's affairs, and Buy from him, 3 Mr. Boswell was, we see, the first to publish this fact, though he afterwards chose to blame others for alluding to it. Dryden's aphorism, that "great wit," meaning mental powers generally, "is nearly allied to madness," is so true as to have become a proverb; but it stands on older and graver authority. Seneca says, Natura magna ingenii, sine mutari dementia.—De Tranq. Anim. c. xvi. v. 71. — Ciceron.

by finding some gentlemen of the clan by no means disposed to act a generous or affectionate part to their chief in his distress, but bargaining with him as with a stranger. However, he was agreeable and polite, and Dr. Johnson said he was a very pleasing man. My fellow-traveller and I talked of going to Sweden; and, while we were settling our plan, I expressed a pleasure in the prospect of seeing the king. Johnson. "I doubt, Sir, if he would speak to us," Colonel Macleod said, "I am sure Mr. Boswell would speak to him." But seeing me a little disconcerted by his remark, he politely added, "and with great propriety." Here let me offer a short defence of that propensity in my disposition, to which this gentleman alluded. It has procured me much happiness. I hope it does not deserve so hard a name as either forwardness or impudence. If I know myself, it is nothing more than an eagerness to share the society of men distinguished either by their rank or their talents, and a diligence to attain what I desire. If a man is praised for seeking knowledge, though mountains and seas are in his way, may he not be pardoned, whose ardour, in the pursuit of the same object, leads him to encounter difficulties as great, though of a different kind?

After the ladies were gone from the table, we talked of the Highlanders not having sheets; and this led us to consider the advantage of wearing linen. Johnson. "All animal substances are less cleanly than vegetables. Wool, of which flannel is made, is an animal substance; flannel therefore is not so cleanly as linen. I remember I used to think tar dirty; but when I knew it to be only a preparation of the juice of the pine, I thought so no longer. It is not disagreeable to have the gum that oozes from a plum-tree upon your fingers, because it is vegetable; but if you have any candle-grease, any tallow upon your fingers, you are uneasy till you rub it off. — I have often thought that, if I kept a seraglio, the ladies should all wear linen gowns, or cotton — I mean stuffs made of vegetable substances. I would have no silk; you cannot tell when it is clean; it will be very nasty before it is perceived to be so. Linen detects its own dirtiness."

To hear the grave Dr. Samuel Johnson, "that majestic teacher of moral and religious wisdom," while sitting solemn in an arm-chair in the isle of Sky, talk, ex cathedra, of his keeping a seraglio, and acknowledge that the supposition had often been in his thoughts, struck me so forcibly with judicious contrast, that I could not but laugh immoderately. He was too proud to submit, even for a moment, to be the object of ridicule, and instantly retaliated with such keen sarcastic wit, and such a variety of degrading images, of every one of which I was the object, that, though I can bear such attacks as well as most men, I yet found myself so much the sport of all the company, that I would gladly expunge from my mind every trace of this severe retort.

Talking of our friend Langton’s house in Lincolnshire, he said "the old house of the family was burnt. A temporary building was erected in its room; and to this day they have been always adding as the family increased. It is like a shirt made for a man when he was a child, and enlarged always as he grows older.”

We talked to-night of Luther’s allowing the Landgrave of Hesse two wives, and that it was with the consent of the wife to whom he was first married. Johnson. "There was no harm in this, so far as she was only concerned, because volenti non fit injuria. But it was an offence against the general order of society, and against the law of the Gospel, by which one man and one woman are to be united. No man can have two wives, but by preventing somebody else from having one." 2

Friday, Sept. 17.—After dinner yesterday, we had a conversation upon cunning. Macleod said that he was not afraid of cunning people; but would let them play their tricks about him like monkeys. "But," said I, "they’ll scratch;" and Mr. McQueen added, "they’ll invent new tricks, as soon as you find out what they do." Johnson. "Cunning has effect from the credulity of others, rather than from the abilities of those who are cunning. It requires no extraordinary talents to lie and deceive." This led us to consider whether it did not require great abilities to be very wicked. Johnson. "It requires great abilities to have the power of being very wicked; but not to be very wicked. A man who has the power, which great abilities procure him, may use it well or ill; and it requires more abilities to use it well, than to use it ill. Wickedness is always easier than virtue; for it takes the short cut to every thing. It is much easier to steal a hundred pounds, than to get it by labour, or any other way. Consider only what act of wickedness requires great abilities to commit it, when once the person who is to do it has the power; for there is the distinction. It requires great abilities to conquer an army, but none to massacre it after it is conquered.”

The weather this day was rather better than any that we had since we came to Dunvegan. Mr. McQueen had often mentioned a curious piece of antiquity near this, which he called a temple of the goddess Anaitis. Having often talked of going to see it, he and I set out after breakfast, attended by his servant, a fellow

1 And to the world much amusement and instruction. But for this obtrusive propensity we should not have had this work. — Croker.
2 This last argument is I think a false, and, at all events, a too narrow ground on which to rest this great doctrine — a doctrine which is the foundation of all human civilization, and of all individual happiness. See ante, p. 354, and post, 16th Oct. 1779. — Croker.
quite like a savage. I must observe here, that in Sky there seems to be much idleness; for men and boys follow you, as cobs follow passengers upon a road. The usual figure of a Sky-boy is a lown with bare legs and feet, a dirty kit, ragged coat and waistcoat, a bare head, and a stick in his hand, which, I suppose, is partly to help the lazy rogue to walk, partly to serve as a kind of a defensive weapon. We walked what is called two miles, but is probably four, from the castle, till we came to the sacred place. The country round is a black drear, a moor on all sides, except to the sea-coast, and the farm of Bay shows some good land. The place itself is green ground, being well drained, by means of a deep gleu on each side, in both of which runs a rivulet with a good quantity of water, forming several cascades, which make a considerable appearance and sound. The first thing we came to was an earthen mound, or dyke, extending from the one precipice to the other. A little farther on was a strong stone wall, not high, but very thick, extending in the same manner. On the outside of it were the ruins of two houses, one on each side of the entry or gate to it. The wall is built all along of uncemented stones, but of so large a size as to make a very firm and durable rampart. It has been built all about the consecrated ground, except where the precipice is steep enough to form an enclosure of itself. The sacred spot contains more than two acres. There are within it the ruins of many houses, none of them large,—a cairn,—and many graves marked by clusters of stones. Mr. M'Queen insisted that the ruin of a small building, standing east and west, was actually the temple of the goddess Anaitis, where her statue was kept, and from whence processions were made to wash it in one of the brooks. There is, it must be owned, a hollow road visible for a good way from the entrance; but Mr. M'Queen, with the keen eye of an antiquary, traced it much farther than I could perceive it. There is not above a foot and a half in height of the walls now remaining; and the whole extent of the building was never, I imagine, greater than an ordinary Highland house. Mr. M'Queen has collected a great deal of learning on the subject of the temple of Anaitis; and I had endeavoured, in my Journal, to state such particulars as might give some idea of it, and of the surrounding scenery; but from the great difficulty of describing visible objects, I found my account so unsatisfactory, that my readers would probably have exclaimed, "And write about it, goddess, and about it!" and therefore I have omitted it.

When we got home, and were again at table with Dr. Johnson, we first talked of portraits. He agreed in thinking them valuable in families. I wished to know which he preferred, fine portraits, or those of which the merit was resemblance. Johnson. "Sir, their chief excellence is being like." Boswell. "Are you of that opinion as to the portraits of ancestors, whom one has never seen?" Johnson. "It then becomes of more consequence that they should be like; and I would have them in the dress of the times, which makes a piece of history. One should like to see how Rorie More looked. Truth, Sir, is of the greatest value in these things." Mr. M'Queen observed, that if you think it of no consequence whether portraits are like, if they are but well painted, you may be indifferent whether a piece of history is true or not, if well told.

Dr. Johnson said at breakfast to-day, "that it was but of late that historians bestowed pains and attention in consulting records, to attain to accuracy. Bacon, in writing his History of Henry VII., does not seem to have consulted any, but to have just taken what he found in other histories, and blended it with what he learned by tradition." He agreed with me that there should be a chronicle kept in every considerable family, to preserve the characters and transactions of successive generations.

After dinner I started the subject of the temple of Anaitis. Mr. M'Queen had laid stress on the name given to the place by the country people,—Ainnit; and added, "I knew not what to make of this piece of antiquity, till I met with the Anaitidis delubrum in Lydie, mentioned by Pausanias and the elder Pliny." Dr. Johnson, with his usual acuteness, examined Mr. M'Queen as to the meaning of the word Ainnit, in Erse; and it proved to be a water-place, or a place near water, "which," said Mr. M'Queen, "agrees with all the descriptions of the temples of that goddess, which were situated near rivers, that there might be water to wash the statue." Johnson. "Nay, Sir, the argument from the name is gone. The name is exhausted by what we see. We have no occasion to go to a distance for what we can pick up under our feet. Had it been an accidental name, the similarity between it and Anaitis might have had something in it; but it turns out to be a mere physiological name." Macleod said, Mr. M'Queen's knowledge of etymology had destroyed his conjecture. Johnson. "Yes, Sir; Mr. M'Queen is like the eagle mentioned by Waller, who was shot with an arrow feathered from his own wing." Mr. M'Queen would not, however, give up his conjecture. Johnson. "You have one possibility for you, and all possibilities against you. It is possible it may be the temple

2 The simple common sense of this remark should silence those who pretend to undervalue portrait painting, and to prefer, as a higher branch of the art, what they call history, but which is generally a mere fable, and a very uninteresting one, while portraiture as Johnson described it, and as of Anaitis; but it is also possible that it may be a fortification; or it may be a place of Christian worship, as the first Christians often chose remote and wild places, to make an impression on the mind; or, if it was an heathen temple, it may have been built near a river, for the purpose of lustration; and there are such a multitude of divinities, to whom it may have been dedicated, that the chance of its being a temple of Anaitis is hardly anything. It is like throwing a grain of sand upon the seashore to-day, and thinking you may find it to-morrow. No, Sir, this temple, like many an ill-built edifice, tumbles down before it is roofed it." In his triumph over the reverend antiquarian, he indulged himself in a conceit; for, some vestige of the altar of the goddess being much insisted on in support of the hypothesis, he said, "Mr. McQueen is fighting pro aris et foésis."

It was wonderful how well time passed in a remote castle, and in dreary weather. After supper, we talked of Pennant. It was objected that he was superfluous. Dr. Johnson defended him warmly. He said, "Pennant has greater variety of inquiry than almost any man, and has told us more than perhaps one in ten thousand could have done, in the time that he took. He has not said what he was to tell; so you cannot find fault with him for what he has not told. If a man comes to look for fishes, you cannot blame him if he does not attend to fowls." "But," said Colonel Macleod, "he mentions the unreasonable rise of rents in the Highlands, and says, 'the gentlemen are for emptying the bag without filling it,' for that is the phrase he uses. Why does he not tell how to fill it?" Jonsson, "Sir, there is no end of negative criticism. He tells what he observes, and as much as he chooses. If he tells what is not true, you may find fault with him; but, though he tells that the land is not well cultivated, he is not obliged to tell how it may be well cultivated. If I tell that many of the Highlanders go barefooted, I am not obliged to tell how they may get shoes. Pennant tells a fact. He need go no farther, except he pleases. He exhausts nothing; and no subject whatever has yet been exhausted. But Pennant has surely told a great deal. Here is a man six feet high, and you are angry because he is not seven." Notwithstanding this eloquent Oratio pro Pennanno, which they who have read this gentleman's Tours, and recollect the savage and the shopkeeper at Monboddo, will probably impute to the spirit of contradiction, I still think that he had better have given more attention to fewer things, than have thrown together such a number of imperfect accounts.

1 Johnson writes: "Boswell, with some of his troublesome kindness, has informed this family, and reminded me, that the 18th of September is my birthday. The return of my birthday, if I remember it, fills me with thoughts which it seems to be the general care of humanity to escape. I can now look back upon three score and four years, in which little has been done, and little has been enjoyed; a life diversified CHAPTER XXXIX.

Saturday, Sept. 18.—Before breakfast, Dr. Johnson came up to my room, to forbid me to mention that it was his birthday; but I told him I had done it already; at which he was displeased—I suppose from wishing to have nothing particular done on his account. Lady Macleod and I got into a warm dispute. She wanted to build a house upon a farm which she has taken, about five miles from the castle, and to make gardens and other ornaments there; all of which I approved of; but insisted that the seat of the family should always be upon the rock of Dunvegan. Johnson. "Ay, in time we'll build all round this rock. You may make a very good house at the farm; but it must not be such as to tempt the Laird of Macleod to go thither to reside. Most of the great families of England have a secondary residence, which is called a jointure-house; let the new house be of that kind." The lady insisted that the rock was very inconvenient; that there was no place near it where a good garden could be made; that it must always be a rude place; that it was a Herculean labour to make a dinner here. I was vexed to find the alloy of modern refinement in a lady who had so much old family spirit. "Madam," said I, "if once you quit this rock, there is no knowing where you may settle. You move five miles first; then to St. Andrew's, as the late Laird did; then to Edinburgh; and so on till you end at Hampstead, or in France. No, no; keep to the rock; it is the very jewel of the estate. It looks as if it had been let down from heaven by the four corners, to be the residence of a chief. Have all the comforts and conveniences of life upon it, but never leave Rorie More's cascade." "But," said she, "is it not enough if we keep it? Must we never have more convenience than Rorie More had? he had his beef brought to dinner in one basket, by misery, spent part in the sluggishness of penury, and part under the violence of pain, in gloomy discontent or impotent distress. But, perhaps, I am better than I should have been, if I had been less afflicted. With this I will try to be content." — Letters. See pour, Sept. 17. 1777, his dilate to hear his birthday noticed. — Cocks.
and his bread in another. Why not as well be Rorie More all over, as live upon his rock? And should not we tire, in looking perpetually on this rock? It is very well for you, who have a fine place, and every thing easy, to talk thus, and think of chaining honest folks to a rock. You would not live upon it yourself."

"Yes, Madam," said I, "I would live upon it, were I Laird of Macleod, and should be unhappy if I were not upon it." Johnson (with a strong voice and most determined manner).

"Madam, rather than quit the old rock, Boswell would live in the pit; he would make his bed in the dungeon." I felt a degree of elevation, at finding my resolute feudal enthusiasm thus confirmed by such a sanction. The lady was puzzled a little. She still returned to her pretty farm rich ground—fine garden.

"Madam," said Dr. Johnson, "were they in Asia, I would not leave the rock." My opinion on this subject is still the same. An ancient family residence ought to be a primary object; and though the situation of Dunvegan be such that little can be done here in gardening or pleasure ground, yet, in addition to the veneration acquired by the lapse of time, it has many circumstances of natural grandeur, suited to the seat of a Highland chief: it has the sea—lands—rocks—hills—a noble cascade; and when the family is again in opulence, something may be done by art. 2

Mr. Donald M'Queen went away to-day, in order to preach at Braccadale next day. We were so comfortably situated at Dunvegan, that Dr. Johnson could hardly be moved from it. I proposed to him that we should leave it on Monday. "No, Sir," said he, "I will not go before Wednesday. I will have some more of this good." However, as the weather was at this season so bad, and so very uncertain, and we had a great deal to do yet, Mr. M'Queen and I prevailed with him to agree to set out on Monday, if the day should be good. Mr. M'Queen, though it was inconvenient for him to be absent from his harvest, engaged to wait on Monday at Ulinish for us. When he was going away, Dr. Johnson said, "I shall ever retain a great regard for you;" then asked him if he had the "Rambler." Mr. M'Queen said, "No, but my brother has it." Johnson. "Have you the "Idler?" M'Queen. "No, Sir." Johnson. "Then I will order one for you at Edinburgh, which you will keep in remembrance of me." Mr. M'Queen was much pleased with this. He expressed to me, in the strongest terms, his admiration of Dr. Johnson's wonderful knowledge, and every other quality for which he is distinguished. I asked Mr. M'Queen if he was satisfied with being a minister in Sky. He said he was; but he owned that his forefathers having been so long there, and his having been born there, made a chief ingredient in forming his contentment. I should have mentioned, that on our left hand, between Portree and Dr. Macleod's house, Mr. M'Queen told me there had been a college of the Knights Templars; that tradition said so; and that there was a ruin remaining of their church, which had been burnt: but I confess Dr. Johnson has weakened my belief in remote tradition. In the dispute about Auaiti, Mr. M'Queen said, Asia Minor was peopled by Scythians, and, as they were the ancestors of the Celts, the same religion might be in Asia Minor and Sky. Johnson. "Alack, Sir, what can a nation that has no letters tell of its origin? I am always difficulty to be patience when I hear authors gravely quoted, as giving accounts of savage nations, which accounts they had from the savages themselves. What can the M'Craas tell about themselves a thousand years ago? 3 There is no tracing the connection of ancient nations, but by language; and therefore I am always sorry when any language is lost, because languages are the pedigree of nations. If you find the same language in distant countries, you may be sure that the inhabitants of each have been the same people; that is to say, if you find the languages a good deal the same; for a word here and there being the same, will not do. Thus Butler, in his Hudibras, remembering that penguin, in the Straits of Magellan, signifies a bird with a white head,

1 Dunvegan well deserves the speech which was made by Dr. Johnson in its defence. Its greatest inconvenience was that of access. This had been originally obtained from the sea, by a subterranean staircase, partly arched, partly cut in the rock, which, winding up through the cliff, opened into the court of the castle. This passage, at all times very inconvenient, had been abandoned, and was ruinous. A very inconvenient substitute had been made by a road, which, rising from the harbour, reached the bottom of the moat, and then ascended to the gate by a very long stair. The present chief, whom I call a friendly friend, has made a perfectly convenient and characteristic access, which gives a direct approach to the further side of the moat, in front of the castle gate, and surrounds the chasm by a bridge, which would have delighted Rorie More himself. I may add, that neither Johnson nor Boswell were antiquaries, otherwise they must have remarked, though the Castle of Dunvegan, the fated or fairy bann, said to be given to the clan by Banan, and a curious drinking cup (probably) said to have belonged to the family when king, are certainly of very venerable antiquity.—Walter Scott.

2 Something has indeed been, partly in the way of accommodation, partly in improvements yet more estimable, under the direction of the present beneficent Lady of Macleod [Miss Stephenson]. She has completely acquired the language of her husband's clan, in order to qualify herself to be their effectual benefactress. She has erected schools, which she superintends herself, to introduce among them the benefits, knowledge, and comforts of more civilized society; and a young and beautiful woman has done more for the enlarged happiness of this primitive people, than has been achieved for ages before.—Walter Scott.

3 "What can the M'Craas tell of themselves a thousand years ago?" More than the Doctor would suppose, I have a copy of the family history, written by Mr. John Macrae, minister of Dingwall, in Ross-shire, in 1705. In this history they are averred to have come over with those Fitzgerald now holding the name of M'Kenzie, at the period of the battle of Largs, in 1263. It was indulged with a copy of this pedigree, by the consent of the principal persons of the clan in 1836, and has been the original of many dissertations for some time. It is modestly drawn up, and apparently with all the accuracy to which tradition must be much relied upon. The name of M'Crae was of course softened in the Highlands into Mac Ra, Mac Corow, M. Eze, &c.; and in the Lowlands, where the patronymic was often dropped, by the names of Craw, Crow, &c.—Walter Scott.
and that the same word has, in Wales, the signification of a white-headed wench (pen head, and guin white), by way of ridicule, concludes that the people of those straits are Welsh.

A young gentleman of the name of M'Lean, nephew to the Laird of the Isle of Muck, came this morning; and just as we sat down to dinner came the Laird of the Isle of Muck himself, his lady, sister to Talisker, two other ladies, their relations, and a daughter of the late M'Leod of Hamer, who wrote a treatise on the second sight, under the designation of "Theophilus Insulanus." It was somewhat droll to hear this laird called by his title. Muck would have sounded ill; so he was called Isle of Muck, which went off with great readiness. The name, as now written, is unusually, but is not so bad in the original Erse, which is Mouach, signifying the Sons' Island.

Buchanans calls it Insula Porcorum. It is so called from its form. Some call it the Isle of Monk. The Laird insists that this is the proper name. It was formerly church-land belonging to Iscolmkill, and a hermit lived in it. It is two miles long, and about three quarters of a mile broad. The Laird said, he had seven score of souls upon it. Last year he had eighty persons inoculated, mostly children, but some of them eighteen years of age. He agreed with the surgeon to come and do it at half a crown a head. It is very fertile in corn, of which they export some; and its ceasts abound in fish. A tailor comes there six times in a year. They get a good blacksmith from the Isle of Eigg.

Sunday, Sept. 19.—It was rather worse weather than any that we had yet. At breakfast Dr. Johnson said, "Some cunning men choose fools for their wives, thinking to manage them, but they always fail. There is a spaniel fool, and a mule fool. The spaniel fool may be made to do by beating. The mule fool will neither do by words nor blows; and the spaniel fool often turns mule at last: and suppose a fool to be made do pretty well, you must have the continual trouble of making her do. Depend upon it, no woman is the worse for sense and knowledge." Whether afterwards he meant merely to say a polite thing, or to give his opinion, I could not be sure; but he added, "Men know that women are an over-match for them, and therefore they choose the weakest or most ignorant. If they did not think so, they never could be afraid of women knowing as much as themselves." In justice to the sex, I think it but candid to acknowledge, that in a subsequent conversation he told me that he was serious in what he had said.

He came to my room this morning before breakfast, to read me his Journal, which he has done all along. He often before said, "I take great delight in reading it." To-day he said, "You improve: it grows better and better." I observed, there was a danger of my getting a habit of writing in a slovenly manner. "Sir," said he, "it is not written in a slovenly manner. It might be printed, were the subject fit for printing." While Mr. Bethune preached to us in the dining-room, Dr. Johnson sat in his own room, where I saw lying before him a volume of Lord Bacon's works. "The Inquiry of Christian Piety," Monboddo's "Origin of Language," and Sterne's Sermons. He asked me to-day, how it happened that we were so little together; I told him my Journal took up much time. Yet, on reflection, it appeared strange to me, that although I will run from one end of London to another, to pass an hour with him, I should omit to seize any spare time to be in his company, when I am settled in the same house with him. But my Journal is really a task of much time and labour, and he forbids me to contract it.

I omitted to mention, in its place, that Dr. Johnson told Mr. M'Queen that he had found the belief of the second sight universal in Sky, except among the clergy, who seemed determined against it. I took the liberty to observe to Mr. M'Queen, that the clergy were actuated by a kind of vanity. "The world," say they, "takes us to be credulous men in a remote corner. We'll show them that we are more enlightened than they think." The worthy man said, that his disbelief of it was from his not finding sufficient evidence; but I could perceive that he was prejudiced against it.

After dinner to-day, we talked of the extraordinary fact of Lady Grange's being sent to

1 The work of "Theophilus Insulanus" was written in as credulous a style as either Dr. Johnson or his biographer could have desired. WALTER SCOTT.
2 Poetry.—Mr. William Macpherson informed me,—of sea-reve or seals. CROKER.
3 As I have faithfully recorded so many minute particulars, I hope I shall be pardoned for inserting so flattering an eccumenon on what is now offered to the public. ROSWELL.
4 By the very use of this word, Mr. Boswell shows, that he himself was prejudiced in favor of the second sight, either because it suited the credulous temper of his own mind, or because it was like a national heath. The clergy were probably not prejudiced against it, otherwise than as being the best educated and most intelligent persons in those regions; they saw the absurdity of the fables on which this superstition was supported. General Mackeoc found Johnson more willing to believe in the second sight than in Ordinary. And Boswell insists of, being an absolute believer. See post, under 24th March, 1775.—CROKER.
5 The true story of this lady, which happened in this cen-
St. Kilda, and confined there for several years, without any means of relief. Dr. Johnson said, if Macleod would let it be known that he had such a place for naughty ladies, he might make it a very profitable island. We had, in the course of our tour, heard of St. Kilda poetry. Dr. Johnson observed, “It must be very poor, because they have very few images.” Boswell. “There may be a poetical genius shown in combining these, and in making poetry of them.” Johnson. “Sir, a man cannot make fire but in proportion as he has fuel. He cannot coin guineas but in proportion as he has gold.” At tea he talked of his intending to go to Italy in 1775. Macleod said, he would like Paris better. Johnson. “No, Sir: there are none of the French literati now alive, to visit whom I would cross a sea. I can find in Buffon’s book all that he can say.”

After supper he said, “I am sorry that prize-fighting is gone out; every art should be preserved, and the art of defence is surely important. It is absurd that our soldiers should have swords, and not be taught the use of them. Prize-fighting made people accustomed not to be alarmed at seeing their own blood, or feeling a little pain from a wound. I think the heavy glaive was an ill-contrived weapon. A man could only strike once with it. It employed both his hands, and he must of course be soon fatigued with wielding it; so that if his antagonist could only keep playing awhile, he was sure of him. I would fight with a dirk against Rorie More’s sword. I could ward off a blow with a dirk, and then run in upon my enemy. When within that heavy sword, I have him; he is quite helpless, and I could stab him at my leisure, like a cat. It is thought by sensible military men, that the English do not enough avail themselves of their superior strength of body against the French; for that must always have a great advantage in pushing with bayonets. I have heard an officer say, that if women could be made to stand, they would do as well as men in mere interchange of bullets from a distance; but if a body of men should come close up to them, then to be sure they must be overcome; now,” said he, “in the same manner the weaker-bodied French must be overcome by our strong soldiers.”

The subject of duelling was introduced. Johnson. “There is no case in England where one or other of the combatants must die: if you have overcome your adversary by disarming him, that is sufficient, though you should not kill him; your honour, or the honour of your family, is restored, as much as it can be by a duel. It is cowardly to force your antagonist to renew the combat, when you know that you have the advantage of him by superior skill. You might just as well go and cut his throat while he is asleep in his bed. When a duel begins, it is supposed there may be an equality; because it is not always skill that prevails. It depends much on presence of mind; nay, on accidents. The wind may be in a man’s face. He may fall. Many such things may decide the superiority. A man is sufficiently punished by being called out, and subjected to the risk that is in a duel.” But on my suggesting that the injured person is equally subjected to risk, he fairly owned he could not explain the rationality of duelling.

Monday, Sept. 20.—When I awakened, the brother of the Earl of Mar, and a Lord of Session (and), his family, and a number of viscounts, and one viscount, and a husband, she is said to have thrown out hints that she knew as much as would cost him his life. The judge probably thought tho’ Mr. Justice Matheson, that he was aware of the state of domestic affairs, when the wife has it in her power to hang the husband. Lady Grange was the more to be dreaded, as she rams of a vindictive race, being the grandchild of that Chieftain of Dalry, who assassinated Sir George Lockhart, the Lord President. Many persons of importance in the Highlands were concerned in removing her testimony. The notorious Lovat, with a party of his men, were the direct agents in carrying her off (see ante, p. 55, n. 3); and St. Kilda, belonging then to Macleod, was selected as the place of confinement. The name by which she was spoken or written of was Cargach, an ominous distinction, corresponding to what is called subject in the lecture-room of an anatomist, or shot in the stall of the Westport murderers.—WALTER SCOTT. Rachel Chiesley was, as Mr. Chambers informs me, the daughter, not the grand-daughter, of the murderer. The Earl of Mar, restored in 1824, was her grand-daughter. She was buried, as Macleod informs me, at Dunvegan.—Croker.

1 In “Caritare’s State Papers,” we find an authentic narrative of Conta, a catholic priest, who was put in prison, being seized by some of Lord Scarfford’s people, and detained prisoner in the Island of Harris several years; he was fed with bread and water, and lodged in a house where he was exposed to the rains and cold. Sir James Ogilvy writes, June 18, 1667, “that the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Advocate, and six of the most famous of their ringleaders, are to return to Canna, and to use such effectual methods to have this redressed. Connor was then still detained.”—p. 316. This shows what private oppressions were practised, and how often the jus vocis was violated. In the same collection, the Earl of Argyle gives a picturesque account of an embassy from the great M‘Neil of Barra, as that insular chief used to be denounced. “1 received a letter yesterday from M‘Neil of Barra, who lives very far from the Low Countries, and who is a generous and liberal service, which had made you laugh to see his entry. The style of his letter runs as if he were of another kingdom.”—p. 6, 19, wholly superseded, in these countries, by the use of pistols, a weapon which, generally speaking, is more equal than the sword could be. —Croker.

2 I doubt the justice of my fellow-traveller’s remark concerning the French literati, many of whom, I am told, have considerable merit in conversation, as well as in their writings. That of M. de Buffon, in particular, I am well assured, is highly instructive and entertaining.—Boswell. At all events he would have had more literary conversation in France, than he could have expected in Italy; he knew little or no Italian, and his pronunciation of Latin would have been hardly intelligible. —Croker, 1846.

3 Mrs. Piozzi says, “Mr. Johnson was very convervant in the art of attack and defence by boxing, which science he had learned from his uncle Andrew, I believe; and I have heard him descend upon the age when people were received, and when rejected, in the schools once held for that brutal amusement, much to the admiration of those who had no expectation of his skill in such matters. —See ante, p. 198, n. 9.—Croker.

4 I think it right, as matter of historical fact, to record that Johnson was mistaken in saying that there was no case in which one of the parties “must die.” Duelling has happily gone out of fashion of late years, but there always were, and still I suppose would be, cases in which mortal reparation would be the better. Of course, I mean in the case of a duel to a man, on the dishonour of a woman. —Croker, 1846.

5 Johnson considers duels as only fought with swords, a practice, low, wholly superseded, in these countries, by the use of pistols, a weapon which, generally speaking, is more equal than the sword could be.—Croker.
storm was higher still. It abated about nine, and the sun shone; but it rained again very soon, and it was not a day for travelling. At breakfast, Dr. Johnson told us, "there was once a pretty good tavern in Catharine Street in the Strand, where very good company met in an evening, and each man called for his own half-pint of wine, or gin, if he pleased; they were frugal men, and nobody paid but for what he himself drank. The house furnished no supper; but a woman attended with sulted pies, which any body might purchase. I was invited this time, and dined by Cumming the Quaker; and used to go there sometimes when I drank wine. In the last age, when my mother lived in London, there were two sets of people, those who gave the wall, and those who took it; the peaceable and the quarrelsome. When I returned to Lichfield, after having been in London, my mother asked me, whether I was one of those who gave the wall, or those who took it. Now, it is fixed that every man keeps to the right; or, if one is taking the wall, another yields it, and it is never a dispute." He was very severe on a lady whose name was mentioned. He said, he would have sent her to St. Kilda. That she was as bad as negative badness could be, and stood in the way of what was good; that insipid beauty would not go a great way; and that such a woman might be cut out of a cabboge, if there was a skilful artificer.

Macleod was too late in coming to breakfast. Dr. Johnson said, laziness was worse than the tooth-ache. Boswell. "I cannot agree with you, Sir; a basin of cold water, or a horse-whip, will cure laziness." Johnson. "No, Sir; it will only put off the fit; it will not cure the disease. I have been trying to cure my laziness all my life, and could not do it." Boswell. "But if a man does in a shorter time what might be the labour of a life, there is nothing to be said against him." Johnson (perceiving at once that I alluded to him and his Dictionary) "Suppose that flattery to be true, the consequence would be, that the world would have no right to censure a man; but that will not justify him to himself."

After breakfast, he said to me, "A Highland chief should now endeavour to do every thing to raise his rents, by means of the industry of his people. Formerly, it was right for him to have his house full of idle fellows; they were his defenders, his servants, his dependants, his friends. Now they may be better employed. The system of things is now so much altered, that the family cannot have influence but by riches, because it has no longer the power of ancient feudal times. An individual of a family may have it; but it cannot now belong to a family, unless you could have a perpetuity of men with the same views. Macleod has four times the land that the Duke of Bedford has. I think, said old Dr. Johnson, he may in time make himself the greatest man in the King's dominions; for land may always be improved to a certain degree. I would never have any man sell land, to throw money into the funds, as is often done, or to try any other species of trade. Depend upon it, this rage of trade will destroy itself. You and I shall not see it; but the time will come when there will be an end of it. Trade is like gaming. If a whole company are gamblers, play must cease; for there is nothing to be won. When all nations are traders, there is nothing to be gained by trade, and it will stop first where it is brought to the greatest perfection. Then the proprietors of land only will be the great men." I observed, it was hard that Macleod should find ingratitude in so many of his people. Johnson. "Sir, gratitude is a fruit of great cultivation; you do not find it among gross people." I doubt of this. Nature seems to have implanted gratitude in all living creatures. The lion, mentioned by Aulus Gellius, had it. It appears to me that culture, which brings luxury and selfishness with it, has a tendency rather to weaken than promote this affection.

Dr. Johnson said this morning, when talking of our setting out, that he was in the state in which Lord Bacon represents kings. He desired the end, but did not like the means. He wished much to get home, but was unwilling to travel in Sky. "You are like kings too in this, Sir," said I, "that you must act under the direction of others." Tuesday, Sept. 21. — The uncertainty of our present situation having prevented me from receiving any letters from home for some time, I could not help being uneasy. Dr. Johnson had an advantage over me in this respect, he having no wife or child to occasion anxious apprehensions in his mind. It was a good morning; so we resolved to set out. But, 1 Thomas Cumming was a bold and busy man, who mistook his vocation when he turned Quaker (for he was not born in that sect). He planned and almost commanded a military expedition to the coast of Africa, in 1758, which ended in the capture of Senegal. It and his author made a considerable figure in Smollett's History of England, vol. II, p. 278, where the anomaly of a Quaker's heading an army is attempted to be excused by the event of the enemy's having surrendered without fighting; and a protest that Cumming would not have engaged in it, had he not been assured, that against the powder forces the enemy could not have resisted. This reminds us of another story of Cumming, told by Johnson (post, sub April 28. 1738.) During the rebellion of 1715, he was asked whether the time was not come when even he, as a Quaker, ought to take arms for the civil and religious liberties of his country? "No," said Cumming, "but I will drive an ammunition cart." Yet this baring man was, it seems, morbidly sensitive. Mrs. Pizzoli says, "Dr. Johnson once told me that Cumming, the famous Quaker, whose friendship he valued very highly, fell a sacrifice to the insatiate papers, having declared on his death-bed, that the pain of an agonizing letter, written in some of the common prints of the day, fastened on his heart, and threw him into the slow fever of which he died." — Anecdotes, p. 143. One libel, in which Tomâcamingo is severely handled, will be found in the Town and Country Magazine of January 1774; and though it seems nothing to die of, Cumming's death that very year gives countenance to Johnson's anecdote. — CRoKER. 2 Abt. before quitting this castle, where we have been so well entertained, let me give a short description of it.

Along the edge of the rock, there are the remains of a wall, which is now covered with ivy. A square court is formed by buildings of different ages, particularly some towers, said to be of great antiquity; and at one place there is a row of false cannon of stone. There is a very large unfinished pile, four stories high, which we were told was here when Lord, the first of the family, came from the Isle of Man, married the heiress of the M'Crails, the ancient possessors of Dunvegan, and afterwards acquired by conquest as much land as he had got by marriage. He surpassed the house of Austria; for he was felix both bella gerere et uedere. 2 John Breek 3 Macleod, the grandfather of the late laird, began to repair the castle, or rather to complete it: but he did not live to finish his undertaking. Not doubting, however, that he should do it, he, like those who have had their epitaphs written before they died, ordered the following inscription, composed by the minister of the parish, to be cut upon a broad stone above one of the lower windows, where it still remains to celebrate what was not done, and to serve as a memento of the uncertainty of life, and the presumption of man. 4

"Joannes Macleod, Begunoduni Dominus, gentis sue Philarchus 5 Durinesies, Hariae, Vaternesies, etc. Baro: D. Florae Macdonald matrimoniali vinculo conjugatus, turrem hanc Begunodunensem, pravorum habitaculum longe vetustissimum, die peditus labepectam, Anno aere vulgaris MDCLXXXVI insinuavit.

"Quem stabilire juvat pravorum tecta vetusta, Omne seclus fugiat, justitiamque colat. Vertit in acrias turres magalia virtus, Inque casas humiles tecta superba nefas."

Macleod and Tidisker accompanied us. We passed by the parish church of Durinish. The churchyard is not enclosed, but a pretty murmuring brook runs along one side of it. In it is a pyramid erected to the memory of Thomas Lord Lovat, by his son Lord Simon, who suffered on Tower Hill. It is of freestone, and, I suppose, about thirty feet high. There is an inscription on a piece of white marble inserted in it, which I suspect to have been the composition of Lord Lovat himself, being much in his pompous style.

I have preserved this inscription, though of no great value, thinking it characteristic of a man who has made some noise in the world. Dr. Johnson said, it was poor stuff, such as Lord Lovat's butler might have written.
